The defendant contends that Virginia is estopped from denying that the assessed valuation in 1863 is the "fair estimated valuation" and rely upon State v. Turpike Co., 22 Tenn. (3 Humphrey), 305, and State v. Hamilton, 30 Tenn. (11 Humphrey), 47, which hold that the analogy between the agent of the state employed to "transact its ordinary business and operations" is complete between that of an agent of an individual person, acting through his agent, and the state is equally bound thereby. State v. Crutcher, 32 Tenn., 504, 515, is to the same effect except as an additional reason for holding that the settlement involved in that case bound the state, it appeared that it had "received the approval of the legislature."

As to these cases it is to be said that the assessors assessing property are not acting as agents of that character. As is said in Stanley v. Board of Supervisors, 121 U. S., 535, also cited by the defendant, "their action is judicial in its character."

11 Amer. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 2nd Ed., 396, and cases cited, is relied upon as establishing the doctrine that a state may be estopped by its covenants in a deed.

The cases all proceed upon the theory that as to the deed or grant, the state acts in its private capacity, and is therefore governed by the same rules that apply under the same circumstances to private individuals, a state of facts that does not obtain at bar, as there is no deed or grant here, and there is no action by the state in its private character and no ground for an estoppel. Cases like Stanley v. Board of Supervisors, 121 U. S. 535, are cited for the purpose of showing that the assessment cannot be attacked collaterally by a tax payer, but this is not a case of a tax payer contesting either the validity or the amount of the tax assessed, and those cases proceed upon the ground that remedies are provided by statute for the tax payers. Moreover, in that case the Court held that the valuation fixed, was not conclusive even as against the tax payer, as while they hold that the tax could not be attacked collaterally, they also hold that > "when the over-valuation of property has arisen from the adoption of a rule of appraisement which conflicts with a constitutional or statutory direction and operates unequally not merely on a single individual but on a large class of individuals or corporations, a party aggrieved may resort to a Court of equity to restrain the exaction of the excess, upon payment or tender of what is admitted to be due" (pp. 550-1).

While insisting upon the position that the assessed valuation is conclusive upon Virginia, defendant calls my attention to cases, which it is contended, require me to take judicial notice that these valuations "are far below the market value of the property assessed".

In State v. Savage, 91 N. W. 716, 720, acting upon an assessment, the Court took judicial notice that it was "notorious" that the assessment was at only twenty to ten per cent of the value of the property.

In Railroad & Tel. Cos. v. Board of Equalizers, 85 F. R. 302, the Court said, if it "may judicially know an established custom" real property was assessed "at a rate not exceeding 75 per cent. of actual value" (p. 310). And the Court also said:

> "It is a matter of familiar and common knowledge with every citizen of the State [Tennessee] that ordinary real property is assessed for general taxation at a percentage ranging from 50 to 75 per cent. of actual value" (p. 308).

The Court cited Railway v. Guenther, 19 F. R. 395 where in speaking on the same subject, the Court said:

> "But from the other proof in the cause and from what the Court may judicially know" the assessments were

> "one-fourth below their real value " (p. 399).

The Court in that case also cited Board of Supervisors of Bureau County v. Chicago B. & Q. R. Co., 44 Ill. 229 where the Court said:

> "It is an admitted fact on both sides of this controversy that the property of no one owner in the County of Bureau has been taxed on its real value" (p. 239).

In that case it appeared that > "property of individuals ranged from one-fifth to one-third of its cash value" (p. 237).

These facts appeared by proof and were not a matter of judicial notice.

In Cummings v. National Bank, 101 U. S. 153, also cited in the opinion, the Court said:

> "But it is a matter of common observation that in the valuation of real estate this rule is habitually disregarded" (p. 162).

The Court had already decided the case and it appeared "by the testimony of four or five assessors" that they had established a rule by which real and personal property was assessed at one-third of its actual value. The remark made by the Court was unnecessary to the decision, general in its character and expressly declared to be in "extenuation" of the practice thus disclosed to obtain in Ohio. The Court further said for the same purpose,

> "it is believed that the valuation of real estate for the purposes of taxation rarely exceeds half of its current salable value" (p. 163).

It is not believed that the Court in using this general language by way of illustration, as a dictum, were laying down a legal rule for determining the value of real estate, and authorizing the Court by judicial notice to make a reduction from its assessed value.

These cases may perhaps be sustained upon the theory that > "Courts may properly take judicial notice of facts that may be regarded as forming part of the common knowledge of every person of ordinary understanding and intelligence" (Cyc., Vol. 16, p. 852), and the fact that the judicial notice is confined to the particular states under discussion.

I am not advised whether it is ten, twenty, thirty-three and a third, fifty or seventy-five per cent. of the valuation that I am expected to assume as a matter of judicial knowledge. If I am asked to hold that there is a universal custom, prevailing everywhere, to undervalue real estate for the purpose of taxation, I should not feel at liberty to so hold, for I know the contrary to be true. I know localities where the full value is intended to be assessed. There is no evidence in this case by which it could be inferred that any custom to undervalue prevailed in Virginia in 1856 or in 1863. If an undervaluation was a part of the common knowledge of every person of ordinary understanding at that time, nothing appeared in the record to indicate it, and I do not feel at liberty to assume it. The Act under which the assessment was made required the assessors to "examine all the lands and the lots with the improvements thereon * * * ascertain and assess the actual value thereof" (Sec. 4, Act Mar. 10, 1856, p. 17). By Section 5, the Courts had the power to > "reduce the same to what is in their opinion the true value of such lands or lots," and if too low, "they shall increase it in like manner".

The defendant contends in connection with these assessments that > "It is a well settled principle that the law contemplates or presumes that all public officers in the discharge of their duties have acted according to the requirements of the law and have done all things which the law requires they shall do," and cites authorities which amply sustain that proposition. Such being the rule, when applied to this assessment it follows that in fixing the value of the real estate in 1856 the assessors fixed the "cash value thereof".

The defendants were requested to submit authorities upon the competency of the opinions of witnesses and actual sales upon the question of values on June 20, 1863. Having submitted none, I assume that they do not contend that upon the authorities evidence of that character is inadmissible. The evidence is objected to on the ground that its effect is to impeach the judgment of the revenue officers, and it is claimed that their judgment is thus being collaterally attacked. No question of taxation is involved here. The only question is what is a "fair valuation", and an assessment made in 1856 is the starting point in ascertaining that valuation on June 20, 1863.

The theory of the plaintiff involves the assumption that the assessment in 1856 was the true value at that time. It is their basis. That pronounced changes in value, especially in view of war conditions, may have occurred up to June 20, 1863, is too obvious for discussion.

The opinions of witnesses, sales, and conditions in 1863, and the use sought to be made of such evidence on the part of the plaintiff does not only fail to contradict, impeach or collaterally attack, but proceeds upon the assumption, that the action of the assessors is to stand, as the basis of the valuation.

It seems inevitable, that the existence of the war and its continuance from 1861 to June 20, 1863, the presence of the contending armies and the condition of destruction and devastation necessarily incident thereto, produced a marked diminution in the value of the real estate within the limits of the Confederacy.

The difficult question is, how much was the depreciation. Upon this point the evidence is very fragmentary, indefinite and unsatisfactory, but it is all there is in the case from which that can be ascertained. The plaintiff shows thirty sales of real estate in the territory in question during the months of April, June, July and August, 1863 (Rec. 654-5-6-7-8). These sales were all undoubtedly in Confederate money, as it does not appear to be seriously controverted that all transactions in the Confederacy at that time were in Confederate money. Reduced to a gold basis they show an average depreciation from the assessed value of 62.90 per cent.

J. M. McWhorter, a witness for the defendant says that "there was depreciation. People were ready to dispose of their property and turn it into money" (Rec., p. 715). It was on account of the raids of Confederate armies (Rec., pp. 715-716). He testifies only as to Roane and Jackson Counties (Rec., p. 717) and makes no estimate as to the amount of the depreciation in those Counties.

Ex-Governor Atkinson, also a witness for defendant, was in Kanawha, Fayette, Nicholas, Greenbrier, Jackson, Roane, Putnam and Mason counties, more or less of which, were overrun at times by both armies (Rec., p. 787). He says

> "It necessarily materially reduced the values of all kinds of property all through this region of the country" (Rec., p. 788).

From shortly after September, 1862, until the close of the war the Federal forces occupied the great Kanawha valley (Rec., pp. 787 and 790). The counties above referred to were largely situated in this valley. He had no doubt but that > "property values did increase in the upper part of the State to some extent during the period of the War, which part was not burdened by soldiers of either side; but for the Southern portion of the State, I cannot believe, taking the whole period of the War, that the valuation of personal property and real estate increased at all" (Rec., pp. 794-5).

He says "that in the whole Southern tier of counties" real estate "did materially depreciate" (Rec., p. 795). He expresses no opinion as to the percentage of increase on the one hand or decrease on the other.

The counties that plaintiff concedes should have their values reduced are the whole Southern tier of Counties (Rec., p. 640, Ex. E-1, p. 2) and the counties as to which Mr. McWhorter and Mr. Atkinson testify are such as were substantially in the great Kanawha Valley that was under Federal control shortly after September, 1862, until the close of the War.

This is in substance the evidence upon the part of the defendant bearing directly upon the question of value.

The plaintiff relies upon a number of witnesses who appear to have had some opportunity to know of the conditions in a great deal of the territory in Virginia that was the subject of military occupation. They all agree that great damage was done and that there was great deterioration in value. (Hunter, 741; Scott, 748; Branch, 754; Wellford, 761; Taylor, 769; Hawes, 772; Williams, 778; McCabe, 783-4).

Hunter says that it:

> "is almost entirely a matter of conjecture, but I should suppose it would be fair —of course I just hazard this—to state that the values were destroyed one-half at least, taking the whole State at large" (Rec., p. 742).

He says it was "impossible to base any satisfactory judgment as to values" (Rec., p. 742). In answer to the question as to whether real estate was worth "less than one-half," Scott says, "Undoubtedly in gold values" (Rec., p. 748).

Branch says:

> "I don't consider that I know enough to express an opinion in regard to real estate. It was very much depreciated * * * I am satisfied (though I am not speaking of any sale I now remember) that it depreciated fully one-half" (Rec., pp. 756-7).

Wellford—reducing Confederate money to gold, says the value was not "over one-half" as before the War (Rec., p. 763).

Taylor—Fifty to Sixty per cent. depreciation (Rec., p. 770).

Hawes—Depreciation, fifty per cent. (Rec., p. p. 779).

Williams—Average lands in Virginia were not worth 25 per cent. in 1863 in good money (Rec., 779).

McCabe expresses no opinion as to the amount of depreciation.

Indefinite, uncertain and unsatisfactory as these statements are, the defendants though examining its witnesses upon the same general subject after this testimony was taken, made no effort to contradict their statements or opinions. This, with the sales, is all the evidence there is, and it is perhaps true that at this late day, nothing more satisfactory could be obtained. Taking it with the presumption of the great decrease in value resulting from the War conditions, I think the estimate made by the plaintiff is as close and approximate as can be reasonably made of the fair estimated value of the real estate on the 20th day of June, 1863, and I therefore find that the fair estimated valuation of the real estate in the counties in Virginia on that day was, $148,042,730.15. The plaintiff concedes that the same reduction should be made in the Southern tier of ten counties of West Virginia. I find the value of the real estate in said counties to be $14,773,124.60.

There is no evidence that taking West Virginia as a whole there was any decrease in its value. While Ex-Governor Atkinson says, that in the upper part of the State "values had increased to some extent," and that

> "but for the Southern portion of the State, I cannot believe, taking the whole period of the War, that the valuation of personal property and real estate increased at all. On the contrary, I am quite confident that it did not do so" (Rec., p. 795), he afterwards said that in the southern tier of counties it materially depreciated. He expresses no opinion upon the question of depreciation of the state as a whole. His statement as to the increase of value of the upper part of the State has some corroboration in the fact that agriculture was carried on in that section at a handsome profit in 1863 and 1864 (Rec., p. 798).

The same reduction having been made in the Southern tier of ten counties on account of the War conditions that has been made upon the real estate in Virginia, I think it reasonable to take the assessed valuation in West Virginia for the remaining counties without making any addition for any increase in value "in the upper part of the State" as the fair estimated value of the real estate in those counties on June 20, 1863.

And I therefore find that the fair estimated value of that portion of West Virginia was $52,903,002.84, which added to the valuations fixed upon the Southern tier of counties makes the aggregate of the fair estimated value of the real estate in the Counties of West Virginia the sum of, $67,676,127.44.

Alternative Finding.

I find in the alternative at the request of the defendant that the assessed valuation of the real estate in the counties constituting the State of Virginia on June 20, 1863, was $296,085,460.31 and that the assessed valuation of the real estate in the counties constituting West Virginia was $82,449,252.04.

Personal Property.

The total valuation of personal property including slaves and not including income in the counties of Virginia, was, according to the last obtainable assessment prior to June 20, 1863

(Rec., p. 639, Ex. E-1, p. 1), $403,696,228.59. The same valuation for the counties in West Virginia was $30,394,487.21 (do.).

The witnesses all agree that there was a great diminution in quantity of stock of all kinds and provisions as compared with 1860 and 1861.

Hunter says: "Very largely; very largely" (Rec., p. 743).

> Scott says: "Personal property of all sorts had become so scarce that by reason of its scarcity it had a fictitious value, almost in Confederate money. There were not any horses to spare left, very few cows, very little furniture, very few farming utensils and very little live stock."
> "There was ten times as much personal property in 1861 as there was in 1863" (Rec., p. 749).

The value of horses was much more in 1863 (Rec., p. 750).

Branch says: other personal property had depreciated fifty per cent. (Rec., p. 757).

Wellford: "Immense diminution in the quantity" of personal property (Rec., p. 763). Hogs made into bacon, and horses, were worth more. He says that Lincoln's Proclamation had "very little effect" upon the value of slaves "until the surrender of Vicksburg and Gettysburg. It was laughed at and ridiculed by most people" (do., p. 763). Leaving out cotton and tobacco, personal property depreciated 75 per cent. Carriages and wagons and farming utensils were pretty well worn out (do., p. 764). Nearly one-half of the horses and cattle were gone (do., p. 765).

Taylor—Depreciation 50 to 75 per cent. (do., p. 769) "except such things as were absolutely in demand like horses, provisions and things that you would have to have'' (do., p. 769).

Hawes—Live stock and poultry were swept off. (do., p. 772). Amount carried off large (do., p. 774).

Williams—Depreciation was less than fifty per cent. (do., p. 779).

McCabe—Live stock was swept away (do., p. 785).

While these statements as to the amount of personal property destroyed are probably somewhat exaggerated I have no doubt there was a marked reduction in quantity, and an abnormal increase in demand, caused by the presence of the contending armies in large numbers for such personal property as horses, cattle, sheep and hogs which would necessarily tend to largely increase their value. All fowl and animals of every description (except horses, mules, asses, cattle, sheep and hogs), all farming implements actually used for farming purposes and all mechanics' tools used on any farm or by any person actually engaged in any other occupation or profession were exempt from taxation, and are not included in the aggregate of personal property above given.

The plaintiff claims that the assessment upon which the valuation of personal property is based was made in Confederate money on February 1, 1863, which at that date was at the rate of 4 to 1, and that therefore in order to get the valuation in gold the assessment should be reduced seventy-five per cent. An analysis and comparison of the assessments of 1861 and 1863 does not sustain this contention. For the purpose of making this analysis and comparison I have had prepared an abstract of the personal property assessment for 1863, so far as obtainable from the records, marked "Supplemental Ex. 4", and a comparison of average assessed valuations marked "Supplemental Ex. 5." If the assessment of 1863 was made upon the same basis as the assessment of 1861 and there was an increase in the value of horses &c., cattle, sheep and hogs, we should expect to find in the assessment of 1863, a larger average sum assessed on account of such property than was assessed in 1861. If a basis of valuation four times as great as that of 1863 was adopted, we should expect to find a general increase in the value as to all the items included in the assessments, approximating at least, the basis used. In the case of pleasure carriages and other vehicles, the assessment of 1863 compared with 1861 in six instances at least is less than the assessment of 1861. In case of watches, it was less in two counties, and in case of clocks in ten counties. In the case of pianos and harps, in 19 counties.

In making these comparisons it is to be noted that the valuations in 1861 as a rule are somewhat less than the valuations in 1860. I have not made computations in connection with all of the items in all of the counties, but I have made computations enough to satisfy me that there has been no horizontal increase of the rate of assessment on the basis of four to one.

The largest increase was in connection with the items as to which the greater increase in value was to be expected. In the case of sheep, the greatest increase that I find is 450 per cent. and I find that in only twenty-four counties was there an increase of 300 per cent. or over. In cattle, the largest increase I find is 321 per cent, and I find only three counties in which there was an increase of 300 per cent. or over. The largest increase in the case of hogs was 461 per cent. and I find only nine counties in which there was an increase of 300 per cent. or over. I find that in one county there was an increase in the valuation of clocks of 332 per cent.

The assessment of the various articles of personal property in a number of counties will show that nothing approximating a horizontal increase could have been made in 1863. I have selected for comparison the following counties, as they show some of the largest increases in valuation and are more favorable to the plaintiff's contention. In Amherst County the increase on horses &c. was 136 per cent.; pleasure carriages, 46 per cent.; cattle, 221 per cent.; sheep 400 per cent.; hogs, 347 per cent.; watches, 99 per cent.; clocks, 16 per cent.; pianos and harps, 43 per cent. Fluvanna County, horses 122 per cent.; pleasure carriages, 54 per cent. cattle 257 per cent. sheep 300 per cent. hogs, 300 per cent. watches 55 per cent. clocks 29 per cent. pianos and harps 55 per cent.

Henrico County—Horses, 79 per cent.; pleasure carriages, 51 per cent.; cattle, 316 per cent.; sheep, 358 per cent.; hogs, 479 per cent.; watches, 58 per cent.; clocks, 63 per cent.; pianos and harps, 40 per cent.;

Goochland County—Horses, etc., 105 per cent.; pleasure carriages, 7 per cent.; cattle, 266 per cent.; sheep, 335 per cent.; hogs, 304 per cent.;

watches, 56 per cent.; clocks, 7 per cent.; pianos and harps, 10 per cent.;

Powhatan County—Horses, etc., 83 per cent.; pleasure carriages, 28 per cent.; cattle, 257 per cent.; sheep, 440 per cent.; hogs, 338 per cent.; watches, 37 per cent.; clocks, 86 per cent.; pianos and harps, 17 per cent.

The average increase per head of these various items of personal property in 1863, compared with 1861, is: Horses, 93 per cent.; pleasure carriages, 30 per cent.; cattle, 140 per cent.; sheep, 228 per cent.; hogs, 164 per cent.; watches, 58 per cent.; clocks, 34 per cent.; pianos and harps, 25 per cent.

Plaintiff says that the counties of Accomac, Alexandria, Northampton, Norfolk City, Norfolk, and Portsmouth "are included in the comparison" and that the assessment in those counties was made "at its full value in lawful money of the United States, and not in Confederate currency." Inasmuch as the schedule shows no assessment in Alexandia in 1861, none in Norfolk for 1863, none in Norfolk City for 1861 and 1863, and none in Portsmouth for 1863, those counties, standing alone, would not appear to have much value. Alexandria comes nearest to the other counties in amounts assessed and a comparison with its values will show that there could have been no general increase of assessments on the basis of 4 to 1. There are sixteen counties where the value of horses was less than $100 and three less than $81.01, the value in Alexandria; viz., Carroll, $72.43; Highland, $45.62, and Northumberland, $79.82. Horses—Alexandria, $81.01; average for State, $125.25; Amherst, $152.49; Fluvanna, $155.67; Goochland, $171.69; Henrico, $146; Powhatan, $139.06. Carriages—Alexandria, $103.28; average in State, $90.28; Amherst, $116.68; Fluvanna, $110.31; Goochland, $91.60; Henrico, $114.12; Powhatan, $88.93. Cattle—Alexandria, $29.50; average in State, $24.28; Amherst, $34.89; Fluvanna, $41.72; Goochland, $44.16; Henrico, $71.67; Powhatan, $33.03. Hogs—Alexandria, $5.00; average in State, $5.26; Amherst, $8.77; Fluvanna, $8.47; Goochland, $9.62; Henrico, $23.16. Watches—Alexandria, $27.85; average in State, 51.41; Amherst, $85.07; Fluvanna, $53.67; Goochland, $59.08; Henrico, $62.81. Clocks—Alexandria, $3.87; average in State, $5.64; Amherst, $6.97; Fluvanna, $5.76; Goochland, $6.59; Henrico, $6.35. Pianos—Alexandria, $111.41; average in State, $182.46; Amherst, $215.59; Fluvanna, $237.20; Goochland, $205.96; Henrico, $181.05.

The marked increases that appear are clearly in connection with the articles that must have necessarily increased in value and very few of those show an increase of 300 per cent.

It is a fair inference from all the testimony that there was an actual increase in value upon the gold basis of horses, etc., cattle, sheep and hogs. The differences in value are what would naturally be expected from the difference in location and the fact that the values were fixed by different Commissioners. The analysis of the assessments distinctly negatives the idea that there was any change in basis of valuation. If Hawes, who says (Rec., p. 774) that horses would sell for $400, $1,000 and $1,500, and Williams: "A mighty poor horse you could get for $500" (do., p. 781) are correct, inasmuch as the average assessed value in 1863 for horses was $125.25, it is impossible that the assessment could have been made in Confederate money on the basis of their actual value. No one having any personal knowledge testified to the assessment having been made in Confederate money.

Plaintiff claims that Taylor and Williams testified that taxes "were assessed in Confederate money." Taylor testified:

> "Q. 11. In what kind of money were taxes assessed and paid at that time—in 1863? A. Confederate money" (Rec., p. 768).

Williams testified:

> "Q. 1. In 1863 what was the currency of the country here, the currency in which taxes were assessed and paid and transaction of all kinds had? A. The only currency in use was Confederate Treasury notes and State Bank notes."

and the rest of the answer makes no reference to the assessment.

> "Q. 2. What currency was the measure of value in 1863? A. Confederate currency. The bank notes were for a long time at a premium but they became finally as worthless as Confederate money" (Rec., p. 781).

He does not state when they were at a premium or when they became worthless. Neither of these witnesses were assessors and it does not appear that they had any personal knowledge, or how they derived such information as they have. It is not contended that real estate was assessed in Confederate money. The testimony of these witnesses covers all taxes and must be incorrect as to real estate. It may be it was intended to ask them as to personal property, but the question was not so asked or answered. Is it true that all taxes were "paid" in Confederate money when the law in force shortly after the time of the assessment, Feb. 1, 1863 did not authorize the payment of taxes of less than five dollars in Confederate money?

I do not question the honesty or sincerity of the witnesses, but the judicial action of the assessors at the time would seem to be the better criterion of value.

The inference of assessment in Confederate money is sought to be drawn from the fact that the taxes were payable in Confederate money, and that business transactions were in Confederate money.

The Act of March 22, 1862 (Acts 1862, p. 32: App. p. 132), made Confederate notes receivable for taxes without any limit. The Act of March 28, 1863 (Acts of 1863, Chap. 1, Sec. 109: App. p. 132), made Confederate notes of the denomination of or over five dollars receivable for taxes, and the Act of Sept. 14, 1863 (Acts of 1863, Chap. 1, Sec. 1), made them receivable generally. An assessment in Confederate money (Feb. 1, 1863) as to those whose tax was less than $5.00 and could not be discharged in Confederate money would operate somewhat oppressively.

The act of March 28, 1863 raised the rate of taxation as compared with 1861 on the average, approximately, 150 per cent. The purposes for which the public expenditures were made were not increased; if anything, the purposes for which revenue was expended were less in 1863, than in 1861, as it is conceded that the discharge of many of the public functions which involved expenditure by the Government at that time, were to quite a degree suspended. 150 per cent. more money was collected and disbursed to accomplish the same results that were accomplished in 1861.

The war expenses of Virginia it is conceded were met by loan. In the matter of taxation and the money collected therefor, the element of Confederate money was apparently reflected in the increase of 150 per cent. in the rate of taxation, rather than in the assessment.

The fact that personal property throughout the country generally very largely appreciated in value between 1861 and 1863 is of some significance. It seems clear that the basis of assessment was not Confederate money. Horses as an illustration were apparently assessed upon the same basis as in 1861 and at their fair value. If one item was assessed uon that basis, and upon its cash value, no reason is perceived why all of the other items of personal property, involved in the same assessment, were not made upon the same basis, and I see no reason why the rule does not apply to slaves, as well as to other personal property. While there are inconsistencies and incongruities in connection with these assessments which it is difficult to explain, I have to take this branch of the case upon the elements that I find, and I do not think the plaintiffs have sustained the burden of showing the horizontal decrease from the assessed value of 75 per cent. The only other alternative is the value fixed by the assessors on the basis of the assessment in 1861, and I therefore find that the assessed value of the personal property is the fair estimated valuation of the personal property on the 20th day of June, 1863, namely:

It appears that the amount of income upon which an income tax was assessed in Virginia, as per the latest obtainable assessment rolls, prior to June 20, 1863, was in Virginia. $11,108,300.13
and in West Virginia 299,257.45

The defendant claims that these sums are a part of the personal property and should be so returned. These sums represent "the value of his income during the next year preceding" the date upon which the assessment was made (Code Va. 1860, Sec. 151, p. 198), where it exceeds $250. It is gross, not net income. The fact that that amount was received in income during the preceding year, by no means indicates that it was on hand at the end of the year, especially where the tax was upon incomes as small as $250 a year. The inference is that it was not so on hand. So far as it was on hand unspent, it would necessarily be represented by "money on hand or securities or other personal property," which items have already been included in the aggregate of personal property above given. If the gross income was to be treated as personal property on hand, it would result in duplicating it in the aggregate of value so far as it was on hand. I disallow the "income" as part of the personal property June 20, 1863.

This sum is reached by taking the amount of the assessment for 1861 (Rec., p. 645), $100,201,850, and adding thereto the assessment for Chesterfield for 1861 (Plff. Ex. Paragraph VI of Decree.

"6. All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during the period prior to the admission of the latter State into the Union."

I think the moneys paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth from the Counties included within the State of West Virginia are intended to be the converse or complement of the expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia in the same territory. These were public expenditures for public purposes. The amounts paid in are also to be public payments in discharge of some tax or public burden, or sums paid by the public, for the use of a public utility owned by the state.

The parties agree upon the sum of $5,954,395.66 (Rec., p. 805; Ex. F-1, p. 1).

The following items are in controversy:

1. Bonus received from Banks.....$96,253.62
The details which are essential to the determination of this item do not appear in the Record. They are in "Supplemental Ex. 3," certified by both accountants. The first payment of $5,000 was paid in 1838. The Act of 1837, Chap. 82, p. 66, relative to Banks, provided as follows:

> "Sec. 7. That in consideration of the privileges hereby granted, there shall be paid to the Commonwealth, by every bank hereafter chartered, out of each semi-annual dividend, a sum equal to one fourth of one per centum upon the then capital stock, which shall be paid by creating additional stock to that amount in the name of the Commonwealth, for the benefit of the fund for internal improvement."

This Act provided for a payment of a franchise or excise tax in stock. The item of $5,000 paid in 1838 appears to be in cash. There is nothing in the Record to indicate that it was stock paid under this statute. It is entered upon the books as a cash payment by the Bank. As no other explanation is given of the item, I will assume as a fair inference from the entry, that it was a tax paid in stock, and afterwards converted into cash to the amount of $5,000 and allow it upon that assumption as a payment.....$5,000

All of the other payments were made under an Act passed March 25, 1842 (Acts of Va., 1841-2, p. 61, Chap. 105, Sec. 14) which provided that in consideration of the privileges hereby granted that a sum equal to one-fourth of one per centum upon the capital stock "shall be paid semi-annually by the said banks into the Treasury of this commonwealth."

This was a general statute and the tax imposed was a franchise or excise tax of the same kind as those referred to in the Code of Virginia, Chap. 40, Sec. 41, p. 249, the chapter defining the "Amount or rate of tax." It is included among other subjects of taxation and is clearly treated in the general statutes as a tax and I hold that it is a franchise, or excise tax, and therefore properly to be credited under that paragraph $96,253.62

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

At the request of the plaintiff, I find that the banks located in West Virginia paid into the

Treasury of the Commonwealth for the privilege of exercising their franchises during the period above mentioned and in the manner above indicated ..... $ 96,253.62

7. Dividends from Banks in West Virginia counties $786,666.98

These are not in any sense public payments. They are dividends which the State received on its own stock held in its private capacity, and are of the same character as the dividends paid to other stockholders. They are no more a public payment, or the discharge of a public burden, than are the dividends that are paid to the other stockholders. West Virginia is not charged with the investment, and no reason is perceived why she should receive a return upon a private investment which she refuses to assume.

The item is disallowed.

8. Dividends and interest from Turnpike Companies in West Virginia counties $13,595.48
9. Dividends from Bridge Companies in West Virginia $6,028.51
10. Dividends from Interstate Turnpike Companies (proportion).... $1,355.92 are of the same character and are disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the defendant that the aggregate of the last four mentioned items was all paid in dividends into the Treasury of the Commonwealth upon stock held by the Commonwealth, in said companies, whose banks and roads were located in West Virginia, with the exception of the dividends from Interstate Turnpike Companies (in which case the amount paid was in proportion to the portion of the road located in West Virginia), namely: $807,646.89.

11. Dividends from James River and Kanawha Company $352.21
14. Interest from the City of Wheeling $571.81

These items have both been withdrawn.

20. Merchants & Mechanics Bank Stock sold (bonus stock)..... $43,103.35

The Act incorporating the Merchants and Mechanics Bank (Acts of Virginia, 1833-4, Chap. 72, p. 84, Sec. 20), provided:

> "20. And be it further enacted, That in consideration of the privileges hereby granted to the said bank, there shall be paid to the commonwealth by the said bank, the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, to be paid in twenty semi-annual instalments; which instalments when paid in shall be converted into stock, and a dividend thereon shall be declared from time to time, in the same manner as on shares held by individuals; the first instalment shall be paid one year after the first dividend be declared; Provided, That should the capital stock of said bank, at any time hereafter, be increased beyond the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, a similar bonus shall be paid on such increase, proportioned to the time for which this charter shall remain in force" (do. p. 92).

The Commonwealth received, under this section, from this bank 400 shares of stock which were sold for $43,103.35 (Rec. p. 809). This was clearly a franchise or excise tax payable in stock instead of cash and is allowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that the Commonwealth received from the Merchants and Mechanics' Bank "in consideration of the privileges" granted to it as a franchise tax 400 shares of stock which was sold for $43,103.35.

21. Northwestern Bank—Profit on 1,082 shares sold, $5,471.42.

This item has been withdrawn by the defendant.

22. Northwestern Turnpike Road tolls, $126,339.89.

The defendant is charged with the expenditure on this road, which was a public work, and the money that was paid into the Treasury in tolls by the public for the use of the road is the converse of the public expenditure made by the State and comes fairly within the meaning of the decree and is allowed so far as it exceeds the amount of tolls expended for repairs.

23. Staunton & Parkersburg Road tolls, $17,090.71 is also allowed for the same reason.

These tolls were used for making repairs on the respective roads, $109,587.74 in the case of the Northwestern Turnpike and $21,700.74 in the case of the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike, in all repairs, $131,288.48. (Rec., 373, Ex. C. 1, p. 2.) The aggregate of tolls received on both roads is $143,420.60, making, taking both roads together, a net receipt of tolls, $12,132.12. The excess of tolls all occurs in the case of the Northwestern Turnpike and strictly speaking, the account should be stated, showing the excess of receipts in connection with that item, with an excess of charge for repairs in connection with the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike. Both roads in the discussion, however, have been taken together and the net result is precisely the same, and I therefore take the two items together and allow as a credit the net excess as above stated.....$12,132.12

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

At the request of the plaintiff, I find that in the case of the last two items, the aggregate of $143,420.60 was paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth as tolls upon roads owned wholly by the Commonwealth as the result of public expenditure the roads being public in their character and the tolls being paid by the public for the use thereof.

SUMMARY.

At the request of the plaintiff, that the aggregate of these two items was paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth by the public as tolls upon roads owned wholly by the State $143,420.60

PARAGRAPH VII OF DECREE.

"7. THE AMOUNT AND VALUE OF ALL MONEY, PROPERTY, STOCKS AND CREDITS WHICH WEST VIRGINIA RECEIVED FROM THE COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, NOT EMBRACED IN ANY OF THE PRECEDING ITEMS AND NOT INCLUDING ANY PROPERTY, STOCKS OR CREDITS WHICH WERE OBTAINED OR ACQUIRED BY THE COMMONWEALTH AFTER THE DATE OF THE ORGANIZATION OF THE RESTORED GOVERNMENT OF VIRGINIA, TOGETHER WITH THE NATURE AND DESCRIPTION THEREOF."

Under this Paragraph I find that the State of West Virginia received nothing in money from the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the date of the organization of the Restored Government of Virginia or subsequent thereto.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find as an alternative finding, at the request of the plaintiff, that the State of West Virginia received from the Restored Government of Virginia sums of money as follows:

July 2, 1863.....	$92,866.17
July 2, 1863.....	$47,734.03	$140,600.20
July 9, 1863.....		$9,399.80
Feb. 1, 1864.....		$20,771.46
		$170,771.46

Under the provisions of the Act passed February 3, 1863 (App. p. 128), there was transferred to the State of West Virginia, among other things,

> "the interest of this state or of the said president and directors, or of the said board of public works, in any parent bank or branch doing business within the said boundaries; and all stocks of any other company or corporation, the principal office or place of business whereof is located within the said boundaries, standing in the name of this state or of the said president or directors, or of the said board of public works, or of any person or persons, for the use of this state" (do. p. 129).

While there is nothing in the record to show where the principal offices or places of business of the various turnpike companies, navigation companies and bridge companies are (Rec., 820 B, C, D, E, F, G, J, K), it is conceded upon the part of the defendants that the companies mentioned in said schedules had their "principal office or place of business" "located within the said boundaries," that is, the State of West Virginia, and such stock was transferred to West Virginia by the operation of said Act of February 3, 1863.

And it is conceded upon the part of West Virginia under Paragraph VII, that the stock in the various corporations above referred to, except the interstate companies, is included within the provisions of this Paragraph of the decree.

The only evidence in the Record bearing on the value of these various stocks are the facts that appear by these schedules showing the amounts paid by the State for its subscription to the stock of the various companies, and so far as dividends have been paid by said companies, the amount of the dividends that have been paid, certain admissions relating thereto, and the testimony of a number of witnesses as to the physical condition of the property of some of the companies, and the statement of the condition of the banks. In the case of many of the turnpike companies, no dividends were paid and the only fact that I have is the amount that the State paid upon its subscription. In such cases the evidence does not seem to me sufficiently definite to enable me to find that the stock at the time of its transfer to West Virginia had any value, as the inference to be drawn from the fact that no dividends have been paid is, that the property was not able to earn any return upon the investment, and an investment that can pay no return could hardly be considered to have any market value. In the cases where dividends have been paid during a number of years, I have the amount of the investment made by the State with the rate of the dividends, and in such cases I have capitalized the dividend upon the basis of the stock being worth par with a six per cent. dividend, and have determined the value accordingly, except in cases where it appears that the property of the company may have been destroyed prior to June 20, 1863. The method that I have adopted is, I appreciate, arbitrary but it is the only method that seems to be feasible on the facts presented.

As to the Turnpike Companies intended to be covered by the stipulation (Rec., p. 864) the stipulation is too indefinite and uncertain to be of any assistance in determining the value of any particular road. The defendant contends that it covers some sixty-five roads and the plaintiff concedes only four. Only three of the roads claimed by the defendant were paying dividends in 1860, viz.: Grave Creek and Pennsylvania Line Co.; Holiday Cove Co. and the Martinsburg & Potomac. As to these in order to eliminate any controversy, as to the construction and effect of the stipulation, the plaintiff concedes that for the purposes of this report, the interest of the Commonwealth in the stock of those companies was of no value, June 20, 1863.

As to the 18 Turnpike Companies mentioned on page 820-B Rec., only the last—Grave Creek and Pennsylvania Line Co., admitted to be of no value—appears to have ever paid any dividend. The earliest was incorporated in 1837; the latest in 1853. Under these circumstances, I find that the stock that the Commonwealth owned in those companies had no value.

None of the sixteen turnpike companies mentioned on Page 820-C, Rec., (eliminating Holiday Cove and Martinsburg & Potomac as of no value) declared any dividends, they having been organized between the dates of 1847 and 1854 and there is nothing to indicate that the stock had any market value on June 20, 1863 and I therefore find that these stocks were of no value.

The first fifteen turnpike companies mentioned on page 820-D, Rec., with the exception of the New Creek and Hardy Turnpike Company do not appear to have paid any dividends from the date of their incorporation up to 1860, the earliest being incorporated in 1830. The New Creek and Hardy Turnpike Company appears to have paid one dividend of $271.25 upon an investment on the part of the Commonwealth of $5,431.24 in 1850.

Under these circumstances, it does not appear that there are sufficient facts in the record to justify me in finding that there was any market value to the stock the Commonwealth held in any of these companies on the 20th day of June, 1863, and I therefore find that the stocks had no market value.

The Sheperdstown and Smithfield Turnpike Company, incorporated in 1816, in which the Commonwealth had invested in the stock $18,575, appears to have paid eight dividends during the period of 23 years ending in 1839 with no dividends since that date. The first dividend was paid in 1832, $399.38, and the last in 1839 of $40, showing a marked decrease in the dividend during the dividend paying period, with no dividends for the 22 years intervening between 1839 and 1861, and upon this state of facts I find that the stock in that company had no value on June 20, 1863.

Of the four remaining companies on page 820-D, Rec., only one appears to have paid any dividends. As to the other three, I find that their stock had no value on June 20, 1863.

The Sweet and Salt Sulphur Springs Turnpike Company, organized in 1849, in the stock of which the Commonwealth had an investment of $10,104. (820-D, Rec.) began to pay dividends in 1855 and paid continuously until 1859, the dividend in 1859 being $459. The average dividend paid during the five years of the dividend paying period was $491.-92. No dividend appears to have been paid in 1860, but the inference from the payment of dividends of a substantial amount, for the preceding five years, makes it reasonably certain that the property was of value and had a dividend paying capacity. Why a dividend in 1860 was not paid, does not appear, but in the absence of any evidence showing any injury to the physical value of the property, or any unusual loss or the occurrence of any fact tending to destroy its value, I think it is a reasonable inference that the failure to pay the dividend must have been for a cause other than one affecting the real value of the stock, and on the basis of the last dividend of 4½ per cent. the investment of the Commonwealth would be worth $7,578. on the 20th day of June, 1863, and I value it at $7,578.

The first five turnpike companies mentioned on page 820-E, Rec., organized from 1847 to 1851 do not appear to have paid any dividends, and I therefore find that the stock that the Commonwealth held therein was of no value on June 20, 1863.

The White and Salt Sulphur Springs Turnpike Company, organized in 1834, in the stock of which the Commonwealth had invested $4,000, paid dividends continuously with the exception of two years from 1838 to 1860, the last dividend being $400, with an average dividend of $240 a year or 6%, I therefore value the interest that the Commonwealth held in the stock of this company at par, $4,000.

The other six turnpike companies mentioned on page 820-E, Rec., with the exception of Wellsburg and Washington Turnpike Company do not appear to have paid any dividends, and I therefore find that the interest that the Commonwealth held in the stock of these companies was of no value on June 20, 1863.

The Wellsburg and Washington Turnpike Company organized in 1808, in which the Commonwealth had an investment of $7,071.01, paid two dividends in 1837 and 1838, the last being $212.13, and has declared no dividends since, and

I find that under those circumstances the stock of that company on June 20, 1863 had no value.

The four navigation companies mentioned on page 820-F, Rec., organized between 1817 and 1853 do not appear to have ever declared any dividends and I find that the stock of the Commonwealth in these companies had no value June 20, 1863.

It is admitted that the bridge of the Buchannon Bridge Company was destroyed April 1863, and that the bridge of the Cheat River Toll Bridge Company, was destroyed in the same month, and that the bridge of the Elk River Bridge Company, was destroyed in 1862. The bridge of the North Branch Bridge Company was destroyed in 1862, and the bridge of South Branch Bridge Company was destroyed in 1862, and that the bridge of the Virginia and Maryland Bridge Company was destroyed in 1861 (Rec., p. 863).

I find that the stock in these companies was of no value on June 20, 1863.

The Fairmont and Palatine Bridge Company, in the stock of which the Commonwealth had invested $12,000 it is admitted paid a six per cent. "dividend for several years after the end of the war on the par value of the stock of $12,000 assigned to the State of West Virginia therein," and for that reason I find that that stock was of the value on June 20, 1863 of $12,000 (Rec., p. 863).

The Guyandotte Bridge Company and the Morgantown Bridge Company, incorporated respectively in 1848 and 1850, have never paid any dividends and for the reasons given above, I find that the stock that the Commonwealth held in those companies was of no value on June 20, 1863.

The four turnpike companies referred to on page 820-G, Rec., organized respectively in 1832, 1837 and 1851 do not appear to have ever paid any dividends and for that reason, I hold that the stock in those companies on June 20, 1863 was of no value.

The five turnpike companies referred to on page 820-H, Rec., with the exception of the Hillsborough and Harpers Ferry Turnpike Company and the Martinsburg and Winchester Turnpike company, while organized in 1846, 1851 and 1856, respectively, do not appear to have ever paid any dividends, and for that reason I hold that the stock was of no value on June 20, 1863.

The Hillsborough and Harper's Ferry Turnpike Company, incorporated in 1849, in the stock of which the Commonwealth invested $6,000 declared only one dividend of $240 in 1856, and upon that state of facts I am not able to find that the stock had any value on the 20th day of June, 1863.

The Martinsburg and Winchester Turnpike Company, organized in 1838, in the stock of which the Commonwealth had invested $27,000 declared two dividends one in 1859 and one in 1860 of $803.27 and $405 respectively. Taking the last dividend as the basis of valuation which was at the rate of one and ½ per cent. or ¼ of 6 per cent., I find that the stock in that company was on June 20, 1863 of the value of $6,750.

There is nothing in the record to show where "the principal office or place of business" of this road is located and I do not understand that the admission of the defendant applies to interstate roads. I am not able to find that this stock was ever transferred to West Virginia. This is an interstate road 59.09% being within the counties included within the State of West Virginia.

Company in which the Commonwealth invested in its stock $11,325 in 1851, paid only one dividend and that in 1857, and upon these facts I do not feel authorized to find that the stock had any value on the 20th of June, 1863.

The Raleigh and Wythe Line Turnpike Company, organized in 1860, in which the Commonwealth paid on an authorized stock subscription of $4,800, $400 only, does not appear to have paid any dividend that year and apparently could hardly have been fully constructed. There is not sufficient data in the record to enable me to form any opinion as to its value, and therefore, I do not find that the stock had any value on June 20, 1863.

On the 20th of June, 1863, the Commonwealth held 3,418 shares of the capital stock of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia of a par value of $100, which if worth par would be worth $341,800. This par value was at first conceded by the defendant to be chargeable to West Virginia (Rec., p. 280-A, Deft.'s Ex. G-1, p. 1). Since filing the schedule making this admission, West Virginia withdrew the admission and changed it to $136,630., and that sum was reached as follows:

It appears from the testimony of Mr. Dering (Rec., p. 892) and the certificate of J. S. Darst, the auditor of West Virginia (do., p. 851) and supplemental brief filed by defendant, that West Virginia received on account of the original stock in the Northwestern Bank of Virginia at Wheeling, 300 shares of stock in the National Bank of West Virginia in the City of Wheeling, 400 shares of stock in the Parkersburg National Bank of Parkersburg, West Virginia, and 351 shares of stock, in the first National Bank of Wellsburg, at Wellsburg, West Virginia, these being the banks that were the successors of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia, known as the parent bank and of its branches at Parkersburg and Wellsburg, respectively. The par value of the shares was $100. At their par value they would be worth $105,100. The record contains nothing as to the assets of these banks, upon which an estimate of the value of this stock can be made. It further appears that dividends from the remaining assets of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia were received by West Virginia as follows:

July 9, 1867	$10,510.00
August 12, 1868	$10,510.00
Sept. 1, 1871 (in deft.'s brief)	$10,510.00

which added to the $105,100 makes the total amount now admitted by West Virginia as the value of the 3,418 shares of the stock of the Northwestern Bank. There is nothing in the record to show when this bank was reorganized or the circumstances under which the reorganization took place. The auditor's report of West Virginia shows the stock was delivered July 1, 1866. The reorganization and the distribution of the stock in the various banks, and of the cash dividends, appear to have taken place three years and more after June 20, 1863. Upon the other hand, as indicating the value of the stock, there is a joint "Supplemental Ex. 8" certified by the accountants for both parties, showing that the dividend for 1860 upon the stock of the Northwestern Bank was eight per cent. and the average dividend from 1844 to 1860 inclusive was 7½%, or 1-4 more than 6%. The statement of the condition of the Bank in a return made February 27, 1861, showing the condition on Jan. 1, 1861, and one of the Fairmont bank dated Apr. 27, 1861, showing its condition Apr. 1, 1861, are marked "Supplemental Ex. 9."

The defendant concedes that the Fairmont bank that was paying only a 4% dividend was worth par June 20, 1863 (Rec., p. 820-A).

There is nothing to indicate any change of any kind in the condition of the Northwestern Bank, either by way of assets or business or capacity to declare dividends between Jan. 1, 1861 and June 20, 1863. That it met with some serious financial difficulties between January 1, 1861, and July 1, 1866, would seem to be a necessary conclusion from the condition of the bank at the time of its reorganization, but as to what they were, or when they occurred, the record is silent.

A comparison between the Fairmont Bank and the Northwestern will be instructive on the question of value. The notes due from other banks in Virginia to the Northwestern increased from 1860 to 1861 approximately 100%, and there was substantially the same percentage of increase of similar notes due to the Fairmont Bank. The surplus and profits of the Northwestern decreased from 1860 to 1861, 10%. In the Fairmont Bank there was an increase of 11%. If the Fairmont Bank had paid a dividend of 6% instead of 4% the decrease would have been substantially the same. The surplus of the Northwestern was nearly 12% of its capital, of the Fairmont about 5¾%. In the Northwestern the deposits decreased 4% and in the Fairmont 20%. The Fairmont Bank appears to have paid but one dividend of 4%. The Northwestern had an established business and had been paying dividends regularly since 1843 at an average rate of 7½% (for four years 10%), and was paying 8% in 1860. If under these circumstances the Fairmont Bank stock was worth par, it seems that the Northwestern stock should be worth at least ¼ more than par, and I would be justified in applying the same rule as to value, that I have applied to the public service corporations, and I therefore add ¼ to the par value and find the value of the stock June 20, 1863, to be $427,250.00.

I think it clear that this is a conservative value Jan. 1st, 1861, two years and five months prior to the time when the valuation is made. There is a presumption of continuance. There was great expectation of success in the Confederacy, until Gettysburg in July, 1863, which had some tendency to maintain credit conditions, and while my conclusion is largely arbitrary, taking everything into account, I think the valuation reached reasonable.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the defendant that West Virginia received on account of the reorganization of the Northwestern Bank in stock and cash $136,630. between July 1, 1866, and Sept. 1, 1871, and it does not appear that at that time the Northwestern had any other assets.

I find pursuant to the admission of the defendant (Rec. 820-A) that the stock of the Fairmont bank was of the value of $50,000.

A detailed statement of the investment of the Commonwealth in the capital stock of the James River and Kanawha Company appears on pages 820-L and 820-M, Rec. By this it appears that 3.49 per cent. of the improvement was located in West Virginia (p. 820-M). The only dividend that the company appears to have ever paid is $10,092. in 1836 (p. 820-L).

Under these circumstances I find that the stock of this Company had no value on June 20, 1863.

Summary.

I find the values set against the respective companies as follows:

Sweet & Salt Sulphur Spring Co. stock	$7,578.
White & Salt Sulphur Spring Co. stock	$4,000.

ALTERNATIVE FINDINGS:

At the request of defendant.

The Commonwealth received on account of the Blue Ridge Railroad in bonds and interest....	$625,348.08 and was relieved from a contingent liability upon a guarantee of...	$100,000.00

3. At the request of the plaintiff, the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for capital stock of the Winchester & Potomac Railroad Company, to the extent of. $120,000.00

Upon the basis of mileage, the proportion of these sums that would be chargeable to West Virginia, is $170,532.00

I state as a special circumstance important to be taken into account that as a result of legislation predicated upon both the stock and loan that the Commonwealth had in this Road, there was paid into the Commonwealth in 1886, the sum of.. $118,518.12

6. At the request of the plaintiff, that the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for stock in the Berryville and Charlestown Turnpike Co. and upon the mileage basis of 58 1/3 per cent. the amount chargeable to West Virginia would be..... $11,932.52

15. At the request of the plaintiff, that the Commonwealth loaned to the Kanawha Board of its bonds ..... $60,000.

At the request of the plaintiff, that in the various bridge companies, located in West Virginia. Items 57 to 65, inclusive, the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for stock $78,412.50

That in the various navigation companies located in West Virginia Items 66 to 69, inclusive, the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for stock..... $210,500.00

That in the various Turnpike companies, Items 70 to 147, inclusive, all of which were in the territory now constituting West Virginia, the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for stock..... $803,555.83
700,103.49 of which was wholly in Virginia and $103,452.34 was West Virginia's portion in case of companies partly within her limits.

That in the two banks mentioned in Items 148 and 149, within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia the State subscribed and paid for stock $391,800.00

At the request of the defendant, I find that the sum of $2,500 was invested under circumstances where the trustees of the Town of Bath assumed a contingent liability, only, of paying the interest upon the sum expended by the State, after the tolls remaining from the operation of the road after the payment of 'necessary expenses and repairs" and profits received from the operation of a spring, were applied thereto, and that this was the only liability that the trustees of the Town of Bath assumed in connection with this expenditure of..... $2,500.

This sum is reached by taking the amount of the assessment for 1861 (Rec., p. 645), 100,201,-850, and adding thereto the assessment for Chesterfield for 1861 (Plff. Ex. H1., p. 355), 1,077,368, and Goochland (Plff. Ex. CHAP. XVII.

An Act to create a fund for Internal Improvement.

[Passed February 5th, 1816.] 35

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That a fund shall be, and the same is hereby created, to be denominated "The Fund for Internal Improvement," and to be applied, exclusively, to the purpose of rendering navigable, and uniting by canals, the principal rivers, and of more intimately connecting, by public highways, the different parts of this Commonwealth.

2. And be it further enacted, That this fund shall consist of the shares held by the Commonwealth, in the stock of the little River Turnpike Company, of the Dismal Swamp, Appomattox, Potowmac, and James River Canal Companies, of the Bank of Virginia and Farmers' Bank of Virginia, together with such dividends as may, from time to time, accrue to such shares of stock, and such bonus, or premiums, as may be hereafter received, for the incorporation of new Banks, or for the augmentation of the capitals, or the extension of the charters of the existing Banks.

3. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of preserving and improving this fund, and of disbursing such portions of it as the General Assembly may, from time to time, direct to be applied to any object of internal improvement, it shall be and the same is hereby vested in a corporate body, to be styled, "The President and Directors of the Board of Public Works," in which name they shall have a common seal, and perpetual succession, subject to the limitation hereinafter provided, shall be capable of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded, and shall have and enjoy all the rights and privileges of a corporation.

4. And be it further enacted, That the Governor of the Commonwealth shall be, ex officio, President of the Board of Public Works; that the Directors, a majority of whom shall constitute a Board for the transaction of any business devolving on the corporation, shall consist of the Treasurer and the Attorney General of the Commonwealth, for the time being, and of ten citizens thereof; of whom three shall reside westward of the Allegany mountain; two between the Allegany and the Blue Ridge; three between the Blue Ridge and the great post road, which, passing through the territory of the Commonwealth, crosses the principal rivers thereof at, or about the head of tide water; and the residue, between that road and the sea coast.

5. And be it further enacted, That the Directors of the Board of Public Works, except the Treasurer and Attorney General, shall be chosen annually, by joint ballot of the two houses of the General Assembly, and receive such compensation for their services, as may be allowed by law, which, until otherwise provided, shall be the same mileage for travelling to and from the place of sitting, and the same pay per diem during the continuance of their session, as is now by law allowed to a member of the General Assembly.

6. And be it further enacted, That in the absence of the Governor, the board may elect a president pro tempore, from their own body, who shall preside over the deliberations of the board, until the Governor is enabled to attend.

7. And be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works shall have power to appoint a principal Engineer, or Surveyor of the Public Works, and a Secretary to the board; together with such other officers and assistants, as they shall deem necessary; each of whom shall receive for his services such compensation, as the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works may allow, to be paid out of the revenue of the fund for internal improvement, and to be reimbursed that fund, by an allowance to the Commonwealth of so much of the stock of any canal, or turnpike company, as shall constitute a reasonable compensation for the services rendered such company by the surveyor and his assistants.

8. And be is further enacted, That the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works shall hold an annual meeting in the city of Richmond, or at such other place as may be designated by law, to begin on the first Monday in November of every year, and to continue until the business of the board is transacted—But, that the President of the board may, at his own pleasure, or shall, at the request of any three Directors thereof, convene an extra meeting of the board, for the transaction of any extraordinary business which may devolve on the corporation.

9. And be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works may, at their annual meetings, enact, alter, or amend, such rules as to them may seem proper, for the purpose of regulating the order of their proceedings; that they may have power to adjourn the board for any period not exceeding six months, or, when occasion shall require it, to have an extra meeting at any other place than that designated by law, and shall have power to make and establish such bye-laws, rules and regulations, for the better ordering of the conduct of their officers, agents and servants, as to them may seem expedient, provided the same be not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of this Commonwealth, or of the United States of America. They shall also have power, at any time during the recess of the Legislature to fill any vacancy which may occur in their own body, either from death, resignation, removal, inability, or any other cause.

10. And be it further enacted, That the fund for internal improvement, subject to the order of the President and Directors of the board, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the Commonwealth, and kept distinct and apart from all other public money: It shall be paid out or delivered by the Treasurer of the Commonwealth to the order of the board, certified and subscribed by the Secretary, and countersigned by the President; that the Treasurer shall keep a fair and regular account of all such disbursements, and carefully preserve the certificates upon which the same shall have been made, and shall render an account thereof to the General Assembly, at the same time at which he renders his annual account of the disbursements of the ordinary revenue: that once in every year the Board of Public Works shall depute a committee of their body to examine the accounts of all disbursements made by order of the board, during the year next preceding the annual meeting of the board, and to compare these accounts with the Treasurer's books, and the certificates giving authority for the payment of the several sums of money, or stock, entered therein; that their reports shall certify to the board, that the same have been fully accounted for, or otherwise, as the case may be.

11. And be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works, shall be, and they are hereby authorized to subscribe in behalf of the Commonwealth, to such Public Works, as the General Assembly may, from time to time, agree to patronize, such portions of the revenue of the fund for internal improvement, as may be directed by law but that no part of the said fund shall be subscribed towards the stock of any canal, turnpike, or other Company, until three fifths at least of the whole stock, necessary to complete such canal, turnpike, or other public work of such company, shall have been otherwise subscribed; nor until, of the stock so subscribed, one fifth thereof shall have been actually paid in by the respective subscribers, or the payment thereof effectually secured by bond with approved security, or a deed of trust upon the real estate of such subscriber, of twice the value of such fifth part; such bond to be taken payable to the President, Directors and Company authorized to complete such public work, and to be recoverable against the obligor or his securities, on motion, after ten days' notice, in any court of record within the Commonwealth having jurisdiction thereof; and such deed of trust to be proceeded upon whenever the trustee therein named shall be required to do so by such President, Directors and Company.

12. And be it further enacted, That the dividends on the stock which may be subscribed by the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works shall go exclusively to other subscribers than the Commonwealth, until such portion of the stock of those subscribers, as shall have been actually paid in, shall have netted to them six per cent. per annum, from the specified time of such payment; that any increase of profit, after that nett income shall have been assured to the subscribers, shall belong exclusively to the fund for Internal Improvement, until the nett annual income of the whole stock, actually expended by any company, shall reach six per cent per annum; after which, the Commonwealth and the other subscribers to the stock of the company shall divide the nett profits on such stock in proportion to their respective interests. That, whenever the nett income of any company, to which any part of the fund hereby created shall have been subscribed, shall be found, for two succeeding years, or upon an average of five succeeding years, to surpass fifteen per cent. per annum, the General Assembly may reduce the tolls, from which such income is derived, so as to limit the nett revenue of the company to that amount; provided, that should the tolls for any two succeeding years fail to yield a nett income to the company of ten per cent. per annum, the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works, on satisfactory evidence being adduced thereof, may authorise the tolls to be augmented, so as to assure to the company such nett income; And provided, also, that after the lapse of sixty days from the period at which such tolls shall have first netted ten per cent. per annum, the maximum profit of the company may be reduced to twelve per cent.; and after the lapse of one hundred years from the same period to ten per cent per annum.

13. And be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works shall vest in some productive fund the unappropriated dividends accruing upon any of the stock committed to their charge, until the same shall be specially applied by law to some object of internal improvement: and shall have power, subject to the control of the General Assembly, to sell, from time to time, as may be ordained by law, the whole or any part of the shares held by the Commonwealth, in the stock of any canal, turnpike or other company subscribed for under the provisions of this Act, for the purpose of investing the proceeds of sale in the stock of some other similar company, subject to the like conditions as have been before expressed in this Act.

14. Be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works shall have power to appoint, in behalf of the Commonwealth, so many directors of every Public Work, as shall bear to the whole number of the directors of such work the proportion of the Commonwealth's shares of stock in such work, which may be subscribed in pursuance of this Act, to the whole number of shares subscribed thereto: provided, however, that whenever it shall be found expedient by the Legislature to authorise the subscription of any part of the fund hereby created to any company already incorporated, the provisions of this section shall not be construed as applying to such company, unless it be otherwise directed by the Act authorising the subscription.

15. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works, to keep a fair and accurate record of all their proceedings, which shall be at all times open to the inspection of the members of the General Assembly, and of the President, Directors and other officers of any company interested therein; that they shall report to the General Assembly, at or near the commencement of every annual session thereof, the exact state of the fund for internal improvement; the progress and condition, noting especially the nett income, of all the public works within the Commonwealth; the surveys, plans and estimated expense of such new works as they may recommend to the patronage of the General Assembly, together with such other important information, as they may have it in their power to collect, in relation to the objects committed to their trust.

16. And be it further enacted, That the public faith shall be and the same is hereby solemnly pledged to fulfill the appropriation made by this Act; and that the said appropriation shall continue in force until the first day of January, of the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty six, except at such times as the United States of America may be involved in war, or the safety of this Commonwealth may, in the opinion of the General Assembly require; when the General Assembly may withdraw (during the period of actual hostilities, or of such imminent danger,) the whole or any part of the said fund for the purpose of defence; provided such withdrawal can be made without a violation of any engagement entered into under this Act.

17. This Act shall commence and be in force from and after the passage thereof.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

An Act prescribing certain general regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies.

[Passed February 7th, 1817.] 41

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That, whenever it may be deemed expedient by the General Assembly, to grant a charter for the incorporation of a company to make a turnpike road, and an act shall actually pass the General Assembly for such purpose, the following general provisions shall be deemed and taken to be part of the said charter or act of incorporation, to the same effect as if the same were expressly re-enacted in reference to any such charter or act, except so far as such special grant, charter or act may otherwise expressly provide; viz: the commissioners named in any special act of incorporation, or a majority of them, shall have power to open books for subscriptions to the stock of the company, at such places as shall be named in the said special act, and to divide the capital stock authorized to be subscribed by the said act, into as many shares, not exceeding one hundred dollars each, in amount as they may deem proper, and to appoint any number of deputy commissioners to open books for a subscription to the stock of such company; and the subscriptions may be made by the subscribers to the said stock, either in person or by power of attorney in Virginia currency, or such medium as the commissioners or a majority of them may agree to receive. It shall be the duty of such commissioners, and deputy commissioners, to receive all monies which may be due upon the shares subscribed in their books, at any time before the first election of the president and directors of the company, as herein provided for; but all monies which may be payable on such shares, after such election, shall be paid to the said president and directors, or to their order. The said commissioners and deputy commissioners shall, forthwith, after such election, pay over to the president and directors all monies received by them; and in failure thereof, the said president and directors may recover the amount due from them, or from any one or more of them, by motion, on ten days previous notice, in the superior or inferior court of any county or corporation wherein such commissioner or commissioners may reside; the clerk shall endorse, upon the execution, which shall issue upon such recovery, that no security shall be taken, and the sheriff or other officer shall govern himself accordingly.

2. The subscription books shall remain open until at least one half of the capital stock of the company shall have been subscribed; public notice of which event shall be given by any three of the said commissioners, who shall have power, at the same time, to call a general meeting of the subscribers, at such convenient place and time, as they shall name in the said notice: to constitute any such meeting, a number of persons entitled to a majority of all the votes which could be given upon all the shares subscribed, shall be present, either in person or by proxy; and if a sufficient number 42 to constitute a meeting do not attend on that day, those who do attend shall have power to adjourn from time to time, until a meeting shall be formed.

3. If it shall appear to this meeting on examination of the books, that one half of the said capital sum shall have been subscribed, then the said subscribers, their executors, administrators and assigns, from the time of said meeting, shall be and they are hereby declared incorporated into a company, with all the rights, privileges and immunities of a corporation or body politic in law, and may make such bye-laws and regulations, not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of this state, or of the United States, as shall be necessary for well ordering and conducting the affairs of the company.

16. In consideration of the expenses the proprietors will incur in opening, improving and repairing the said road, the said road, with all the tolls and profits, shall be and the same is hereby vested in the respective proprietors forever, in proportion to their respective shares; and the same shall be deemed personal estate, and shall be exempt from any public charge or tax whatsoever.

17. Be it further enacted, That, so soon as any section of five miles of the said road shall be completed, it shall be lawful for the president and directors to apply to the court of that county in which such section, or the greater part thereof, may lie, for the appointment of three discreet and disinterested freeholders to examine the same, who, or any two of whom, being sworn for that purpose, shall examine such section, and make a written report of the condition thereof to the court; and if, after such report and such other evidence as shall be offered, the said court shall be satisfied, that such section is completed in the manner prescribed by this act, they shall make an order of record declaring that it is so completed, and it 48 shall thereupon be lawful for the president and directors, and they are hereby authorized to erect thereon a toll gate or gates, and they shall be entitled to demand and receive the following tolls upon the said section, to wit: for every score of sheep or hogs, six and one quarter cents; for every score of cattle, twelve and one-half cents, and so in proportion for any greater or lesser number; for every horse, mare, mule or gelding, three cents; for every two wheeled riding carriage, ten cents; for every four wheeled riding carriage, twenty cents; for every cart or waggon the wheels whereof do not exceed four inches in width, six and a quarter cents, for every four footed animal drawing the same; and for every cart or waggon the wheels of which exceed four inches in width, and roll less than seven inches, three cents for every four footed animal drawing the same; and for every cart or waggon the wheels of which are seven inches or more in width, one cent, for every four footed animal drawing the same: Provided always, that return waggons or carts shall pay one-half of the said tolls only: and the like rules and proceedings shall be had for every other section of five miles of the said road, when the same shall be completed, and the like tolls shall be paid for passing the same; and if, after all the full sections of said road shall be completed, there shall remain any fractional part of a section, a toll gate may be erected thereon after it shall be completed, in the same manner as is provided in relation to the full sections; and tolls may be demanded thereat, bearing the same proportion to the tolls allowed on a full section as the said fractional part bears to such full section.

24. Be it further enacted, That if the said president and directors shall fail to keep the said road in repair for the space of 51 eighteen months, then shall the interest of the said company in the road and tolls aforesaid be forfeited and cease forever.

28. Be it further enacted, If the said president and directors 52 not begin the said work within two years, after the passage of the act for incorporating the company, or shall not complete the same within ten years thereafter, in the manner hereinbefore directed, then the interest of the said company, in the road and tolls aforesaid, shall be forfeited and cease.

29. At the end of one year from the completion of the road, the president and directors shall report, to the baord of public works, a statement, shewing the whole amount of the capital stock expended in the construction of the road, the amount of tolls received during each preceding year, the expenses and charges incurred during each year, and the nett annual profit or loss, on the capital expended. If, from this statement and such other evidence as shall be offered, the president and directors of the board of public works shall be satisfied, that the nett average profits of the three succeeding years, on the capital stock expended, will not equal ten per centum per annum, then the said president and directors of the board of public works shall so augment the tolls hereby allowed so as to make them sufficient, in their estimation, to yield such nett annual profit for the three succeeding years; and if the said board of public works shall be satisfied, from the evidence aforesaid, that the average nett profits of the said three succeeding years will exceed fifteen per centum per annum, on the capital stock expended, then they shall so diminish the tolls hereby allowed as to make them only sufficient, in their estimation, to yield an annual nett profit of fifteen per centum per annum, for the said period of three years. The president and directors of the turnpike company shall in like manner, at the expiration of every period of three years, after the said one year from the completion of the road, return to the board of public works a 53 similar statement shewing the amount of expenditures, receipts and nett profits of each year, of such period; and upon each return so made, it shall be the duty of the president and directors of the board of public works to regulate the tolls by increasing them when below the minimum, and diminishing them when above the maximum, upon the principle above laid down, so as to attain as nearly as practicable the following result, that is to say: that for each period of three years during the first twenty-one years, the average nett profits upon the capital stock expended shall not exceed fifteen per centum per annum, nor be less than ten per centum per annum; that, for each period of three years, for the next thirty years, the average nett profits upon the capital stock expended shall not exceed twelve per centum per annum, nor be less than eight per centum per annum; and that, for each period of three years thereafter, the average nett profits upon the capital stock expended shall not exceed ten per centum per annum, nor be less than six per centum per annum.

The president and directors of the board of public works may from time to time prescribe the form, in which the returns aforesaid shall be made, and the evidence by which they shall be verified; and if the president and directors of the turnpike company shall fail to make the return accordingly, and to produce the evidence required for its verification, without good cause for such failure to be shewn to the board of public works, it shall be the duty of the president and directors of the board of public works to make an entry upon their journal declaring such failure, and forthwith to reduce the tolls of said turnpike company, to an amount not exceeding one half the tolls hereby allowed, and calculated to yield a nett profit not exceeding in their estimation five per centum per annum. Such reduction shall be continued until the proper return shall have been made, verified by the proper evidence, or until good cause shall have been shown for the failure.

30. And the president and directors of the said company are hereby required, when they make their first report to the board of public works as herein required, to accompany the same, with a complete plat or map of their road.

32. The president and directors shall cause to be written or printed certificates for the shares of the stock in the said company, and shall deliver one such certificate, signed by the president, and counter-signed by the treasurer, to each person for every share subscribed by him, which certificate shall be transferable by him, subject however to all payments due or to become due thereupon; and such assignee, having first caused the transfer or assignment to be entered in a book of the company to be kept for that purpose, shall thenceforth become a member of the said company, and shall be liable to pay all sums due, or which shall become due upon the stock assigned to him: Provided, however, That such assignment shall in no wise exempt the assignor, or his representatives, from their liability to the said company, for the payment of all such sums, if the assignor or his representatives shall be unable, or shall fail to pay the same; And provided, moreover, That if the commonwealth shall desire to purchase the stock of such company, and shall vest authority to make such purchase in any person, body politic or corporate, it shall not be lawful for any proprietor of such stock to sell or transfer the same to any other person whatever, until he shall actually and with good faith have offered the same for sale, for the price which he is willing to take therefor, to the person, body politic or corporate so authorized to purchase by the Commonwealth; and after such person, body politic or corporate shall have been so authorized to purchase on behalf of the commonwealth, no transfer or assignment to any other person shall be registered, or entered in the books of the company, nor shall any such transfer or assignment vest any right whatever, unless it shall be proved to the satisfaction of said president and directors, that the stock so assigned, or transferred, had been, with good faith, previously offered to the person, body politic or corporate, so authorized, at a price at least as low as that at which it had been sold to such assignee, or transferree.

35. Be it further enacted, That the powers hereby given to the president and directors of the board of public works, may be at any time transferred by the legislature to any other corporate or natural body, and all returns hereby directed to be made to the said board of public works may be hereafter in like manner directed to be made to any other body.

36. This act shall commence and be in force from the passing thereof.

CHAP. LXXXI.—An act prescribing certain general conditions on which future subscriptions to the capital of joint stock companies shall be made on behalf of the commonwealth.

[Passed February 11th, 1832.] 71

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, That all subscriptions which are now authorized by law, and have not been made by the board of public works, or which may hereafter be so authorized shall be subject to the following conditions previous to subscription, to wit: In every case the board of public works shall be furnished with a certificate, under the seal of the company, signed by their treasurer, and countersigned by their president, stating that at least one-fourth of the private subscriptions of not less than three-fifths of the capital stock, has been actually paid up into the hands of the said treasurer, and that the remainder of said subscription is either so paid, or is made by solvent persons fully able to pay; and these facts shall be shewn to the satisfaction of the board of public works. They shall also be furnished with a list of the stockholders, shewing the number of shares standing in each name. If any private improvement shall have been commenced previously to the subscription thereto being authorized or made, the board of public works shall be furnished with a statement, shewing the amount of money received up to the date of such statement, and on what account received, and of the amount expended in the work, together with the balance of money on hand the contracts entered into for the construction of the improvement, the exact progress made therein, as near as may be, its dimensions, its mode of construction, and a correct map of its location.

2. The instalments on the future subscriptions of the board of public works, shall be payable in the manner, and on the conditions herein-after mentioned, when not otherwise specially provided by law; that is to say, one-fourth of such subscriptions shall be paid on the production of the draft of the treasurer, or other authorized agent of the company, for the same, in such form as the board of public works may prescribe and the remaining three-fourths on similar drafts, in six equal semi-annual instalments, or in instalments of the same proportions with future payments of private subscriptions, at the discretion of the board of public works: Provided, That before payment of the instalments aforesaid, the said board of public works shall be furnished in every case with a certificate in the form and manner required by the first section of this act, shewing the amount actually paid up by the private stockholders, which amount must be at least equal in proportion to the amount payable by the board of public works. But should the fund for internal improvement be inadequate, in the opinion of the said board, to the payment of the full amount of the instalments aforesaid, after providing for the subscriptions previously made, then their subscriptions shall be payable in such proportions, and at such periods, as the said board may deem expedient.

3. Whenever it shall happen in any year that the funds of the board, applicable to the purpose, shall prove insufficient to discharge when due the full amount of the instalments of subscriptions actually made, then and in that case, it shall be the duty of the said board to expend the funds so applicable, as far as they will go, in the payment of the instalments of such subscriptions as shall stand first in point of order, according to the date of resolutions of the board of public works making the said subscriptions: and 72 the fund for internal improvement shall not be chargeable with any interest, in consequence of such suspension in the payment of the whole, or any part of said instalments.

4. When the board of public works, having made any subscriptions to the stock of any company, shall have good cause to believe that the private subscriptions are improperly withheld, or that the funds of the company are misapplied, or will probably be misapplied, it shall be the duty of the said board to withhold payment of their subscriptions until proper legal measures can be taken to secure the faithful payment of private subscriptions, and the faithful application of the funds of the company.

5. The board of public works shall have the right to appoint such a number of the directors in all companies hereafter incorporated, to whose stock the board of public works may subscribe, as will be in proportion to the stock so subscribed; and the fund for internal improvement shall participate in all dividends declared by said companies, in the proportion which the amount actually paid on behalf of the state, bears to the amount of private subscriptions actually paid up at the time of declaring such dividends: and in all general meetings of the stockholders of such company, the proxy or proxies representing the interest of the fund for internal improvement, shall have the right to vote on all questions, and in the election of all officers except directors, in the manner, and under the limitations contained in the twentieth section of the act, entitled, "an act prescribing certain general regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies," passed the seventh day of February, eighteen hundred and seventeen.

6. It shall be the duty of the president and directors of every such company, to the stock of which the board of public works shall subscribe as aforesaid, annually, on or before the seventh day of December, to furnish to the secretary of the board of public works a report of the income and expenditure of every such company, for the next preceding year, including payments made by the stockholders, as well as tolls, together with a statement of the progress and condition of their works a list of the stockholders at the time of making said report, with the number of shares standing in each name, and such other information respecting the affairs of said company, as the board of public works may require. It shall also be the duty of the president and directors of such company, within sixty days after any dividend shall have been declared by them, to give information thereof to the second auditor, and to pay into the public treasury, to the credit of the fund for internal improvement, within the said period, any such dividend to which the board of public works may be entitled: and in case of failure, either on the part of the president and directors of such company, in furnishing such report and information, or of the treasurer of such company, in paying such dividends as aforesaid, the president and directors, or the treasurer, as the case may be, of each company so failing, shall individually forfeit and pay to the board of public works, a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars; which said dividends and penalty may be recovered by motion in the general court, on ten days previous notice. 73

7. All acts and parts of acts coming within the purview of this act, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed.

8. This act shall be in force from and after the passing thereof.

CHAP. 94.—AN ACT to explain the act authorizing subscriptions on part of the commonwealth to the capital of joint stock companies.

(Passed March 18, 1836.) 69

Whereas the limited income of the fund for internal improvement will not justify subscriptions on the part of the state to all the canal, rail-road, turnpike, navigation, or other joint stock companies, which have been, or may be incorporated, for carrying on works of internal improvement, and it is expedient, until such income shall be adequately increased, that it shall be applied to the aid of such works, as by their character or position are best calculated to promote the prosperity of the state at large: Therefore,

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, That nothing contained, or to be contained, in any acts incorporating companies for the purpose of executing and carrying on works of internal improvement, shall be considered as a pledge or assurance on the part of the general assembly, to subscribe on behalf of the state for any portion of the stock of such companies, unless the legislature expressly direct such subscription to be made in the act of incorporation, or by subsequent enactment.

2. This act shall be in force from its passage.

See Act April 9th, 1838, Chap. 12, under head "Interest on Public Debt."

[No. 8.] Joint Resolution requesting the members of Congress from this State to secure the aid of the United States in repairing roads and bridges injured during the war.

Whereas, during the recent rebellion, our state, lying on the border, has been peculiarly exposed to the raids of the enemy and the ravages and desolations resulting from the oft repeated tread of advancing and retreating armies; and whereas, during this painful process, our citizens have endured suffering beyond weight or measure, in the loss of life in every form, at the hand of every variety of enemy—in captivity—in exile—in perils night and day; and in many parts of our state the general disruption of all organized legal and social order, and the embarrassment of even the ordinary pursuits indispensable to their comfort and existence. In this broad sweep of contending armies, and foes of lesser note, many of their churches, court houses—not to mention private property—have been injured or destroyed; but the roads and bridges, the most important of which, were in part owned by the state, and were used and many of them destroyed, by the Union armies—and the bridges burnt by order of the Union commanders as means of safety, leaving our principal roads impassable. Therefore,

Resolved by the Legislature of West Virginia, That our senators in congress be hereby instructed, and our representatives 134 requested, to respectfully, yet earnestly, present our grievances to the attention of congress, and to adopt such measures as may best secure adequate relief in the premises; and that the governor transmit a copy hereof to each of our senators and representatives in congress.

ADOPTED, January 24, 1866.

[W. Va.]

The suspension bridges across the Monongahela river at Fairmont and Morgantown, and any other such bridge in this state, and the Kanawha turnpike, are not intended to be included in this act.

Provided, that this act shall not apply to the Maryland and Virginia Bridge Company.

Whereas it will be greatly beneficial to the good peopple of this Commonwealth to improve the navigation of the James and Jackson's rivers, from tide water to the mouth of Dunlap's creek, by navigable canals and locks, where necessary; to make a convenient road from thence to the great falls of the Kanawha river; and to make the last mentioned river conveniently navigable from the great falls thereof to the river Ohio. And, whereas there is reason to believe that the James River Company is willing to consent to such modifications of their charters as will enable the said company, as an agent acting and holding in trust for the benefit of this Commonwealth, to undertake and carry the said improvements into effect, in such manner as the General Assembly shall, from time to time, direct and require; and, under the direction and superintendence of such agent or agents as may from time to time be appointed for that purpose; by appropriating to these objects such sums of money as they may borrow, under the authority and by the direction of the General Assembly, and upon such terms as may be prescribed by law from time to time; and that the said company will moreover consent to apply all their surplus tolls and income of every kind which may accrue after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty, from the works and property now belonging to them, or which they may hereafter acquire, to the payment of the interest on the money which they may so borrow, except only so much thereof, as may be necessary to defray the expenses of keeping their works now existing, or hereafter to be made, in complete repair, and all reasonable expenses necessary for collecting tolls, and managing all other affairs of the company; and, moreover, excepting so much of the said tolls and income as may be necessary to pay, in semi-annual instalments, a dividend upon the present stock of the said company, of twelve per centum per annum, for and during the term of twelve years from said first day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty, and fifteen per centum per annum from and after the expiration of the said term of twelve years, forever thereafter; and that the said company will account for the said surplus tolls and income of every kind, to the General Assembly, and pay the same, at the time or times, and in the manner which the General Assembly shall direct; but upon the further condition that the General Assembly shall provide for making good any deficiency in the payment of the interest on any money so borrowed, which may remain to be provided for, after applying the surplus tolls and other income of the said company, with the exceptions aforesaid, to the payment of interest, as aforesaid:

1. Be it therefore enacted, That, if the James River Company shall, on or before the fifteenth day of March next, assent to the provisions of this act, by a resolution to that effect, entered on their journals, and certify the same to the Governor of this Commonwealth, who shall forthwith make proclamation thereof, then this act shall immediately commence and be in force; and shall thereafter be considered a compact between this Commonwealth and the said company; subject, however, at all times, to such change and modification, as the legislature may think proper to make; Provided, That no such change or modification shall be made as will take from the James River Company their right to the dividends, or any part of the dividends upon their stock, allowed to them by this act; and that no such change or modification shall be made as will take from those who may have loaned money to the said company, under the faith of this act, the security hereby pledged to them for the payment of the interest thereon.

2. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of the assent of said company, as aforesaid, the said company shall, during the present year, so far as their funds, hereinafter provided for, will enable them, and without delay, proceed to the execution, and steadily persevere to the completion, of the following works, and in the following order, that is to say: First, to render the Great Kanawha, from the great falls thereof to the Ohio river, navigable at all seasons of the year for boats drawing three feet water, according to the plan of the principal engineer, in his report to the Board of Public Works, made in January, eighteen hundred and twenty. Secondly, to improve the navigation of James river, from tide water to Pleasant's Island, by locks and navagable canals, affording at all seasons of the year at least three feet depth of water from tide water to said island, and so as to navigate conveniently boats carrying one thousand bushels of coal at all points below the highest point at which coal lands on James river are now known; and above such coal lands, by a canal, not less than thirty feet wide at top, and twenty feet wide at bottom, having, at all seasons of the year, not less than three feet depth of water, in every part thereof, according to the said report of the principal engineer, and make safe and convenient communications from the river, at such point or points as will afford ample accommodation to the coal trade. Thirdly to make the best road practicable, at an expense of one hundred thousand dollars, from the mouth of Dunlap's creek, to the great falls of the Great Kanawha river, and to expend in the making of said road, in each of the two successive years, immediately following the completion of the aforesaid works, the sum of fifty thousand dollars; the said road to be made in the most direct practicable route, not to exceed in any part five degrees of declivity or acclivity, and to be made according to the suggestions of the said report of the principal engineer. Fourthly, to make navigable canals and locks from Pleasant's island to the mouth of Dunlap's creek, according to the suggestions of the 41 said report of the principal engineer, as nearly as may be. And fifthly, to make safe and convenient communications from the river, at such points as will afford ample accommodation to the trade on the river: the road aforesaid to be completed according to the provisions of the act, entitled, "An act prescribing certain general regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies," dispensing, however, with the summer roads required by the said act, except clearing the same of timber; and the winter road shall be improved, as required by the said act, at least twenty-two feet wide, except in difficult places, but in no place less than eighteen feet wide; and the said company shall constantly keep said road in good repair: Provided, however, That, if the sum of one hundred thousand dollars should be insufficient to improve the road in the manner described in this section, then such further sums shall from time to time be appropriated as will be adequate to that purpose. The improvements aforesaid, and all others, which may be prescribed by the legislature, shall, from time to time, be made under the superintendence of such commissioner or commissioners, agent or agents, as the General Assembly shall from time to time appoint.

2. And be it enacted, That, to enable the James River Company to open and complete the aforesaid road, and to keep the same constantly in good repair, which they are hereby required to do, they shall be entitled to avail themselves of all the provisions in favor of turnpike companies, which are to be found in the act, entitled, "an act prescribing certain general regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies," as well for the condemnation of lands as for other purposes.

3. And be it further enacted, That, to enable the said company to acquire sufficient lands for the abutments of dams and bridges, or canal, locks, toll-houses, houses for keepers of locks, and other necessary purposes, it shall be lawful for them to purchase in fee simple, of the proprietors of such lands, a quantity thereof not exceeding two acres, for each abutment of a dam or bridge; not exceeding two acres where any lock or locks may be necessary; not exceeding two acres where any toll-house may be necessary; and not exceeding one hundred and fifty feet wide the whole length of any canal which may be necessary; and, in case of such purchase or purchases, to contract for and acquire the right of establishing any machinery and working the same with the water from any canal or dam, so as not to impair the navigation by such use of water, and of again selling or leasing the same. And, in case the lands so necessary cannot be acquired by contract, that then the said company may proceed to have such necessary lands, according to the quantities aforesaid, or less at their discretion, condemned in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled, "An act prescribing certain general regulations for incorporating turnpike companies," for condemning land for the use of any turnpike road, changing the forms of proceedings as the nature of the case may require. And when damage may arise from the overflowing of the waters, occasioned by the works of said company, the same shall be assessed and paid in the same manner, varying the forms of the proceedings as the nature of the case may require. But, in case of such condemnation, the company shall only have the right of us- 42

ing the lands so acquired for the purpose of improving and for the convenient use of the navigation aforesaid, and the other purposes aforesaid, but may at any time thereafter acquire, by purchase, the right to use the same for machinery as aforesaid, or may at any time dispose of water power to the proprietor of the adjoining lands on such terms as they may agree upon, not endangering the navigation as aforesaid. And the said company shall have the right to enter on lands for laying out their canals, dams and other works, and in making examinations as to the best mode of improvement, in like manner as is allowed to turnpike companies by the act aforesaid. And if the said company should have occasion to carry materials for their works through the lands of others, or to deposit such materials on the lands of others, or to carry on any of their said works on such lands, and cannot contract with the proprietors of such lands for the privileges aforesaid, on reasonable terms, they may proceed to assess the value of such privileges, and acquire them as lands may be acquired as aforesaid, changing the forms of the proceedings as occasion may require. And in case any controversy shall arise in any county or other inferior court, in relation to the matters aforesaid, between the said company, their servants or agents, and others, the same shall be decided as soon as may be, having a due regard to justice, without regard to priority of other matters or suits upon the docket; and, in case of unreasonable delay herein in such court, such suit or controversy shall be removed by certiorari, in to the superior court having jurisdiction thereof, and there be speedily decided as aforesaid.

4. And be it enacted, That, so soon as the said works shall be completed in parts or sections, so as to be useful, the same shall forever thereafter be esteemed and taken as public highways for the transportation of all goods, commodities and produce whatsoever, upon the payment of such tolls as shall be prescribed by law; and the road, canals, locks, dams and other works, when perfected, with all tolls and other profits and emoluments arising therefrom, shall be, and the same are hereby vested in the said company as agents in trust for this Commonwealth, and shall be deemed real estate, transferable only on the books of the said company, by the proprietor or proprietors, his, her or their agent or agents, duly authorised, and shall be forever exempt from the payment of any tax, assessment or imposition whatsoever.

5. And be it enacted, That, so soon as the improvements for the navigation of the Kanawha river shall be completed as aforesaid, from Slaughter's creek to the Ohio river, the said company shall be entitled to demand and receive, upon boats and commodities passing the said river, tolls at the following rates, that is to say: On salt, two cents per bushel; on bacon, twelve and a half cents per hundred weight; on every barrel of cider or beer, twenty cents; on every cask of linseed or other oil, ten cents; on every bushel of wheat, peas, beans, flax or hemp seed, one cent and a half; on every bushel of indian corn, oats, potatoes or apples, one cent; on every barrel of pork or beef, ten cents; on every barrel of flour, six and a fourth cents; on every bushel of indian meal, one cent; on every bushel of dried fruit, two cents; on every ton of hemp, potash, bar or manufactured iron, one dollar; every ton of pig iron or castings, forty-five cents; every hundred bushels of lime, one dollar; every chaldron of 43 coal, twenty-five cents; every hundred barrel staves or heading, one cent; every hundred hoop poles, one cent; every hundred cubic feet of plank or scantling, three cents; every hundred cubic feet of other timber, six cents; every hundred hogshead or pipe staves, two cents; every empty barrel, one quarter of a cent; on whiskey, apple and peach brandy, or other domestic spirits, fifty cents per barrel; on rum, wine, gin and french brandy, or other foreign liquors, three cents per gallon; every hundred weight of all other commodities or packages whatsoever, thirty cents; on every boat or vessel other than canoes, not having commodities on board, yielding a toll of at least one dollar and fifty cents, one dollar and fifty cents; and every canoe, having commodities on board, the rate of toll herein-before prescribed: Provided, That an empty boat, canoe or other vessel, returning, whose load has already paid tolls, shall return toll-free. Which said tolls shall be paid at or near the Tyler shoals, as the tolls of the James River Company are now payable and collectable by law; and the said company shall have all the remedies for recovering said tolls, as they now have by law for collecting and recovering their present tolls.

6. And, so soon as the said company shall have opened and improved the road aforesaid in sections, such as are specified in the act aforesaid, by the gradual expenditure of the said sum of one hundred thousand dollars, they shall be authorised to collect and receive, in the manner prescribed by the said act, tolls on the said road, in sections, to the amount of one half the tolls authorised by the said act, in relation to turnpike roads: and so soon as the said road shall be completed, according to the provisions of the said act, with the exceptions aforesaid, in sections, the said company shall be entitled to receive and collect thereon, the full tolls authorised by the said act.

7. And, so soon as the said canals and other works shall be completed, from tide water, to the highest point on James river, where coal is now raised, the said company shall be entitled to receive a toll of two cents per bushel, on all coal passing the same, or any part thereof, in lieu of the toll which they are now entitled to receive on coal.

8. And the General Assembly hereby pledge themselves, that, as the works aforesaid on the James and Jackson's rivers, and in the vallies of these rivers, shall progress, and shall contribute to reduce the expense of transportation, up or down the said rivers or canals, below the average price of transportation upon the said rivers, as they have been for the three years last past, they will authorise the said company to receive tolls thereon, in convenient sections, to the amount necessary, (with their other resources specified in this act, as applicable to the payment of interest on money to be borrowed by them,) for the payment of the interest on the money expended in such work; provided, that such additional tolls shall not exceed one third of the saving in transportation up and down the said rivers, which will accrue thereby to those who use the said improvements, taking the average price of transportation for three years last past, as the basis of the estimates.

9. And be it enacted, That fourteen commissioners be ap- 44 pointed, residing in the counties bordering on the James river and Jackson's river, for the purpose of ascertaining the average price of transportation of the various commodities liable to toll, according to the terms of the charter of the James River Company, and all other commodities up and down the rivers aforesaid, for three years last past; that is to say, Daniel Warwick of the city of Richmond, William Trabue of Chesterfield, Tarlton Woodson of Goochland, Jacob Michaux of Powhatan, Francis B. Deane of Cumberland, John H. Cocke of Fluvanna, William J. Freeland of Buckingham, Robert Rives of Nelson, William Moon of Albemarle, John Horsley of Amherst, Richard Pollard of Campbell, Isaac Otey of Bedford, Robert White of Rockbridge, and James Cartmill of Botetourt. It shall be the duty of each commissioner, to enquire diligently and impartially, upon the oaths of such person or persons as may be well informed upon the subject, in their respective counties aforesaid, what has been the average price as aforesaid, of the transportation of all commodities up and down the said rivers, or otherwise, from and to Richmond, and from and to the principal landings and places of deposit on the said rivers, in the said counties respectively. And the said commissioner, in each of the said counties, shall forthwith return an account of such average prices ascertained as aforesaid, to the courts of the said counties respectively, to be there recorded, and shall moreover, return duplicates of said accounts to the president and directors of the James River Company, to be recorded and preserved. To each of which accounts and duplicates, the said commissioner shall make affidavit that has justly, diligently and impartially discharged the duties prescribed by this act, and that such account, or duplicate, is the result of these inquiries. The said commissioner shall proceed to the execution of the duties aforesaid, as soon as he shall be required by the James River Company; and, in case of a vacancy occurring from any cause, it shall be supplied by the court of the county in which it shall happen.

10. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the period at which the said company holding, as an agent, in trust for the benefit of the Commonwealth, shall give their assent as aforesaid to this act, they shall not be obliged to work on the bed of James river as heretofore, except so far as may be necessary to render the navigation from the upper locks to Lynchburg as easy and equal in every part as may be practicable; and the said company shall, at all times hereafter, keep the bed of the river, above the point to which any new improvement contemplated by this act shall be completed for use and connected with the river and below Crow's ferry, as good and convenient for navigation as it now is, and as it will be after the repairs aforesaid shall be made: all which repairs are to be contracted for and made by the company, from time to time, under the control, direction and superintendence of the commissioners, on the part of the Commonwealth, for superintending the works aforesaid on the James and Jackson's rivers hereafter mentioned, or of such other commissioner or commissioners, superintendent or superintendents, as the legislature may appoint; except so far as the said company shall undertake said repairs before they shall have received directions from the commissioners aforesaid. And, so soon as the said company shall have assented to the provisions of this act, the writ of quo warranto depending against them at the instance of the General Assembly shall be dismissed.

11. And be it enacted, That nine commissioners shall be annually appointed by joint ballot of the General Assembly, for superintending the works aforesaid on the Kanawha river, and the road aforesaid; who shall be denominated "the commissioners for the Kanawha river and road;" the acts of a majority of whom shall be in all cases obligatory. And nine commissioners shall be annually appointed, by joint ballot of the General Assembly on behalf of this Commonwealth, for superintending the works aforesaid, on the James and Jackson's rivers; the acts of a majority of whom shall be in all cases obligatory. No contract or contracts made by the James River Company for improving the navigation of the Kanawha river and road, shall be binding, or carried into effect, until the same shall be submitted to and approved in writing by the commissioners named to superintend the works on said river and road: and no contract or contracts made by the said company for making any of the improvements on the James or Jackson's rivers, shall be obligatory or carried into effect until the same shall be submitted to and approved, in writing, by the commissioners named to superintend the works on the last mentioned rivers, who shall be denominated "The Commissioners for the James and Jackson's Rivers." And the said company shall semi-annually lay before the last mentioned commissioners an account of their receipts and disbursements, to be by them examined, stated and settled, after comparing the same with the books and vouchers of the company, and be reported by them to the General Assembly and to the Board of Public Works: Provided, however, That the boards of commissioners, hereby appointed to superintend the Kanawha river and the road, and the James and Jackson's rivers, may from time to time, adopt such rules and regulations for the distribution of the powers and duties hereby assigned them, amongst the members thereof, as they may think proper.

12. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer of the state shall be ex-officio treasurer of the company, shall be liable, as such, to the same penalties and conditions, as he is, as treasurer of the Commonwealth, and shall give additional security, in the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, for his faithful discharge of the duties hereby imposed.

13. And, to the end that adequate funds may be provided for the purpose of completing the works aforesaid: Be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the James River Company, and they are hereby required to borrow, annually, after the fifteenth day of March next, from such individuals or corporate bodies, as may be disposed to lend, at an interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually, two hundred thousand dollars, or such greater or less sum as may be hereafter directed and authorised by law; and in such proportions, and at such periods of the year as the said company shall deem expedient, to be applied to the execution of the works and improvements aforesaid, or such other works and improvements as the General Assembly shall hereafter direct: which authority and obligation shall continue until it shall be otherwise directed by law. The said Company shall issue certificates, under their common seal, (which, for this and all other purposes they are hereby authorised to have and use,) for the money so borrowed, and register the 46 same; which certificate shall specify the sum borrowed, of whom borrowed, and to whom payable; the interest payable thereon; that the stipulated interest shall be paid semi-annually on the fifteenth day of July and the fifteenth day of January in each year; and that the principal sum so borrowed, shall be irredeemable for twenty years from and after the fifteenth day of March next, and, from and after the expiration of the said period of twenty years, to be redeemed only at the pleasure of the General Assembly. Each payment of interest shall made upon the production of the said certificates and not otherwise; and such payments shall be noted on the back of such certificate. Said certificates shall be transferable only on the books of the said company by the person or persons, or corporate bodies entitled thereto, or by their agents legally qualified for that purpose. The tolls and all other income of the said company, (after setting apart so much thereof as may be necessary to discharge all expenses of repairs, of the collection of tolls, and other necessary expenses of conducting the affairs of the said company; and also so much thereof as may be necessary to pay to the stockholders of said company, for twelve years next after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty, a dividend of twelve per centum per annum on their stock, in semi-annual payments, and for ever thereafter a dividend in like manner of fifteen per centum per annum,) shall be applied to the payment of the interest on money so borrowed; and the surplus of such tolls and other income, after the payment of the expenses, dividends and interest, as aforesaid, shall from time to time be paid into the treasury of this Commonwealth, to the credit of the fund for internal improvement, to be disposed of as may, from time to time, be directed by law. And, if, at any time, the said company shall fail or refuse, or the tolls and other income aforesaid, after making the deductions aforesaid, shall be insufficient to pay the interest due upon said certificates, upon demand, the holder of such certificate shall cause a protest to be made, by a notary public, stating such demand and refusal, and thereupon the president of the Board of Public Works shall, immediately upon the production of such certificate and protest, issue his order, countersigned by the secretary of said board, authorising the payment of such interest out of the income of the fund for internal improvement; and the auditor of public accounts shall thereupon issue his warrant upon the treasurer therefor, and endorse such payment upon the back of such certificate. And so much of the income of the fund for internal improvement as may be necessary for the payment of such interest, unpaid by the said company from time to time, is hereby pledged for that purpose in preference to any other object: Provided, nevertheless, that such pledge shall not exceed twelve thousand dollars per annum, to be taken from the income of said fund.

14. And be it further enacted, That, for all such payments made out of the income of the fund for internal improvement, before the works on the James river shall be completed from tide water to Lynchburg, the said company shall deliver to the president and directors of the Board of Public Works certificates of debt, as aforesaid, carrying interest at six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually: but the interest not to commence thereon until the works shall have been completed as aforesaid to Lynchburg. And for all 47 such payments made, after the works aforesaid shall have been completed to Lynchburg, like certificates shall be issued, and the interest thereon shall commence from and after the date when the whole of the works aforesaid, or such other as the General Assembly shall hereafter direct in lieu of any part of them, shall be completed.

15. And be it further enacted, That the surplus of the tolls and income of the company aforesaid, remaining after the payment of interest due upon the certificates of debt so issued from time to time by the said company, and paid into the treasury of this Commonwealth, as herein-before directed, shall, from time to time, be applied by the president and directors of the Board of Public Works, to the purchase of such of the certificates aforesaid of debt as can be purchased. And the interest accruing on the said certificates of debt, so purchased, shall also, from time to time, be invested as aforesaid; and the whole so purchased shall be held subject to be disposed of as the General Assembly shall from time to time direct.

CHAPTER 46.—An act to amend the act, entitled, "an act to amend the act for clearing and improving the navigation of James River, and for uniting the Eastern and Western Waters, by the James and Kanawha Rivers."

Whereas it is the opinion of this General Assembly, that the coal trade on the James river, and the salt trade on the Great Kanawha river, ought to be fostered and encouraged; and it being represented that the tolls to be received by the James River Company on those articles, when certain improvements in the navigation of those rivers shall have been made as provided for by the act, entitled, "an act to amend the act, entitled, an act for clearing and improving the navigation of James river, and for uniting the eastern and western waters, by the James and Kanawha rivers," may be found to be burthensome on both or one of those articles; and whereas it is expedient at this time to provide a remedy for such evil, should it, on experience, be found to arise;

1. Be it therefore enacted, That, until improvements contemplated by the above recited act, shall be completed, and the stock issued by the company for loans of money, shall be purchased in, as provided for by said act, or otherwise redeemed, the tolls on those 49 articles respectively, shall not be less than one cent per bushel; but that it shall be lawful for the said company, from time to time, as to them it may seem meet and expedient, and until it shall otherwise be regulated by law, to graduate the same respectively, by raising or lowering the said tolls, so that the same be not less than one, nor more than two cents per bushel.

2. The tolls on coal shall be receivable by the said company so soon as the trade in that article shall be facilitated, agreeably to the provisions of said act, should that happen before the improvements contemplated thereby shall have proceeded as high up the river as Pleasant's island.

And whereas it is represented, that many of the commissioners in and by the ninth section of the act above recited, have failed to perform the duties assigned to them in and by the said section; and whereas it is highly necessary that those duties should be promptly performed;

3. Be it further enacted, That the James River Company shall forthwith again require and notify the commissioners so failing, to proceed to execute the duties assigned to them as aforesaid; and that in case of the death, refusal, or inability to act, or continued failure of the said commissioners, or any of them, or of any commissioner or commissioners appointed in pursuance of this act, to perform the said duties, the said company are hereby empowered to appoint some other fit person or persons for that purpose, in the place of such commissioner or commissioners, so dead, refusing, unable, or failing to act, and who, being notified of his appointment, and not thereupon refusing to act, shall immediately proceed to perform the duties assigned to the commissioner, in and by the section above recited, whom he or they shall respectively be appointed to substitute as aforesaid.

4. Be it further enacted, That, instead of nine commissioners for superintending the works on Kanawha river and the road, as is provided by the eleventh section of the act above recited, there shall be five commissioners annually appointed, by joint ballot of both Houses of the General Assembly, for superintending the works contemplated by the said act, on the Kanawha; and that, in like manner there shall be appointed annually five commissioners for superintending the works on the road contemplated by said act; the acts of a majority of whom respectively, shall, in all cases, be binding; and no contract or contracts, made by the James River Company, for improving the navigation of the Kanawha river, or for making the road aforesaid, shall be binding, or carried into effect, until the same shall be submitted to and approved in writing by a majority of the commissioners appointed to superintend the works on the said river and road respectively.

5. Be it further enacted, That hereafter the James River Company shall semi-annually, to-wit; on the tenth day of July and tenth day of January in each year, lay an account of their receipts and disbursements before the treasurer of the state, the auditor of public accounts, and the clerk of the board of public works, instead of laying the same before the commissioners for the James and Jackson's rivers, as directed by the above recited act, to be by them, or a majority of them, examined, stated and settled, after comparing the same with the books and vouchers of the company, to be reported by them to the General Assembly, and to the board of public works.

6. And whereas it has been found inexpedient for the treasurer of the state to be treasurer of the said company: Be it further enacted, That the president and directors of the James River Company, shall, from time to time, appoint some fit person to act as their clerk and treasurer, who shall hold his said officers at the will and pleasure of the said president and directors, and receive such compensation for his services, so long as he continues in their employment, as they shall from time to time ordain and appoint. He shall take an oath before some justice of the peace, that he will truly and faithfully execute the said offices; and shall moreover enter into bond, with one or more good sureties, payable to the company, and conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of said offices, and the payment of all monies according to law, which may come to his hands as treasurer, so long as he continues in said offices; which bond shall be in the penalty of thirty thousand dollars. It shall be the duty of the said treasurer to make weekly settlements and payments into such bank or banks in the city of Richmond, as the president and directors shall direct, to the credit of the James River Company, of all tolls receivable at the city of Richmond, and shall in like manner pay into bank all other profits and revenue of the said company, so soon as the same shall be received by him, there to remain, subject only to such order or check as the president and directors, by a resolution or resolutions entered on their journals, shall, from time to time, make and direct.

7. And be it further enacted, That all monies borrowed by the company, by virtue of the above recited act, of this or any other act of Assembly, shall be paid by the lender or lenders thereof into such bank or banks within the United States, to the credit of the James River Company, as the president and directors may agree upon with the lender or lenders thereof; and, when such payment is made into a bank or banks, not within the city of Richmond, it shall be the duty of the president and directors, from time to time, to adopt such measures as to them shall seem most proper, by a resolution or resolutions for that purpose entered on their journals, to have the same drawn and deposited to the credit of the company, in such bank or banks in the city of Richmond, as they may direct, there to remain for the use of the company, and only to be drawn for that purpose by a resolution or resolutions of the president and directors, entered on their journals, authorising one or more of their body to check therefor, and which check or checks shall be accompanied by a copy of such resolution or resolutions, certified by their clerk to the cashier of the bank on which such checks shall be drawn.

8. And the more effectually to enable the James River Company to borrow money as directed by the thirteenth section of the act above recited, or as may be directed by this or any future act of Assembly; Be it further enacted, That, hereafter, the company shall borrow no money agreeably to the section above recited, except so far as they shall be expressly authorised by act of Assembly fixing the amount so to be borrowed; and that each lender shall have a prior lien on the funds provided, or which may be provided, for the pay-

lien may be fixed and preserved, it shall be the duty of the James River Company to number, and register the number, as well as the date, of each certificate of stock; and that no two certificates shall bear the same number; and the date and number shall be preserved on any duplicate of any certificate, which, by reason of a sale and transfer, or otherwise, it may be proper for them to give: and it shall moreover be their duty so to provide that the funds aforesaid shall be applied to the payment of the interest, as the same shall become payable on each certificate of stock, agreeably to its date and number; and that the certificate issued to the president and directors of the literary fund, be number one. And, for the further security and satisfaction of lenders, and as evidence to them of the ability of the company to pay the interest on loans which may be authorised by law, the faith of the state is hereby pledged, that no loan will be authorised by law unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of the legislature, from the annual reports of the accounts and proceedings of the company, that their revenue, applicable to the payment of interest, together with the appropriation made for that purpose out of the fund for internal improvement, is sufficient, not only to pay the interest on loans theretofore authorised, but on each loan as the same shall be authorised; and, in case of any deficiency of funds for that purpose, it shall be the duty of the company to pay such deficiency out of any money in hand, or to borrow money for that purpose.

9. Be it further enacted, That, instead of limiting the sum to be drawn from the fund for internal improvement to twelve thousand dollars per annum, as is provided by the thirteenth section of the act aforesaid, that fund shall stand pledged, as is provided in and by the said section, for the payment of any interest which the surplus fund of the company, applicable to the payment of interest, shall be insufficient to pay; provided, the same shall not exceed the sum of eighteen thousand dollars per annum. And, to avoid expense and embarrassment to lenders by the protest made necessary in and by the said section before they can receive the interest due and payable out of the fund aforesaid, the president and directors of the company are hereby authorised to draw an order or orders on the auditor, for a warrant or warrants on the treasury, for any interest payable out of that fund, after the proper funds of the company for that purpose shall be exhausted.

10. And be it further enacted, That, if that part of the fund for internal improvement appropriated to the payment of interest, or any part of it, has not been, or shall not be drawn for the payment of interest in any one year, that the same shall be set apart, from time to time, in like manner with the other surpluses of the company, to be applied to the purchasing the certificates of loan of the company as is directed in and by the said act.

11. And be it further enacted, That the said company be authorised, as they are hereby authorised, to proceed to borrow, agreeably to the provisions of this and the above recited act, at such times and in such proportions as they may deem expedient, a sum, not exceeding in the whole three hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of the fifty thousand dollars already borrowed from the literary fund; and that the bank of Virginia and Farmers' bank of Virginia, be authorised 52 to loan money to the company, or to deal in the certificates of loan of the company, as far as the president and directors of those banks, respectively, may think proper.

12. And, whereas the urgent necessities of the country require as prompt an execution of the improvements contemplated by the act above recited, as is practicable, whilst at the same time their economical prosecution will be greatly advanced by contracts amounting in the aggregate to a large sum; which contracts, however, cannot be made, with a proper regard to punctuality and good faith on the part of the company, unless they have the certain command of money to the amount of such contracts: Be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the president and directors to employ such agents for negotiating loans, and to give them such compensation therefor, as they may from time to time deem most economical and expedient; and should large sums be borrowed, which would necessarily lie idle until wanted for the payment of contracts, whereby great loss of interest would accrue, the president and directors are furthermore empowered to invest said funds, until wanted, in such secure and productive stock as they may think proper and expedient, and again to sell the same when their necessities may require, and carry the whole proceeds of the interest on, and the amount of sales of, such stock, to the account of monies loaned, to be placed in bank as aforesaid, and applied to the improvements aforesaid.

13. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners for superintending the works on the James and Jackson's rivers, on the Kanawha river and the road, shall receive three dollars per day, for every day they shall severally be employed in the discharge of the duties assigned them by said act; to be paid by the James River Company, on a certificate from a board of said commissioners, respectively.

14. This act shall commence and be in force from the passage thereof.

CHAPTER 45.— An act making more effectual provision to carry into effect, the act, entitled "an act, to amend the act, entitled 'an act, for clearing and improving the navigation of James river, and for uniting the eastern and western waters, by the James and Kanawha rivers, and for other purposes."

Whereas, by an act passed on the 17th day of February one thousand eight hundred and twenty, entitled "an act to amend the act, entitled 'an act, for clearing and improving the navigation of James river, and for uniting the eastern and western waters by the James and Kanawha rivers," the James river company were directed to effect a canal navigation from the tide water of James river, to the mouth of Dunlap's creek; to make a road from thence to the great falls of the great Kanawha river, and to render the latter river navigable from the great falls to the river Ohio; and the present General Assembly, being fully sensible of the great interest which the good people of this commonwealth have in the success of the said objects, deem it necessary to adopt a more effectual mode to give them effect, than that heretofore provided,

1. Be it therefore enacted, That from and after the commencement of this act all the powers and duties of the existing president and directors of the James river company, except as hereinafter provided, shall be superseded and annulled, and thereafter no other election of president and directors shall be made in the manner now provided by law; but the governor, lieutenant governor, treasurer and auditor of commonwealth for the time being, and the second auditor, whose office is created by this act, and their successors in office, shall be ex-officio the president and directors of the said company; of whom the governor shall be president; and the said governor, lieutenant governor, treasurer, auditor and second auditor, from the time aforesaid, as president and directors of the said company, shall succeed to and possess all the rights, powers, duties and privileges of the existing president and directors, except so far as may be otherwise provided by this act. A board for the transaction of the business of the said company shall be constituted by any three, or more of the said officers. In the absence of the governor from the board, the lieutenant governor shall be president pro tempore; and in the absence of both, the treasurer shall preside.

2. And be it further enacted, That there be appointed annually, by joint ballot of both houses of the General Assembly, an officer to be denominated the second auditor, whose duty it shall be to keep distinct accounts of the receipts and disbursements of the Literary Fund, of the fund for internal improvement, and of the fund constituted to effect the purposes of the act, the title of which is recited in the preamble to this act. He shall draw all warrants authorising the treasurer to receive monies on account of any of the fund before mentioned, after the amount shall have been adjusted by the other auditor, when by law, he is authorised to adjust the same, and audit all claims properly chargeable on them, and issue warrants to the persons entitled thereto. He shall act, ex-officio, as accountant of the Literary Fund, as clerk of the president and directors thereof, and as secretary of the Board of Public Works; and the powers and duties of the persons holding those offices, respectively, shall thenceforth cease. And the said second auditor is hereby authorised to 51 appoint a clerk should the board of directors hereby established deem one necessary, to aid him in the discharge of his duties. All books and papers in any manner connected with the constitution, administration or regulation of the funds herein before mentioned, shall be deposited with the said second auditor, who shall carefully preserve them.

3. All monies belonging to any of the funds herein before mentioned, shall be kept in the public treasury, separate from other public monies; and regular and distinct accounts shall be kept of the receipts and disbursements, and a report thereof annually made by the treasurer to the General Assembly, on or before the fifth day of its session.

4. It shall be the duty of the James river company, forthwith, to pay into the public treasury any money which may remain in their hands, whether the same has been received from loans, tolls, rents, or otherwise; and they shall file with the second auditor, an account of their receipts and disbursements since the commencement of the act herein-before mentioned, which he shall carefully preserve: And all monies hereafter accruing to the said company, whether for tolls, rents, loans, or otherwise, shall be accounted for, by the several collectors and other agents, with the second auditor, and paid upon his warrant into the treasury: Provided, however, That if existing engagements with any toll gatherer, collector, or other agent, shall require the money falling into his hands to be otherwise accounted for and paid, it shall accordingly be accounted for and paid pursuant to such engagement; and the person receiving it shall, without delay, account for it with the second auditor, and pay it into the treasury, as above prescribed.

5. Be it further enacted, That the president and directors of the James river company shall, without delay, proceed to borrow, from time to time, as they may deem it prudent, at an interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, so much of the three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which they have been heretofore authorised by law to borrow, as has not yet been borrowed; and if the president and directors should find it necessary to the completion of the three first sections of the work described in the second section of the act recited in the preamble to this act, that is to say, to render the Great Kanawha navigable from the falls to the Ohio; to improve the navigation of James river from tide water to Pleasant's island; and to make the road from the mouth of Dunlap's creek to the Great Falls of Kanawha, together with the bridges provided for by this act; then, and in that case only, they are hereby authorised and required to borrow an additional sum not exceeding eighty thousand dollars. And to enable them the more readily to procure the said loans, they are hereby authorised and required, to cause all the monies, which shall be so loaned to them, to be paid into the public treasury, by the lender, on the warrant of the second auditor; and, upon the payment of each sum so loaned, the treasurer shall issue a certificate of stock for the amount thereof, purporting that the commonwealth owes to such lender, his executors, administrators or assigns, the sum loaned, together with interest thereon, at the rate agreed upon, not exceeding six per centum as aforesaid, and payable semi-annually, at the treasury of the commonwealth, computing the time from the date of the certifi- 52 cate. Such certificate shall also shew, on its face, that the loan was made by authority of this act; that the principal sum loaned is irredeemable for twenty years; and afterwards to be redeemed at the pleasure of the General Assembly. It shall be signed by the treasurer, countersigned by the second auditor, and registered in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, and shall then be delivered to the lender, or his agent. Every such certificate of stock shall be transferrable on the books of the second auditor; and the semi-annual interest thereon shall be paid upon his warrant. The certificates of stock for monies heretofore borrowed by the James river company, may be produced by the owners to the second auditor; and shall thereupon be registered by him in a book to be kept for that purpose; and at all times afterwards, they shall be transferable on the books of the said auditor. The interest falling due on such certificates, after they shall have been so registered, shall be paid at the treasury, on the warrant of the second auditor, without the re-production of the certificate; and the interest, falling due on them before such registry, shall be paid at the treasury, on the warrant of the second auditor, to be granted on the production of the certificate. The tolls collected on James river since the fifteenth day of March, eighteen hundred and twenty, and those which may hereafter be collected, the nett proceeds of the tolls to be collected on the Great Kanawha river, and from the road and bridges, all water rents, and rents of land, to which the James river company is or shall be entitled, together with the annual sum of eighteen thousand dollars to be paid out of the revenue of the fund for internal improvement, are hereby pledged as a fund for the payment of the dividends to the stockholders of the James river company, and the payment of the interest on the loans heretofore made to said company pursuant to law, and hereafter to be made pursuant to this act; and no part of the said fund shall be diverted to any other purpose: And the General Assembly, moreover, pledge themselves, that they will from time to time, provide such other revenues as shall be necessary, to pay the interest on any loan authorised by law, to carry into effect the improvements mentioned in this act.

6. Nothing in this act shall be in any wise construed, so as to take away, or in any manner impair, the security or preference pledged to those who have heretofore loaned money, by authority of law, to the James river company.

7. Be it further enacted, That deeds for the transfer of any share or shares of the stock of the James river company, held by any person, body politic or corporate, executed in the manner prescribed by law for the conveyance of real estate, attested and proved by two witnesses, or certified by justices of the peace, in the manner prescribed for the authentication of deeds for real estate, and registered in the office of the second auditor, in a book to be kept by him for that purpose; also, devises of such share or shares, duly executed, proved and recorded, in some court within this commonwealth, certified and registered in the second auditor's office, in the manner aforesaid, shall be sufficient to entitle the transferree or devisee, to the dividends on such shares.

8. The dividends due, or to fall due, to the owners of the shares of the stock of said company, shall be paid at the treas- 53 ury, on the warrant of the second auditor.

9. Be it enacted, That an officer be appointed annually by joint ballot of both houses of the General Assembly, to be denominated the commissioner of the James and Jackson's river canal, whose duty it shall be to execute the provisions of the said act, so far as respects the construction of locks, navigable canals, and other necessary works, from tide-water to the mouth of Dunlap's creek, in the manner directed by the said act, and according to its true intent and meaning: and all the powers and rights heretofore vested by law in the James river company for the purposes aforesaid, and within the limits aforesaid, are hereby vested in such commissioner; and it shall, moreover, be the duty of the said commissioner to keep the bed of the river in a good and convenient state for navigation, between Crow's ferry and the point to which any new improvement shall be completed for use, and connected with the river.

10. Before the said commissioner shall proceed to the execution of his office, he shall enter into bond with one or more good and sufficient securities, in the penal sum of forty thousand dollars payable to the James River company, conditioned that he will, faithfully and honestly and to the best of his abilities, perform the duties of his said office, according to the laws now in force, and such as may be passed by the General Assembly, from time to time; and he shall, moreover, take an oath or make affirmation, that he will faithfully and honestly, and to the best of his abilities, perform the duties required of him by law; that he will not directly or indirectly be concerned or interested in any contract, which may be made with him or any person on his behalf, for any labor, material or other thing necessary for the prosecution of the said works; and every contract, made in violation of such oath, shall be utterly void. If said commissioner shall either directly or indirectly be concerned or interested in any contract, in violation of this act, it shall be deemed and taken to be a breach of the condition of the bond herein required to be executed by him, and judgment shall be entered against such commissioner and his securities, for a sum, not less than the amount of said contract, nor more than twice the amount of said contract, at the discretion of the jury.

11. Be it further enacted, That there be appointed, in manner before-mentioned, another officer, to be denominated the commissioner of the Kanawha road and navigation; whose duty it shall be to carry into effect such of the provisions of the act herein-before-mentioned, as direct the constructing and completing a road from the mouth of Dunlap's creek, to the great falls of the great Kanawha river, and that the latter river shall be rendered navigable from thence to the river Ohio, according to the true intent and meaning of said act; and all the powers and rights heretofore vested by law in the James river company, for the purposes aforesaid, and within the limits aforesaid, are hereby vested in the said commissioner.

12. Before the last mentioned commissioner shall be authorised to execute the duties of his office, he shall enter into like bond, and take like oath or affirmation, with that directed above, in relation to the commissioner of the James and Jackson's river canal; and the said commissioner of the Kanawha road and navigation, with his securities, and the contracts made by him, shall be subject to the like rules and regulations, liabilities and recoveries, as are prescribed above in relation to the commissioner of the James and Jackson's river canal, his securities and contracts. The bonds executed by the commissioners aforesaid, and the certificate of their oath of office, which may be administered by any justice of the peace, shall be filed with the second auditor, before they shall, respectively, be authorised to enter upon the duties of their office.

13. Be it further enacted, That the said commissioners shall 54 give their constant attendance in directing and superintending the respective improvements necessary for the promotion and final accomplishment of the objects contemplated by the act herein-before-mentioned, and respectively confided to them. Each commissioner shall appoint such engineers, managers or agents, as he may think necessary, who shall be under his control, and removable at his pleasure: Provided, That the engineer appointed by the Board of Public Works, shall, whenever, upon the application of said commissioners, he shall be directed by the ex-officio members of said board, attend the commissioners of the James and Jackson's river canal, and of the Kanawha road and navigation, when previous engagements of the engineer on subjects of greater importance, do not interfere. The said commissioners shall, each respectively, on behalf and in the name of the James river company, make such contracts for labor, materials, and other thing necessary in the prosecution of the work in their several precincts, as each of them may deem expedient. And a copy of every contract shall be immediately transmitted by the commissioner making the same, to the second auditor, to be carefully filed and preserved; and all reports of engineers, or estimates of work, shall in like manner be transmitted by the commissioners, and filed and preserved.

14. All monies which may become due to any person or persons, by virtue of any contract, made with either of the said commissioners, by virtue of this act, shall be paid by the treasurer out of the fund provided for the improvement of James river, on a warrant from the second auditor, which shall be issued on the order of the commissioner who authorised the contract; in which order, the consideration on which it is founded, shall be expressly stated: Provided, however, That no warrant shall be drawn by the second auditor, on any such order of the commissioner, unless the contract on which it is founded shall be filed with the said auditor, and shall appear to justify it. And, in order to prevent, as far as possible, any failure in the payment of any such sum of money, the said commissioners, respectively, shall, from time to time, ascertain the state of the disposable funds in the hands of the treasurer, and regulate themselves accordingly in making contracts.

15. Every contract made by the James river company, with any person or persons, relating to, or connected with, the purposes of the act herein-before-mentioned, shall be as valid as if the powers of the said company had continued. And the said commissioners, respectively, shall carry the same into effect as the said company could, or ought to have done; and all claims for money which have heretofore accrued, for services, labour, materials, or other 55 thing, shall be settled and audited by the second auditor, and he shall grant warrants for such sums as may appear to be justly due. As to all monies falling due on or before the first day of May next, upon contracts now existing, made by the James river company, or under their authority, they shall be adjusted and settled under the authority of the president and directors of said company, now in office; and warrants shall be granted by the second auditor for the amount due, upon the certificate of said president and directors: Provided, Such settlement be made or or before the first day of May. But, if such settlement be not made on or before that time, then the claims shall be settled and adjusted, by the respective commissioners aforesaid, and the warrants granted upon their certificates. All superintendents, agents, and other officers appointed by the James river company, shall continue in office, pursuant to their appointments, till they shall be superseded, by appointments under this act, or their offices annulled by the provisions thereof.

16. The said commissioners shall, each, respectively, before the fifteenth day of every session, make full and detailed reports of their transactions, to the General Assembly, stating at length the expenses incurred by their contracts, or otherwise, and the progress of the work, and any other material matter that they may deem proper.

And whereas, it is represented, that it may be necessary to erect bridges over the Greenbrier river, and also over New river or Gauley river:

17. Be it therefore enacted, That the commissioners of the Kanawha road and navigation, shall have power to erect such bridges, if the same shall be found to be practicable at a reasonable expense; and, when completed, that he cause to be collected such tolls as may be reasonable, to be revised or altered by the legislature, as they may think necessary. And it shall be the duty of the said commissioner to transmit a list of the tolls to the General Assembly, at its next succeeding session; and likewise cause a list of said tolls to be recorded in the county where the bridge or bridges may be situate.

18. And be it further enacted, That the said last mentioned commissioner shall be, and he is hereby invested with full power and authority to collect the tolls directed to be collected by the act aforesaid, on the river Kanawha, and the road between the mouth of Dunlap's creek and the great falls of the Great Kanawha river; and, to this end, all the rights and powers vested by the law in the James river company, are hereby vested in the said commissioner; and payment for tolls to be imposed for passing the bridges, may be enforced in the same manner, and under the same regulations, as tolls on turnpike roads are collected and enforced.

19. Before the said commissioner shall have power to proceed to the collection of any of the said tolls, he shall execute a separate bond, with good and sufficient security, in the penalty of forty thousand dollars, payable to the James river company; conditioned, that he will make due returns of all tolls; well and truly account for all monies which may come into his hands by virtue of this act, and regularly pay the same into the treasury, at the end of ev- 56
ery six months, commencing from the date of the bond; and if he shall fail to make such returns regularly at the end of every six months, or within twenty days thereafter, it shall and may be lawful for the general court, on the motion of the second auditor, on behalf of the James river company, to enter up judgment against the said commissioner, and his securities, for a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, and costs; and such motion and judgment may be repeated until a compliance with the provisions of this act shall be enforced: Provided, nevertheless, That the general court, at their succeeding term, shall have power to open such judgment, if it shall appear to them that the failure complained of was owing to circumstances which justified or extenuated it, and that the commissioner had not a fair opportunity to make them known, at the term when the judgment was rendered against him; and the court may thereupon give such judgment as to the penalty, as the very right of the case may require.

20. Be it further enacted, That if from any semi-annual return herein-before directed, it shall appear that there is any sum of money in the hands of such commissioner, and he shall fail to pay the same within twenty days after the period, up to which such return has relation, it shall be lawful for the general court, on the motion of the second auditor, on behalf of the James river company, to render judgment for the amount so appearing to be due, with interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum, from the time such return closed, and costs: Provided nevertheless, that nothing in this act contained shall be so construed, as to prevent the said commissioner, from discharging any proper claim which ought to be paid according to the provisions of this act, out of any monies in his hands; but that, on furnishing proper vouchers, he shall be entitled to a credit for the sums so disbursed.

21. Be it further enacted, That so much of the act herein-before mentioned, or any other act, as provides for the appointment of ten commissioners, denominated, "the commissioners for the Kanawha river and road," and for the appointment of nine other commissioners, denominated, "the commissioners for the James and Jackson's rivers," be, and the same is hereby repealed: and all the power and authority of the said commissioners shall henceforth cease and determine.

22. Be it further enacted, That, whenever it shall become necessary to subject the lands of individuals to the purposes provided for in the said act, and the consent of the proprietor cannot be obtained, it shall and may be lawful for the said commissioners, within their respective precincts, to enter upon such lands, and proceed to the execution of such works as may be requisite; and that the pendency of any proceedings, in any suit of the nature of a writ of ad quod damnum, or any other proceedings, shall not hinder or delay the progress of the work: and no order shall be made, or injunction awarded, by any court, by which the progress of the work shall be arrested; it being the true intent and meaning of this act, that all lands shall be liable to condemnation, and that the proprietor shall be compensated, in damages. And it shall be the duty of every court to give precedence to controversies which are now pending, or which hereafter may arise, relative to the condemnation of land for any public purpose whatever, and to determine them in preference to all other causes; and no abatement or dismission of any 57 cause now depending, shall take place, by reason of any thing contained in this act.

23. Be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the commissioner of the James and Jackson's river canal, to subject to condemnation any land which may be necessary for the purpose of erecting dams for feeders, or any land through which feeders may be conducted, and for the purpose of establishing reservoirs, in the same manner as lands are authorised to be subjected by law for the canal.

24. And be it further enacted, That, in any future assessment of damages, on behalf of any proprietor of land through which the canal or feeder may be conducted, no compensation for any fencing to separate the land condemned for the use of the James river company from his other lands, shall be allowed; nor shall any compensation be made to any such proprietor for any bridge or bridges over such canal or feeder, but such bridges, and such additional fencing, as shall have become necessary, by reason of such canal or feeder, shall be constructed by the commissioner of the James and Jackson's river canal, wherever he may deem them necessary; the expense of which shall be paid out of the fund provided to make the improvement on James river. If any proprietor of the lands through which the canal or any feeder may be conducted, shall believe a greater number of bridges, or bridges of a different kind, or other fencing, required for the use of his lands, than the said commissioner may deem necessary, or that they should be constructed at a different place or places from those fixed upon by the said commissioner, such proprietor, upon application to the clerk of the superior court of law for the county in which said lands lie, may obtain from said clerk a writ in nature of a writ of ad quod damnum, directed to the sheriff of said county, requiring him to summon a jury of twenty-four inhabitants of his county, being freeholders, not related to said proprietor, or commissioner, nor in any way interested, to meet on the lands through which the canal or feeder may be conducted, on a day to be expressed in the writ, not less than twenty, nor more than thirty days thereafter; and the sheriff, on receiving said writ, shall forthwith summon the jury; and, when met, shall administer to every juryman who shall appear, not being fewer than twelve in number, an oath or affirmation, that he will faithfully, justly, and impartially, determine the matters submitted to him, according to the true meaning and intent of this act, to the best of his skill and judgment; and, thereupon, the said jury shall proceed to determine how many bridges, of what description, and what fencing, may be reasonably necessary to the aforesaid proprietor, for the use of said lands, and at what places on said canal, or feeder, they should be constructed, and report, in writing, their finding on these subjects; which report shall be signed by the sheriff, and some twelve or more of the jury, and returned by the sheriff, within ten days after the execution of said writ, to the clerk of said superior court: Provided, however, That ten days previous notice be given to said commissioner of the time and place of executing said writ; and, at the next term after the return of said report, the said court, from the finding of the jury, as well as from other evidence, shall decide whether the number of bridges, their description, and the fencing, fixed by the jury, or any greater or less number, or any other kind, or any other fencing, 58 be necessary to the proprietor, for the use of his lands; and whether the place or places fixed upon by the jury for the construction of such bridge, or bridges, or fencing, be proper; and may make such other order, touching the subject, as shall seem just and right; and the said commissioner shall cause a bridge, or bridges, and fencing, to be constructed, according to the judgment of the court; the expense of which shall be paid out of the funds provided for the improvement on James river. All bridges and fencing, to be constructed according to the provisions of this act, shall, at all times, be kept in good repair by the commissioner of the James and Jackson's river canal; and the expense thereof paid out of the tolls collected on James river.

25. And be it further enacted, That the second auditor shall receive annually the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, and the clerk he may employ, the sum of seven hundred dollars, to be paid quarterly; one third out of the revenues of the Literary Fund; one third out of the revenues of the fund for internal improvement; and one third out of the fund provided to make the improvements contemplated by this act.

26. The commissioner of the James and Jackson's river canal, shall receive two thousand five hundred dollars per annum; and the commissioner of the Kanawha road and navigation, fifteen hundred dollars per annum; to be paid quarterly out of the fund provided to effect the works which they are respectively to superintend; and the persons employed by them under the authority of this act, shall be paid such compensation for their services as the said commissioners, respectively, may certify them to be worth, according to the contract made with them, to be paid as other claims arising under this act are directed to be paid.

27. Be it further enacted, That, in case of the death, resignation or inability to act, of the second auditor, or of either of the commissioners appointed under this act, the executive shall have power to fill such vacancy; and the person or persons so appointed, shall continue in office till the end of the next session of the legislature.

28. Be it further enacted, That the second auditor shall, after his election, and before entering upon the discharge of the duties prescribed by this act, enter into bond with sufficient security, to be judged of by the executive of this commonwealth, payable to the governor thereof, in the penalty of twenty thousand dollars, conditioned for the faithful discharge of all the duties created by this act.

29. This act shall be in force from the passing thereof.

CHAPTER 9.—An act authorising a loan for the purposes of internal improvement.

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That the president and directors of the James River company be, and they are hereby empowered, as soon as may be necessary for the purposes herein declared, to borrow, on the credit of this State, a sum of money not exceeding four hundred thousand dollars, and at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum. The monies so to be borrowed shall be paid into the treasury upon the warrant of the second auditor; and, upon the receipt in the treasury of the sums so borrowed, the treasurer shall issue a certificate of stock for the amount thereof, purporting that the Commonwealth of Virginia owes to the lender, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, the sum loaned, together with the interest, at the rate of interest agreed on; and that the interest is payable semi-annually at the treasury of the Commonwealth. Such certificate shall shew, on the face thereof, that the loan was made under the authority of this act. It shall be signed by the treasurer and countersigned by the second auditor, and registered in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, and be then delivered to the lender or his agent. Every such certificate of stock shall be transferable on the books of the second auditor, and the semi-annual interest thereon shall be paid on his warrant. The principal sum authorised to be borrowed by this act is hereby declared to be irredeemable for twenty years; but shall be afterwards redeemed, at the pleasure of the General Assembly, within a period not exceeding fifteen years.

2. And be it further enacted, That, for the payment of the interest and the final redemption of the principal of the sums to be borrowed under authority of this act, there shall be, and hereby are appropriated and pledged the sum of eighteen thousand dollars, out of the income of the fund for internal improvement, the surplus tolls and rents of water-rights belonging to the James River company, and the nett proceeds arising from the canal and the tolls on the Kanawha road and river, when completed; also, the surplus fund belonging to the said company arising from the unexpended balances 13 of the appropriation of eighteen thousand dollars of the revenue of the fund for internal improvement. And if the foreging appropriations should be inadequate to the payment of the interest authorised to be borrowed by this act, and for the final redemption of the principal, the General Assembly pledges itself to provide other and sufficient funds for that purpose. Until such other sufficient funds shall be provided by law, so much of the revenue of the fund for internal improvement, as may be necessary to supply the deficiency, is hereby pledged for that purpose.

3. Be it further enacted, That the monies directed to be borrowed by this act, shall be appropriated towards completing the works commenced on the Kanawha road and river, in the manner prescribed by law, and to completing the James and Jackson's River canal and the works thereon to Maiden's Adventure falls, and to the making and constructing of a canal, along the margin of James River, from the lower end of Irish falls in the county of Amherst, to the mouth of the North river in the county of Rockbridge; and, so soon as the commissioner of the Kanawha road and navigation can, consistently with his present duties, he shall proceed to construct the canal from the lower end of Irish falls along the margin of James River, through the Blue Ridge, to the mouth of the North river, in all respects as is now required by law, except, that the said canal shall not be more than thirty feet wide at the top, nor more than twenty feet wide at the bottom.

CHAPTER 46.—An act making further provision to carry into effect the act, entitled "an act, for clearing and improving the navigation of James river, and for uniting the eastern and western waters, by the James and Kanawha rivers, and for other purposes."

[Passed February 16th, 1825.]

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That the president and directors of the James River Company be, and they are hereby empowered, as soon as may be necessary for the purposes herein declared, to borrow, on the credit of the State, a sum of money not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars, and at a rate of interest not exceeding six per centum per annum. The monies so to be borrowed, shall be paid into the treasury upon the warrant of the second Auditor; and upon the receipt in the treasury of the sums so borrowed, the treasurer shall issue a certificate of stock for the amount thereof, purporting that the Commonwealth of Virginia owes to the lender, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum loaned, together with the interest, at the rate of interest agreed on; and, that the interest is payable semi-annually, at the treasury of the Commonwealth. Such certificate shall shew, on the face thereof, that the loan was made under the authority of this act. I shall be signed by the treasurer, and counter-signed by the second Auditor, and registered in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, and be then delivered to the lender or his agent. Every such certificate of stock shall be transferrable on the books of the second Auditor; and the semi-annual interest thereon shall be paid on his warrant. The principal sum authorised to be borrowed by this act, is hereby declared to be irredeemable for twenty years, but shall afterwards be redeemed at the pleasure of the General Assembly.

2. Be it further enacted, That, for the payment of the interest and final redemption of the principal of the sums to be borrowed under authority of this act, the same pledges and appropriations are hereby made and given, as are contained in the second section of the act entitled, "an act authorising a loan for the purpoess of internal improvement," passed the eighth day of March, eighteen hundred and twenty-four.

3. Be it further enacted, That the money directed to be borrowed by this act, and the unexpended balance of the loan authorised by the act of the eighth of March last, shall be appropriated towards completing the works commenced on the Kanawha river and road, and to the extending the same road in the manner prescribed by law, and to completing the James and Jackson's river canal, and the works thereon to Maiden's Adventure Falls, and to the completing the canal now constructing along the margin of James river, from the lower end of Irish falls in the county of Bedford, to the mouth of the North river, in the county of Rockbridge. 39

4. Be it further enacted, That, if the commissioner of the Kanawha road and navigation, can, without loss to this Commonwealth, and without paying any compensation to the contractor, beyond the value of the work which he may have executed, procure an abandonment of the contract now existing, for the improvement of so much of the Kanawha river as lies between the town of Charlestown and the Great Falls of the same river, he shall then have full power and authority, and he is hereby required to extend the turnpike road, now constructing under his superintendence, from the said Great Falls, to the lower end of the salt works in the county of Kanawha, and shall pretermit any further improvement in the navigation of the river, above the town of Charlestown.

5. Be it further enacted, That the said road shall be laid out and located by the said commissioner, upon the best ground, to be selected by him, between the two points in this act mentioned the road aforesaid, to be completed according to the provisions of the "act to amend the act entitled, 'an act for clearing and improving the navigation of James river, and for uniting the eastern and western waters by the James and Kanawha rivers;'" reducing, however, the width of the summer road to eleven feet, and in difficult places, dispensing entirely with such summer roads: Provided, That the county court of Kanawha shall finish the bridge contemplated, across Campbell's creek in said county, and shall keep the same in good repair at the county charge.

6. Be it further enacted, That so soon as the said road shall be completed, it shall and may be lawful for the president and directors of the James River Company, and they are hereby required, to erect a toll-gate, at such places on said rivers as to them may seem proper, with such reasonable tolls as will pay to the said company, at least six per centum per annum, upon the sum of money which may be expended in constructing said road.

7. Be it further enacted, That to enable the James River Company to open and complete the aforesaid road, and to keep the same constantly in good repair, which they are hereby required to do, they shall be entitled to avail themselves of all the provisions which have been made by law for the opening and constructing the great road from Dunlap's creek to the falls of the Great Kanawha, as well for the condemnation of lands as for other purposes.

The sum so to be borrowed, shall be paid into the treasury, upon the warrant of the second auditor; and upon the receipt into the treasury of the sum so borrowed, the treasurer shall issue his certificate of stock for the amount thereof, purporting that the Commonwealth of Virginia owes to the lender, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, the sum loaned, together with the interest, at the rate of interest agreed on, and that the interest is payable semi-annually at the treasury of the Commonwealth. Such certificate shall shew on the face thereof, that the loan was made under the authority of this act. It shall be signed by the treasurer, and countersigned by the second auditor, and registered in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, and be then delivered to the lender or his agent. Every such certificate of stock shall be transferable on the books of the second auditor, and the semi-annual interest thereon, shall be paid on his warrant. redemption of the principal of the sum now proposed to be borrowed, and that already expended on the said works, the General Assembly pledges itself to find other and sufficient funds, and until such other and sufficient funds be furnished, the revenues of the fund for internal improvement, are hereby pledged and appropriated. (a)

3. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors of the Literary Fund, shall invest the uninvested capital belonging to that fund, in the stock authorised by this act. And that each certificate of stock issued in pursuance of this act, shall have on its face a direct reference to the act which authorised it.

4. Be it enacted, That the commissioner of the Kanawha road and navigation, shall forthwith settle all the contracts for work on the mountain section of the James river canal, as far as the contractors have completed any jobs heretofore. He shall not contract for a farther extension of the Kanawha road, but is authorised to complete the improvements on the Kanawha river, up to the present termination of the turnpike road. The commissioner or commissioners, whose duty or duties it may be to carry into effect the third (b) section of this act, shall not do any act or make any contract which may subject the State to the payment of a sum of money exceeding in amount, the sum herein directed to be borrowed.

CHAPTER 26.—An act to amend an act, entitled, "an act authorising a loan for the purposes of Internal improvement."

2. Be it further enacted, That the reference in said act to the third section, shall be taken as referring to this act.

3. This act shall be in force from the passage thereof.

CHAPTER 47.—An act providing for re-building Gauley bridge, the payment of existing contracts, and for other purposes.

2. Be it further enacted, That so much of the said sum as shall be necessary, shall be and is hereby appropriated to re-building the bridge across Gauley river, to be expended for that purpose under the direction and superintendence of the commissioner of the Kanawha road and navigation, who shall cause the said bridge to be built upon such model, as in his opinion will combine economy with public utility.

3. Be it further enacted, That the sum of twenty-eight thousand dollars of the aforesaid sum, shall be and is hereby appropriated for the purpose of enabling the James River Company, and the commissioner of the Kanawha road and navigation, to complete the works already contracted for and remaining unfinished, and to pay what may be now due on existing contracts.

4. Be it further enacted, That hereafter the following tolls shall be demanded and received on the tow-path of the mountain section of the James River canal, to wit: for every person on foot, six and a quarter cents; for every person on horse-back, six and a quarter cents; for every horse, mare, mule or work ox, two cents; for every head of neat cattle, two cents; for every score of sheep, hogs or goats, twelve and a half cents; and so in proportion for any greater or less number: And it shall henceforth be the duty of the 38 for the collection of tolls and registering and numbering all boats navigating the said river, and to make all such other arrangements as may be necessary for collecting the tolls on the said river.

5. Be it further enacted, That the commissioner of the Kanawha road and navigation, shall hereafter receive an annual salary of eight hundred dollars, in lieu of the salary now allowed him by law.

6. This act shall be in force from the passing thereof.

CHAPTER 71.—An act providing for the extension of the Kanawha turnpike road to Big Sandy river.

(Passed January 30th, 1829.) 45

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That the President and Directors of the James River Company be, and they are hereby authorised and required to cause the present Kanawha turnpike road to be extended from the western termination thereof, to the mouth of Big Sandy river, and for defraying the expense that may be incurred under this act, the said President and Directors 46 are hereby authorised and empowered to borrow on the credit of the Commonwealth, at such time or times as they may deem proper, any sum or sums of money not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, provided the same can be obtained at a rate of interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, payable half yearly, and to issue to the loaners of the said money, certificates in the same form, transferable in the same manner, and redeemable at the same periods, with those which have been heretofore authorised and employed in the negotiations of the last loans obtained by the State for the purposes of internal improvement: and that the tolls hereafter raised upon the Kanawha turnpike road heretofore finished, as well as the tolls which may arise from the road hereby authorised to be made, after keeping the said road in repair, shall be, and the same are hereby pledged for the payment of the interest which may accrue on the money to be borrowed under the authority of this act, and for the final redemption of the stock which may be created under the provisions herein contained; and if the tolls shall be found inadequate to the payment of the said semi-annual interest, then, such deficiency shall be paid out of any monies belonging to the fund of internal improvement.

2. Be it further enacted, That the Principal Engineer as soon as may be after the passage of this act, shall proceed to lay out and locate the said road from the western termination of the said Kanawha turnpike road, to the mouth of Big Sandy river, of the same width of location, and of construction with the best parts of the road heretofore made: In the performance of which duty, he is hereby required to graduate the same as near a horizontal line as the inequalities of the ground may admit of, but so that the said road when formed shall in no instance diverge more than five degrees from a horizontal line: That in making such location he shall so mark his stations, and levels, and indicate the sites of the bridges and culverts which he may deem necessary, that the superintendents of the work with the aid of his field notes, may be readily enabled to execute the same, according to the designs and plans of the said Principal Engineer.

3. Be it further enacted, That the Principal Engineer shall, in locating the said road, and in his report thereof, carefully estimate and describe the quantity and kind of labour to be done on each mile thereof, and the reasonable cost of the same. He shall also describe the number, kind and situation of the bridges, culverts and drains which he may deem necessary, accompanying his descriptions with profiles or drawings when he may deem the same useful; so that such report may form the basis of contracts for the execution of the entire work. And it shall be the further duty of the said Engineer, to deliver to the clerks of the county courts of Kanawha and Cabell counties, plats or maps of so much of the said road as may be within their respective counties, to be by them respectively recorded, and thereupon the land over which the said road shall be located shall become, ipso facto, vested in the Commonwealth for the use of the said road.

4. Be it further enacted, That if any person shall conceive himself, herself, or themselves, aggrieved by the location of the said road, and the investment of the land in the Commonwealth, over which the same shall pass, or by the erection of any bridges, abutments or other necessary work or building, in the formation and construction of the said road, it shall be lawful for such person or persons, within one year from the recording of the maps or plats as herein provided for, to file a suggestion before the superior or county court of the county where such land may be situated, setting out the grounds of the injury complained of, and for which damages are claimed, of which suggestion the person complaining shall give to the President of the James River Company at least thirty days notice, by serving him with a copy thereof; whereupon, the court before whom the suggestion may be filed, shall cause an issue to be made up and tried at the bar of the said court, as other issues of fact are tried, for ascertaining what damages the complainant hath sustained by reason of the matters alleged in his suggestion, over and above the advantages and benefits accruing to the complainant, by the opening and constructing the said road. And upon the certificate of the court trying such issue, the President and Directors of the James River Company shall pay the amount of the damages which may be so found, to the party appearing by said verdict to be entitled to the same, out of any unexpended funds in their hands; but all persons failing to file suggestions as herein provided, for the space of one year from the time at which such maps or plats shall be delivered for recording, shall be held and deemed to have relinquished to the Commonwealth all claim to damages arising or supposed to arise from the execution of this act.

5. Be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the James River Company, by themselves, their agents and servants, and the Principal Engineer, with the surveyors and assistants, shall have full power and authority to enter upon all lands and tenements, through which they may think it necessary to make examinations, and to lay out the said road as the Principal Engineer may judge most for the public advantage and benefit. And in the opening and constructing the said road, the President and Directors of the James River Company, their agents and servants, shall have the same power and authority, and be subject to the same limitations and restrictions as are provided in the twelfth and thirteenth sections of the "act prescribing certain general regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies," passed February the seventeenth, in the year eighteen hundred and seventeen.

6. Be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the James River Company be, and they are hereby authorised to select and appoint an able, capable, discreet superintendent of the road hereby directed to be made, and to allow him such salary as they may judge reasonable, not exceeding seven hundred and fifty dollars per annum. It shall be the duty of the said superintendent to make all contracts for the opening and constructing the said road, erecting bridges, and whatever else may be necessary for the fully finishing and completing the same, under the direction of the said President and Directors, and subject to their approbation and ratification. It shall also be his duty strictly and constantly to superintend the execution of all the works upon the said road, and perform such other duties as the President and Directors of the James River Company may from time to time appoint and direct; and the said President and Directors shall have full power and authority to re- 48 move from office, for any cause by them deemed sufficient, any superintendent by them appointed, and to appoint another in his place.

7. Be it further enacted, That as soon as a section of fifteen miles of the said road shall be completed, and as often as sections of that length shall be finished, it shall be lawful for the President and Directors of the James River Company to cause a gate or gates to be erected across the said road; to appoint receivers of tolls at said gates, and to exact and receive for the use of the said road, the same rates of toll as are now paid for the use of an equal distance of the Kanawha turnpike. And all the laws and regulations heretofore enacted in relation to the Kanawha turnpike, shall be held and taken as equally applying to the extension hereby directed to be made, so far as the same remains unchanged by the provisions of this act.

8. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the owners and proprietors of the ferries over water-courses on the line which may be selected for the road, to graduate the banks to the angle hereby prescribed, and by permanent and sufficient wharfing to secure the same from abrasions, of such width, and in such manner and time, as the Principal Engineer shall prescribe, and at all times shall keep the same so covered with stone or gravel when necessary, as to render the approach to the ferry boat firm and dry; and every keeper or owner of a ferry over which the said road may pass, who shall fail to comply with any of the requisitions of this act, shall be subject to a fine of not less than twenty dollars, nor more than one hundred dollars, to be recovered by indictment or information in any court having jurisdiction thereof, for the use of the President and Directors of the James River Company; but nothing in this section contained, shall be so construed as to prevent the President and Directors of the James River Company from erecting bridges at any time hereafter over such water courses, reserving to the owners or proprietors of such ferries, all the rights and remedies given to the owners and proprietors of the land over which the road may be made.

9. This act shall commence and be in force from and after the passing thereof.

CHAPTER 72.—An act concerning the Kanawha Road and Bridges, and for other purposes.

4. Be it further enacted, That for the purpose of discharging the unsatisfied demands against the company, for the construction of the public improvements under their direction, it shall be lawful for the President and Directors of the James River Com- 49
pany, and they are hereby authorised and required, to borrow a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars, on the same terms and conditions, and on the same pledges, as are specified for the loan authorised by the act passed on the first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, entitled, "an act authorising a loan for the purposes of internal improvements," which sum, or any part thereof which may be borrowed, is hereby appropriated to the discharge of the demands aforesaid.

CHAPTER 73.—An act prescribing a tariff of tolls on the Kanawha river, and for other purposes.

(Passed February 27th 1829.) 50

* * * * *

9. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President and Directors of the James River Company to cause buoys to be placed in the Great Kanawha river, so as readily and 52 clearly to indicate and point out to navigators all the entrances and lines of the sluices, the wing-dams and the jetties and generally the course of the channels. The said President and Directors shall also cause beacons to be placed on the bars, rocks and other obstructions to the navigation, not within the sluices or channels, but which, from their positions, or from other causes, are likely to endanger the safety of vessels or boats navigating the said river; which buoys and beacons shall be so constructed as to be visible, until the water of the river shall rise five feet above its ordinary lowest level. For the greater safety and convenience of the ascending trade of the said river, it shall be the further duty of the said President and Directors to cause large rings to be attached by suitable bolts to rocks or other stable bodies, along the sluices and at the ends of the wing-dams and jetties, for the better enabling the ascending boats to overcome the force of the currents, by warps and cords.

10. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said President and Directors, to cause all depositions of sand, gravel, timber or other obstructions in the channels, sluices or passages of the said river, to be removed therefrom, so as to restore to the said channels, sluices and passages, the width and depth of 53 water produced therein by the works recently constructed on the said river, and at all times to keep the said channels, sluices and passages, free from depositions or other obstructions which may impair or impede the navigation: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall authorise the expenditure of a sum exceeding one thousand dollars.

11. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Principal Engineer of this Commonwealth, and he is hereby required to attend during some dry season, to view the several improvements made on the said river and make report on their defects and the remedies necessary therefor, to the Board of Public Works at its next session.

12. This act shall be in force from and after the passing thereof.

CHAPTER 53.—An act making further provision for the extension of the Kanawha turnpike to Big Sandy river.

(Passed December 18th, 1829.) 45

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That the President and Directors of the James River Company be, and they are hereby authorised and empowered to borrow on the credit of the Commonwealth, at such time or times as they may deem proper, any sum or sums of money, not exceeding eight thousand dollars, on the same terms, conditions and pledges, as are specified for the loan authorised by the act of the thirtieth of January, eighteen hundred and twenty nine, providing for the extension of the Kanawha turnpike to the mouth of Big Sandy river, and to be applied to the same purposes.

2. This act shall commence and be in force from and after the passage thereof.

CHAPTER 52.—An act authorising a change in the location of the Kanawha turnpike road.

(Passed January 30th, 1830.) 44

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That the President and Directors of the James River Company be, and they are hereby authorised to vacate and annul the location made of the Kanawha turnpike road, by the Principal Engineer, between the land of John Shrewsbury, senior, and Campbell's creek, in the county of Kanawha, and to cause the same to be re-located along and near to the shore of the Great Kanawha river: Provided, they can procure a substitution of the one line for the other with the contractors for forming that part of the road, without increasing the expense of the execution thereof, or that the proprietors of the land shall defray the difference of the cost in the two lines; and if additional bridges or culverts should be rendered necessary by such re-location, the walls of the embankments, abutments and piers, shall be constructed of stone, under the direction of the Superintendent of said road, whose duty it shall be to have the same constructed of good materials, and in a workman-like manner: And provided also, That the pro- 45
prietors of the land over which the road shall pass near the river, shall release all damages or claims to remuneration for the land over which the said road may be conducted.

2. Be it further enacted, That on such re-location being made, the said President and Directors shall cause to be recorded in the office of the clerk of the county court of Kanawha, a map or drawing of the re-located section of road, which shall have the same legal effects, and operate upon the land over which the road shall pass, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if such location had been there made in the first instance, and the surveys and drawings thereof had been reported and recorded by the Principal Engineer.

3. This act shall commence and be in force from and after the passing thereof.

CHAP. CVI.—AN ACT making further provision for the extension of the Kanawha turnpike to Big Sandy river.

[Passed March 31, 1831.] 158

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, That the president and directors of the James river company be, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to borrow, on the credit of the commonwealth, at such time or times as they may deem proper, any sum or sums of money, not exceeding fifteen thousand dollars, on the same terms, conditions and pledges, as are specified for the loan authorized by the act of the thirtieth of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-nine, providing for the extension of the Kanawha turnpike to the mouth of Big Sandy river, and to be applied to the same purposes.

2. This act shall commence and be in force from and after the passage thereof.

CHAP. LXXXII.—An act incorporating the stockholders of the James river and Kanawha company.

Whereas the measures hitherto adopted by the general assembly for the purpose of connecting the tide water of James river with the navigable waters of the Ohio, have been found inadequate to effect that object, by such line of transportation as the public interest requires; and it is now deemed expedient for that purpose to incorporate a joint stock company, to which the interest of the commonwealth in the James river company shall be transferred at a fair value: Therefore, days previous notice in some newspaper published most convenient to each place of subscription, and in such other newspapers as may be deemed proper, shall be given of the time and places of opening the books. The books shall be kept open for twenty days; and if within that time three-fifths of the capital stock shall not have been subscribed by persons, bodies politic or corporate, other than the commonwealth, they shall be again opened and may be continued open, if necessary, until the second Monday in December next. All subscriptions must be for one or more whole shares; none being allowed for any part of a share.

2. When the books are opened the state shall be regarded as a subscriber for ten thousand shares of the stock; to be paid for by a transfer of her whole interest in the works and property of the present James river company, and when they are finally closed they shall be returned to the second auditor, verified by the signatures of the commissioners, or some of them, and be laid before the president and directors of the James river company, in order that the amount of valid subscriptions may be ascertained and proper measures taken thereupon.

3. The second auditor shall forthwith give public notice, in such newspapers as he may think proper, or as the president and directors of the James river company shall direct, of the return of the books and of the amount of subscriptions appearing upon them; and after the expiration of twenty days from the publication of such notice, the president and directors shall proceed to ascertain the amount of valid subscriptions, regarding no person, body politic or corporate, other than the commonwealth, as a subscriber for any share, unless he shall have paid thereupon, into the bank of Virginia, or Farmers' bank of Virginia at Richmond, at least five dollars, to the credit of the James river company, and have furnished a certificate of such payment to the second auditor. If it be ascertained that three-fifths of the capital stock have not been subscribed by persons, bodies politic or corporate, other than the commonwealth, then the president and directors of the James river company shall direct the certificates of payment aforesaid to be returned to the subscribers, with the second auditor's warrant on the back thereof, for the re-payment of the money; and they shall report to the next general assembly the failure of the subscription, suggesting the probable causes thereof, and the means, if any, of obviating them.

4. When three-fifths or more of the capital stock shall have been so subscribed by persons, bodies politic or corporate, other than the commonwealth, but the whole capital shall not have been subscribed, then the commonwealth shall be regarded as a subscriber for the residue of the five millions; and if, including the commonwealth's subscription, more than five millions of capital shall have been subscribed, the subscriptions shall be reduced to five millions, by taking off the surplus from the highest subscriptions, other than that of the commonwealth; and when it shall happen that two or more of the highest subscriptions are equal, and the desired reduction cannot be made by subtracting equally from each, then it shall be decided by lot, from which subscription or subscriptions the greater number shall be subtracted; and the president and directors of the James river company shall order it accordingly.

5. When three-fifths or more of the capital stock shall have been so subscribed, by persons, bodies politic or corporate, other than the commonwealth, having paid as aforesaid, five dollars upon each share, then the subscribers, their successors, heirs and assigns, shall be a body politic and corporate, by the name of "The James River and Kanawha Company," and by that name shall have perpetual succession and a common seal, may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, purchase and hold, sell and convey real and personal property; and shall be, to every intent and purpose in law, the successors of the present James river company: provided, however, that they shall hold no real estate, except that which by this act, or some other act of the general assembly, may be specially vested in them, or they may be expressly authorized to acquire for the purpose of the improvements which they are required to make; and that they shall in no wise deal as bankers or merchants, or in buying and selling any produce or commodities whatsoever, except such as it is obviously convenient and proper for them to purchase and sell in the regular performance of the duties required of them by this act: and that they shall not be engaged in the establishment or conduct of manufactures, further than for the supply of their own consumption and that of the persons in their service, and in letting to farm or lease sites for mills and other machinery and water for their use.

6. The president and directors of the James river company, as soon as they shall have ascertained that three-fifths of the capital stock have been subscribed as aforesaid, so that the subscribers have become a body corporate, shall make publication of the fact in such newspapers as may be best suited to give notice to the stockholders, and shall appoint a day not more distant than thirty days for a general meeting of the stockholders, at some fit place in the city of Richmond, to the end that the company may be organized by the appointment of proper officers and agents. If on the day appointed a sufficient number of stockholders do not attend to constitute a general meeting, those present may adjourn from time to time till a sufficient number shall attend. To this meeting the second auditor shall deliver the original books of subscription, together with the certificates of payment into the banks by the subscribers, endorsing thereon his warrants for their payment to the order of the new company.

7. To constitute a general meeting, there must be present, either in person or by proxy, a number of stockholders, having a right to give a majority of all the votes which could be given at a meeting of all the stockholders.

8. Each stockholder shall be entitled to one vote for each share held by him, as far as ten shares, and to one vote for every five shares above ten.

9. There shall be a stated general meeting of the stockholders at some fit place in the city of Richmond, on the second Monday in December in each year, or at such other time as the by-laws of the company may prescribe; and there shall be extra general meetings of the stockholders, convened from time to time, as occasion may require, in such manner as may be ordered by the by-laws. If on the day appointed for any stated annual meeting, a sufficient number of stockholders shall not attend, to constitute such meeting, it shall stand adjourned from day to day until a sufficient number shall attend.

10. The stockholders, in general meeting, shall have power to make all such by-laws, rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the constitution or laws of the land, as they may deem proper, for the well ordering of the affairs of the company, for the protection and preservation of their property, and for the maintenance of good order and good police among their officers, agents, servants and labourers, and among the boatmen and others who use their canal and other works.

11. At the first general meeting and at each stated annual meeting thereafter, the stockholders shall appoint a president and seven directors of the company, who shall hold their offices for one year and thereafter, until their successors shall be appointed, unless sooner removed by the stockholders in general meeting. Vacancies in the office of president or director shall be supplied by the stockholders in general meeting, or in such other manner as the by-laws may prescribe.

12. There shall be such other officers and agents of the company as they may think proper. Their duties, the tenure of their office and the mode of their appointment shall be prescribed by the by-laws; and bond with security for the performance of their duties may be required from any of them. The salary, pay and emoluments of the president, directors and all other officers and agents, shall be regulated by the by-laws.

13. Minutes of the proceedings of the stockholders at all general meetings, verified by the signature of the chairman or other presiding officer, shall be regularly kept and carefully preserved, in well bound books; and the names of all the stockholders present, whether in person or by proxy, shall be always entered on the minutes.

14. The president and directors of the company, subject to the control of the by-laws, shall be charged with the imme- 76 diate care and superintendence of the affairs of the company; with making and executing their contracts, either by themselves, or by their lawful agents; with constructing and preserving their works; with the custody and preservation of all the property of the company; and with the control and direction of all their agents. A quorum for the transaction of business, shall consist of the president and a majority of the directors; or when the president is absent, of the directors, or any five of them, one of whom shall be appointed president, pro tempore.

15. They shall keep a regular journal of their proceedings, verified by the signature of the president, and preserved in well bound books, wherein the names of the members present shall be always entered, and the vote of each member recorded. They shall cause regular books of account to be kept of all the receipts and disbursements, and of all the dealings of the company; and shall cause their books to be regularly balanced, semi-annually, on such days as the stockholders in their by-laws shall appoint.

16. They shall keep a regular roll of their stockholders, and shall furnish to each one or more certificates of his stock as may be required, verified by the seal of the corporation, and the signature of the president. The stock shall be deemed personal estate, and as such, shall pass to purchasers, executors or administrators. Before the dividends on such stock shall be paid to any purchaser, executor or administrator, regular evidence of title shall be exhibited to the president and directors, and the original certificate of stock, or satisfactory proof of its loss, shall be produced; whereupon, the stock shall be transferred upon the books, and a new certificate or certificates granted. Until such evidence of title shall be produced to the president and directors, or they shall be restrained by legal process, they shall be justified in paying the dividends to the persons in whose name the stock stands upon their books; and the company shall not be chargeable therefor to any other claimant.

17. Within thirty days after the adjournment of the first general meeting of the stockholders, of which public notice shall be given in such newspapers as the president and directors may think proper, the stockholders other than the commonwealth, shall pay into one of the banks aforesaid, or into one of their offices of discount and deposit such as the president and directors may designate, the further sum of five dollars on each share of their stock; and they shall pay the residue of their subscriptions in such sums, at such times and in such manner, as the exigencies of the company may demand, and as the president and directors may from time to time require.

18. If any stockholder shall fail to pay the sum required of him by this act, within thirty days after the adjournment of the first general meeting, public notice having been given thereof in the manner above required, or shall fail to pay any other part of the subscription lawfully required of him by the president and directors, after such requisition shall have been advertised four weeks in some public newspaper printed in the city of Richmond, it shall be lawful for the president and directors, after advertising the time and place of sale for four weeks, in some newspaper so published, to sell at public auction for cash, the share or shares of the delinquent stockholder, and to convey and transfer the same to the purchaser. And the said president and directors, after retaining from the purchase money the costs and charges of the sale, and the amount in arrear, and due to the company, shall pay over the surplus, if any, to the said stockholder, or his legal representative. If the purchase money shall be insufficient to pay the cost and charges of the sale, and the sum in arrear and due to the company, then the delinquent stockholder, as well as the original subscriber for the stock, and the heirs, executors and administrators of each of them shall be liable for the payment of the balance; and such balance may be recovered of the original subscriber and delinquent stockholder, jointly or severally, or from the heirs, executors or administrators of either, upon motion on ten days previous notice, in the inferior or superior court of the county or corporation in which the defendants, or either of them, may be found, or by warrant before a justice of the peace, where the sum to be recovered is within the jurisdiction of a single magistrate, or by any other proper action before any court having cognizance thereof. The purchaser at such sale shall be regarded as an original subscriber, and as such, he, his heirs, executors and administrators, shall be liable for all subsequent delinquencies.

19. When the other stockholders shall have paid such proportion of their subscriptions as will be equal to the proportion of the state's subscription paid by the transfer of their property as aforesaid, then the residue of the state's subscription shall be paid from to time, as nearly as may be, in the proportions in which the other stockholders shall be required to pay the residue of their subscriptions.

20. At the expiration of thirty days from the adjournment of the first general meeting of the stockholders as aforesaid, the whole interest of the commonwealth in the works and property of the present James river company, shall be, and the same is hereby transferred to the James river and Kanawha company, hereby incorporated, to be held by them forever, for the sole use and benefit of the stockholders; and from thenceforward, the company hereby incorporated shall be entitled to all the tolls, rents, and other emoluments, rights, privileges and immunities, which are now enjoyed by the James river company, subject however to the incumbrances, limitations and restrictions in this act declared. The president and directors of the new company, their officers and agents, at the expiration of the said thirty days, shall take possession of the property and works hereby transferred, and enter upon the receipt of the tolls, rents, and other emoluments thereof, for the benefit of the stockholders; but until the expiration of the said thirty days, the said property and works, the tolls, rents, and other emoluments thereof, shall be and remain for the use of the commonwealth, in the same manner as if this act had never passed.

21. The James river and Kanawha company shall take the property hereby transferred to them, subject to the payment of the dividend of fifteen per centum per annum forever, to the stockholders of the old company, and subject moreover to the pledge of the surplus tolls of the company made by former laws, for the security of those public creditors, who on the faith of that pledge have lent money to the James river company, for the use of the commonwealth; but the general assembly hereby pledges the faith of the commonwealth to the new company, that they shall be 78 protected from the payment of any part of the principal or interest of the debt contracted by the loans aforesaid; and to this end the profits of the commonwealth's stock in the new company, and so much of the revenue of the fund for internal improvement, as now stands pledged for that purpose, shall be faithfully applied to the payment of the interest on the said loans; and if this should prove inadequate, other sufficient funds shall be provided.

22. The James river and Kanawha company are charged with the duty of connecting the tide water of James river with the navigable waters of the Ohio by one of three plans of improvement, at their election; that is to say, either by a continuation of the lower James river canal to some suitable point on the river not lower than Lynchburg, a continued rail-road from the western termination of that canal to some convenient point on the Great Kanawha river below the great falls thereof, and an improvement of the Kanawha river from thence to the Ohio, so as to make it suitable for steam boat navigation: or secondly, by a continuation of the James river canal as aforesaid, and a continued rail-road from its western termination to the Ohio river: or thirdly, by a continued rail-road from Richmond to the Ohio river. And whether they elect one or another of these plans of improvement, that which they elect shall be executed in a substantial, durable and workmanlike manner; their improvements shall be kept permanently in good repair, free and fit for public use, according to the provisions of this act; and the works which they shall construct, and the property which they shall acquire by purchase or condemnation, under the authority of this law, shall be vested in them and their successors forever, for their own use and benefit, exempt from all public taxes, burdens or charges, other than those which may be imposed or authorized by this act.

23. If the company elect to continue the lower James river canal to Lynchburg, or beyond it, as part of their improvement, then that canal in all its parts from Richmond to its western termination, shall be at least forty feet wide at top, and twenty-eight feet wide at bottom, with not less than four feet depth of water at all seasons of the year, shall be provided with a convenient tow-path, and adapted throughout its whole extent to the navigation of boats of not less than thirty-five tons burden, propelled by horses. To avoid very great expense at difficult passes, and to furnish proper accommodation to the trade on both sides of the river, the bed of the river shall occasionally be used as part of the line of navigation, when the refluent water from the dams will admit the convenient application of horse power, and the safe and easy passage of the usual canal boats. The canal at its lower termination shall be connected with the tide-water, so as to enable the boats which usually navigate it with their cargoes, at all times conveniently to pass into tide water, and descend the river or return.

24. From the highest point on James or Jackson's river to which the navigation shall be carried as aforesaid, a rail-road shall be extended by the most convenient route, either to the Ohio river, or to some suitable point on the Kanawha river, below the great falls thereof, as the company may elect. Such rail-road shall be graduated, so as to be convenient for transportation both eastward and westward, and shall be furnished with two sets of tracks, and all other works and fixtures necessary for the accommodation of the trade thereon. 79

25. If the company should not choose to extend the lower James river canal, but should elect a continued rail-road from Richmond, then they shall construct a rail-road from the tide water at Richmond, following the course of James river beyond the Blue Ridge, and thence by the most convenient route to the Kanawha river, terminating either at the mouth of that river, or at some other convenient point below the great falls, or at some convenient point on the Ohio river. And for the accommodation of the trade on both sides of James river, they shall extend proper arms of the road across the river, to all towns, and other convenient places of deposit on the opposite shore thereof.

26. If the western termination of the rail-road should be at any point of the Kanawha above its mouth, then the navigation of the Kanawha river from thence to the Ohio, shall be improved by locks and dams, or otherwise, so that at all seasons of the year, it may be conveniently and safely navigated by steam-boats of not less than one hunderd tons burden.

27. The works hereby required of the James river and Kanawha company, shall be executed with diligence, and if they be not commenced within two years after the passing of this act, and finished within twelve years after the first general meeting of the stockholders, then their charter shall be forfeited, and all the works of the company, with the land on which they are situated, and all the rights, privileges and immunities hereby granted to them, shall be vested in the present James river company, for the benefit of the commonwealth; and in that event, the present James river company shall be regarded, to all intents and purposes, as the successors of the company hereby incorporated, in no manner, however, liable for any debts which they may have contracted, or entitled to any part of their personal property.

28. If the capital of five millions of dollars shall be found insufficient to complete the works required of the company, they shall be at liberty to enlarge their capital to any amount which may be found necessary to that end. The commonwealth shall be at liberty to take two-fifths of the additional capital, or any portion thereof, and the other stockholders to take the residue. So much thereof as shall not be voluntarily taken by the commonwealth and the other stockholders, may be raised by opening new books, and receiving new subscriptions, under the superintendence and control of the president and directors. The additional capital shall be taken in whole shares of a hundred dollars each; and the subscribers, their successors, heirs and assigns, shall be thenceforth, to all intents and purposes, members of the company in like manner as if they had been subscribers to the original capital; and shall, in like manner, be compelled to pay the amount of their subscriptions, upon the requisition of the president and directors, be subject to all the burdens, and entitled to all the privileges of the original subscribers.

29. The president and directors, their officers, agents and servants, shall have full power and authority to enter upon all lands and tenements through which they may desire to conduct their road or canal, or any feeder of the canal, or against which they may desire to abut any dam; and to lay out their road, canal, feeders and abutments, according to their pleasure, so that neither the dwelling house, yard, garden, nor curtilage of any person 80 be invaded without his consent. They shall describe by certain limits the land which they desire to occupy for the purposes aforesaid, and such contiguous land as they may desire to occupy as sites for toll-houses, warehouses, stables and other buildings, for the necessary accommodation of their officers, agents and servants, their horses, mules, and other cattle, and for the protection of the property entrusted to their care: Provided, That the lands so laid out on the general line of the road, canal or its feeders, shall not exceed one hundred feet in width; that the adjoining land, for the sites of buildings, shall not exceed one acre in any one parcel, or one hundred acres in the whole, and that the land for an abutment shall not exceed one acre. It shall be lawful for the president and directors to purchase and hold the land so laid out, or any part thereof. And if they cannot agree with the owner on the terms of purchase, it shall be lawful for them to apply to the court of the county in which such land, or the greater part thereof, may lie, and upon such application, the court shall appoint five discreet, intelligent, disinterested and impartial freeholders, to assess the damages to the owner from the condemnation of his land for the purposes aforesaid. No such appointment, however, shall be made, unless ten days previous notice of the application shall have been given to the owner of the land, or to the guardian, if the owner be an infant, or to the committee, the owner being non compos mentis, if such owner, guardian or committee, can be found within the county; or if he cannot be so found, then such appointment shall not be made, unless notice of the application shall have been published at least one month next preceding, in some newspaper printed as convenient as may be to the courthouse of the county, and shall have been posted at the door of the courthouse on the first day at least of the next preceding term of the said court. A day for the meeting of the said freeholders to perform the duty assigned them, shall be designated in the order appointing them; and any one or more of them attending on that day, may adjourn from time to time, until their business shall be finished. Of the five freeholders so appointed, any three or more of them may act after having been duly sworn or solemnly affirmed before some justice of the peace, that they will impartially and justly, to the best of their ability, ascertain the damages which will be sustained by the proprietor of the land from the condemnation thereof, for the use of the company, and that they will truly certify their proceedings thereupon to the court of the said county.

30. It shall be the duty of the said freeholders, in pursuance of the order appointing them, to assemble on the land proposed to be condemned, and after viewing the same, and hearing such proper evidence as either party may offer, they shall ascertain, according to the best of their judgment, the damages which the proprietor of the land will sustain, by the condemnation thereof for the use of the company. In performing this duty, they shall consider the proprietor of the land as being the owner of the whole fee simple interest therein: they shall take into consideration the quantity and quality of the land to be condemned, the additional fencing which will be required thereby, and all other inconveniences which will result to the proprietor from the condemnation thereof, and shall combine therewith a just regard to the advantages which the owner of the land will derive from the construction of the road or 81 canal, for the use of which his land is condemned.

31. When the said freeholders shall have agreed upon the amount of damages, they shall forthwith make a written report of their proceedings under their hands and seals, in substance as followeth:

"We, freeholders, appointed by an order of the county court of for the purpose of ascertaining the damages which would be sustained by , the proprietor of certain lands in the said county, which the president and directors of the James river and Kanawha company propose to condemn for their use, do hereby certify, that we met together on the land aforesaid, on the day of , the day appointed therefor by the said order, (or the day to which we were regularly adjourned, from the day appointed for our meeting by the said order.) and that having been first duly sworn, and having viewed the premises, we proceeded to estimate the quantity and quality of the land aforesaid, the quantity of additional fencing, which would probably be occasioned by its condemnation, and all other inconveniences which seemed to us likely to result therefrom to the proprietor of said land: that we combined with these considerations, as far as we could, a just regard to the advantages which would be derived by the proprietor of the said land, from the construction of the rail-road, (or canal,) for the use of which the said land is to be condemned: that under the influence of these considerations, we have estimated, and do hereby assess the damages aforesaid, at the sum of . Given under our hands and seals this day of ." At the foot of the report so made, the magistrate before whom the said freeholders were sworn, shall make a certificate, in substance as follows: "County, set: I, a justice of the peace for said county, do hereby certify, that the above named freeholders, before they executed their duties as above certified, were solemnly sworn (or affirmed) before me, that they would impartially and justly, to the best of their ability, ascertain the damages which would be sustained by the above named . from the condemnation of the above mentioned land, for the use of the James river and Kanawha company, and that they would certify truly their proceedings thereupon to the court of the said county. Given under my hand this day of ."

32. The report of the freeholders so made, together with the certificate of the magistrate as aforesaid, shall be forthwith returned by the said freeholders, to the court of the county; and unless good cause be shewn against the report, it shall be confirmed by the court, and entered of record: but if the said report shall be disaffirmed, or if the said freeholders, being unable to agree, should report their disagreement, or if from any other cause, they should fail to make a report, within a reasonable time after their appointment, the court may at its discretion as often as may be necessary, supersede them, or any of them, appoint others in their stead, and direct another view and report to be made, in the manner above described.

33. On the confirmation of any such report, and on the payment or tender to the proprietor of the land, of the damages so assessed, or the payment of the said damages into court, when for good cause shewn, the court shall so have ordered it, the land viewed and assessed as aforesaid shall be vested in the James river and Kanawha company, in the same manner as if the proprietor had sold and conveyed it to them. 82

34. While these proceedings are depending for the purpose of ascertaining the damages to the proprietor for the condemnation of his land, and even before they shall been instituted, the president and directors, if they think that the interest of the company requires it, may by themselves, their officers, agents and servants

enter upon the lands laid out by them as aforesaid, and which they desire to condemn, and apply the same to the uses of the company. If when they so take possession, proceedings to ascertain the damages as aforesaid shall be pending, it shall be their duty diligently to prosecute them to a conclusion; or if none be then pending they shall without delay institute them, and diligently prosecute them to a conclusion. And when the report of the freeholders ascertaining the damages shall be returned and confirmed, the court shall render judgment in favour of the proprietor of the land for the amount thereof, and either compel its payment into court, or award process of execution for its recovery as to them shall seem right.

35. In the mean time no order shall be made and no injunction shall be awarded by any court or judge to stay the proceedings of the company in the prosecution of their works, unless it be manifest that they, their officers, agents or servants are transcending the authority given them by this act, and that the interposition of the court is necessary to prevent injury that cannot be adequately compensated in damages.

36. If the president and directors shall take possession of any land before the same shall have been purchased by them or condemned and paid for according to the provisions of this act, and shall fail for forty days to institute proceedings for its condemnation as aforesaid or shall not prosecute with due diligence the proceedings commenced for that purpose, it shall be lawful for the proprietor of the land, upon giving to the said president and directors, or any one of them, ten days previous notice, to apply to the court of the county in which the land or the greater part thereof shall lie; and upon such application the court shall appoint five discreet, intelligent, disinterested and impartial freeholders to assess the damages to the owner from the condemnation of his land for the use of the company, shall appoint a day for their meeting, to perform the duties assigned them, and shall dismiss at the costs of the company any proceedings then depending on their behalf for the condemnation of the said land. The freeholders so appointed, any three or more of whom may act, shall proceed in the performance of their duties in all respects in the same manner as if they had been appointed on the application of the president and directors of the company. And the court shall in like manner confirm or disaffirm their report, supersede them or any of them, and appoint others in their stead, or direct another view and report to be made as often as may be necessary. And when any such report ascertaining the damages shall be confirmed, the court shall render judgment in favour of the proprietor for the damages so assessed, and double costs, and shall thereupon either compel the company to pay into court the damages and costs so adjudged, or award process of execution therefor as to them shall seem right.

37. When the judgment rendered for the damages assessed and costs, shall be satisfied by the payment of the money into court, or otherwise, the title of the land for which such damages were assessed, shall be vested in the company in the same manner as if the proprietor had sold and conveyed it to them.

38. The said president and directors, for the purpose of constructing their canals, feeders, dams and rail-road aforesaid, and the works necessarily connected therewith, or of repairing the same after they shall have been made, or of enlarging or otherwise altering or repairing their canals, and other works now in existence, shall be at liberty by themselves, their officers, agents or servants, at any time to enter upon any adjacent lands, and to cut, quarry, dig, take and carry away therefrom, any wood, stone, gravel or earth, which they may deem necessary: Provided, however, That they shall not, without the consent of the owner, cut down any fruit tree, or any tree preserved in any field or lot for shade or for ornament, or take any timber, gravel, stone or earth, constituting any part of any fence or building. For all wood, stone, gravel or earth taken under authority of this act, and for all incidental injuries done to the enclosures, crops, woods or grounds, in taking or carrying the same away, the said president and directors shall make to the owner a fair and reasonable compensation, to be ascertained, if the parties cannot agree, by any three impartial, intelligent and disinterested freeholders, who, being appointed for that purpose by any justice of the peace thereto required by the owner, shall be sworn by him, and shall then ascertain the compensation upon their own view of the wood, stone, gravel or earth taken, and of the injury done as aforesaid in taking them.

39. If the said president and directors, in entering upon the land of any person under the authority of this act, for the purpose of laying out or constructing, enlarging, altering or repairing any of their said works, shall, by themselves, their officers, agents or servants, do any wanton or wilful injury to such land or its appurtenances, or to the crops growing or gathered, or to any other property thereon, the James river and Kanawha company shall pay to the person so injured, double the amount of the damages which shall be assessed by a jury in any proper action therefor.

40. When the works of the said company shall cross any public road, now established, or hereafter to be established, it shall be the duty of the James river and Kanawha company to provide, as far as possible, that no obstruction to the convenient transportation of persons or property along such road, shall be opposed by their works; and to this end, they shall always maintain, in good repair, proper bridges upon their canals, and proper passways across their rail-road, where the public roads cross them. Whensoever their works shall be conducted through the lands of any one without his consent, it shall be their duty to provide for him safe and convenient passways across their works, from one part of his land to the other. And if, by the enlargement or alteration of the canals now in existence, any bridge thereon, which the present James river company is bound to maintain for the use of the owner of the adjoining lands, should be destroyed or injured, the new company shall, without delay, re-build or repair it, so that the owner of the adjoining lands may sustain no detriment.

41. The general assembly will be at full liberty, at any time hereafter, to authorize any other rail-road to be joined to the rail-road of the James river and Kanawha company, or be conducted across it, on such terms as may be just, and in such manner as not to injure the works of the James river company, or 84 obstruct the use of their road.

42. The present improvements on James river shall, as far as practicable, be kept in good repair by the company, and free for use, on the payment of the tolls now allowed, except so far as they may be substituted by the new works required by this act.

43. The James river and Kanawha company shall at all times keep open and in good repair, the present Kanawha turnpike, hereby to be transferred to said company, as well as the extension thereof to the mouth of Big Sandy river, from the time of the completion of the same, and shall be authorized to receive, for the use of the said road, and the extension thereof, such tolls as they may assess, provided they do not exceed those now imposed by law. In the mean time, the extension to the mouth of Big Sandy river shall be completed in the manner now required by law, under the direction of the James river company, or such other agent as the general assembly shall direct; and so soon as the same shall be completed, it shall be transferred to the possession and controul of the James river and Kanawha company.

44. When the improvements in the navigation of the rivers hereby authorized, shall have been made, their navigable waters shall be deemed public highways, free for the use of all persons whatsoever, paying the lawful tolls, and conforming to the lawful rules and regulations of the company; and the tolls shall be as follows: Upon James and Jackson's rivers, the company may demand and receive, on all articles transported by water on their line of improvement, such tolls as they may assess, provided they do not exceed an average of three cents per ton of two thousand two hundred and forty pounds, per mile, upon either the ascending or descending navigation, and that the tolls upon indian corn, wheat, rye, and other grains, and grass seeds; upon flour, corn meal and other meal; upon hemp, flax, cotton, tobacco, and all agricultural productions, shall not exceed two and a half cents per ton per mile; that the tolls upon salt, bar iron, pig iron, iron castings, and all other minerals and fossils, shall not exceed two cents per ton per mile; that the toll upon coal shall not exceed one cent per ton per mile; and that the tolls upon lime, lumber and gypsum, shall not exceed one half a cent per ton per mile. These tolls shall be in lieu of the tolls now allowed by law.

45. When the improvements in the navigation hereby required shall be completed as far as Lynchburg, the tolls hereby allowed may be demanded and received upon the transportation between Lynchburg and Richmond, and shall be in lieu of the tolls now allowed on the lower canal: Provided, however, That until the improvements aforesaid shall be completed to the mouth of the North river in Rockbridge, the tolls from Lynchburg downward, on such articles as shall have passed the locks on the mountain canal, shall not exceed two cents per ton per mile. When the improvements shall be completed to the mouth of the North river in Rockbridge, the new tolls may be demanded and received upon the transportation below that point, in lieu of the tolls now allowed on the mountain canal: and if the aforesaid improvements shall be extended above the mouth of the North river, then the new tolls may be demanded and received upon the transportation on such parts of the extended line of improvement above that point, as may from time to time be completed and fit for use: Provided, That no such 85 tolls shall be received on parts of such extended line, until it shall be completed as far as Crow's ferry, and that none such shall be received on the transportation above Crow's ferry, on parts of such extended line, less than ten miles in extent.

46. Upon the Kanawha river, when the improvements on the same shall have been fully completed, as herein-before authorized and directed, from the point on said river where the rail-road may terminate, to the mouth thereof, the company may demand and receive, on all articles transported by water, on their line of improvements, in lieu of the tolls now allowed, such tolls as they may assess, provided they do not exceed one cent per ton per mile; but the tolls on salt, bar iron, pig iron and castings, shall not exceed one half of a cent per ton per mile; and upon lumber, lime, coal and gypsum, shall not exceed one-fourth of a cent per ton per mile: Provided, That all canoes and other small craft going to or returning from mill, shall be exempt from the payment of tolls. Until said river is rendered navigable in the manner above prescribed, from the termination of said rail-road to the mouth of the river, the James river and Kanawha company may demand and receive such tolls upon said river as they may assess, provided they do not exceed those now allowed by law.

47. Upon the rail-road hereby authorized, the company shall have the exclusive right of transportation. When it is completed, they shall at all times furnish and keep in good repair the necessary carriages and other requisites for the safe and convenient transportation of persons and property; and it shall be their duty at all times upon the payment or tender of the tolls hereby allowed, to transport to any convenient place of delivery on the road which the owner of the goods may indicate, and there to deliver all articles which shall be delivered to them for transportation, or offered to them in proper condition to be transported at some place on the road convenient for the reception thereof. They shall give no undue preference in transportation to the property of one person over that of another, but as far as practicable shall carry each in the order of time in which it shall be delivered or offered for transportation, with the tolls paid or tendered. If the company, or any of its officers or agents, shall fail to receive, transport or deliver, in due time, any property so offered or delivered to them for transportation, they shall forfeit and pay to the party injured double the amount of the lawful tolls paid or tendered; and shall moreover be liable to an action on the case, in which full damages and double costs shall be recovered. The company shall be liable as common carriers for any loss or injury happening to goods in their possession, or in possession of their agents for transportation.

48. If the rail-road be not extended farther east than the western termination of the James river canal, at or above Lynchburg, then the company may demand and receive for transportation thereupon, such tolls as they may assess, provided they do not exceed an average of eight cents per ton per mile; and for the transportation of persons four cents each per mile. But if the rail-road should be continued from Richmond to the Kanawha, then they may demand and receive the same tolls per mile for carriage west of Crow's ferry, at the mouth of Looney's creek, and may demand and receive east of the said Crow's ferry at the mouth of Looney's creek for the carriage of all articles of property 86 from west to east, tolls not exceeding an average of four cents per ton per mile; for the carriage of all articles of property from east to west, tolls not exceeding an average of six cents per ton per mile; and for the carriage of persons, whether eastward or westward, they may demand and receive four cents each per mile: Provided, however, That the tolls upon lumber, salt and the other mineral and agricultural products above enumerated, shall not exceed the respective averages above declared; that the tolls on coal shall not exceed three-fourths of these averages; and the toll on gypsum shall not exceed one-half of these averages. The tolls hereby allowed are in full for all transportation on the rail-road; and no other compensation shall be demanded or received by the company.

49. Tolls on the rail-road may be demanded and received as soon as any part thereof shall have one set of tracks completed, and shall be prepared with the necessary carriages and other requisites for safe and convenient transportation. The company, if they deem it expedient, may defer laying down the second set of tracks until one set shall be completed throughout the whole extent of the road: but they shall thereafter lay down the second with all practicable dispatch.

50. While the works are in progress, and after they are completed, the president and directors of the company shall declare and make semi-annual dividends of so much of the surplus profits of the stock, after paying the dividends due to the old stockholders, as they may deem it prudent to divide. The dividends on the commonwealth's stock, or so much thereof as may be required, shall be applied towards the payment of the interest on the loans to the James river company, and the dividends on the stock of the other stockholders, shall be paid to their order in such manner as the by-laws may prescribe.

51. The annual nett profits of the company proceeding from tolls, rents, and all other emoluments, shall never exceed fifteen per centum upon their capital stock; and the tolls shall be regulated from time to time, so as to restrain the profits within that limit. All reductions of the tolls made for that purpose shall be made rateably, on the Kanawha river, on the line between that and Crow's ferry at the mouth of Looney's creek, and on the line from thence to Richmond. To the end, that this regulation may be enforced, and that the general assembly may always be informed of the condition of the company, it shall be the duty of the president and directors of the company, annually, to report to the board of public works, or to such other public authority as the law may prescribe, the true state and condition of the company, its income from tolls, rents and other emoluments, its expenditures, and its nett profits, to the end that the commonwealth and the other stockholders may enjoy the profits of the stock in proportion to the amount of their respective capitals; the dividends declared as aforesaid upon each share, shall always be in proportion to the amount actually paid thereupon by the stockholders; and the commonwealth shall be regarded as having paid the full amount of her original subscription, from the time when her interest in the property and works of the present James river company shall have been transferred to the new company.

52. If any person shall wilfully trespass on the possessions, or do injury to the works or other property of the company, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished accordingly; except in those cases in which the offence is of a higher grade, or otherwise specifically punished by law. 87

53. In the event of the said company's constructing a road for the passage of carriages and heavy loaded waggons, and keeping the same in good repair, from a suitable point at or near the lower end of the existing canal at the mountain section, to a point on or near the North river, they shall be, and are hereby authorized to erect a gate thereon, and to demand and receive such tolls as are allowed by the act passed February the seventh, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, entitled "an act prescribing certain general regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies."

54. This act shall commence and be in force from and after the passing thereof.

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, that the number of directors in the James river and Kanawha company shall be increased by the appointment of six additional directors, three of whom shall be appointed by the Board of public works, and three by the stockholders in general meeting. Two of said directors to be elected by the stockholders in general meeting, shall be elected by the stockholders other than the state, and the third by the stockholders, including the state. That the three additional directors to be appointed by the Board of public works, and two of those to be appointed by the holders, shall be residents of the Kanawha valley, and shall, with the president of the company, constitute a board to be known as The Kanawha Board; which shall be entrusted with the control, management and supervision of the Kanawha improvement; subject, however, to the instructions of the stockholders of said company. All the authority now vested in the present board of directors over the Kanawha river, shall be vested in the Kanawha board 92 of directors herein authorized to be appointed; but said Kanawha board of directors shall have no control over any of the other works or affairs of said company. The Kanawha board may elect one of their number to act as president pro tempore, who shall preside, and discharge the other duties of president of the company, relating to the Kanawha river, in the absence of the president. Three of said directors, with the president of the company, shall constitute a quorum, and in the absence of the president, four of said directors shall constitute a quorum. The said Kanawha board shall have power to adopt such by-laws and regulations and to appoint such officers and agents as they may deem necessary for the management of the Kanawha improvement: provided, that in case the president of the company shall differ with the Kanawha directors in any matter involving in his opinion the general interests of the company, he shall have authority to call a meeting of the two boards of directors together, and submit such matter to them as one board: and their decision shall be carried into effect. The third director to be elected by the stockholders, including the state as aforesaid, shall be a member of the board of directors of the James river and Kanawha company as at present constituted, and invested with full powers as such.

2. The James river and Kanawha company are hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of their works on the Kanawha river, now existing and hereafter to be constructed under this act, and the net revenues now on hand or due and unpaid, and that may hereafter accrue therefrom, a sum or sums of money sufficient to improve the navigation of the Kanawha river, from the mouth thereof to Loup creek shoals, and are hereby authorized to issue their bonds or certificates of debt, payable at a period of not less than twelve years from the issuing and date thereof, unless the company shall think proper to pay them at an earlier time. Such bonds or certificates of debt shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding the rate of interest allowed by an act of the general assembly passed March fifteenth, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, entitled an act for the relief of rail road and other companies, and to regulate the terms on which they may borrow money; and the company shall not sell the said bonds or certificates at a less rate than that allowed in the said act. The company are also authorized to apply the net revenues derived from their works on the Kanawha river from its mouth to Loup creek shoals, directly to the improvement of said river.

3. The James river and Kanawha company are authorized and empowered to give a mortgage upon their said works on and rights in the said Kanawha river from Loup creek shoals to its mouth, as well as the works hereafter to be constructed under this act, and upon their net revenues now due or in hand, and which may hereafter accrue from the said works, for the purpose of securing the payment of the interest and the ultimate redemption of the principal of said bonds or certificates of debt; but the said mortgage shall give the power to sell the said property thereby conveyed, only in case of default in the payment of the principal of the said bonds or certificates of debt, when they shall become due, and provide for the payment of the accruing interest thereon only from the accruing net revenue from said work, except such arrears of interest as may be unpaid, if any, when the company may make default in the payment of the principal; which arrears may be provided to be then paid, together with the principal, from the proceeds of the sale of the property conveyed by the said mortgage. And a sale of the property shall not then be made, unless it shall appear that the payment of the principal of said bonds cannot be made within five years out of the revenues to be derived from said improvement. Neither the said bonds nor any other contract of the Kanawha board shall be a charge upon or in any manner enforced against the other property, resources or credit of the company. Any liens or prior claims that the state may hold on said works, rights and revenues, are hereby suspended in favor of such parties as may loan money to said company for the purposes of this act, or become the holders of said bonds, until such loan or loans, with the accruing interest thereon, have been fully paid and discharged: provided, however, when the debt with its accruing interest, which is herein authorized to be contracted for the improvement of the Kanawha river, shall have been fully paid and discharged, the state shall be reinstated to all the rights, privileges and priorities to which she was entitled previous to the passage of this act.

4. The James river and Kanawha company are hereby authorized, when the improvement of the Kanawha river has been commenced, to collect on all articles transported on the Kanawha river, in lieu of the tolls now authorized by law, such tolls as they may assess: provided they do not exceed four cents per ton per mile, but the toll on timber, lumber and coal shall not exceed one-fourth of one cent per ton per mile; upon salt, one-half of one cent per ton per mile; and upon bar iron, pig iron, grain and flour, one cent per ton per mile; and said company are also authorized to collect a rate of toll not exceeding one cent per passenger per mile for each person traveling on steam boats on said river.

5. The James river and Kanawha company shall not be liable for injury to boats, cargoes or other property at the points undergoing improvement, unless such injury be caused by a want 93 of ordinary care by the company or its agents in constructing the work.

6. The act of assembly passed February fifth, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, entitled an act authorizing the James river and Kanawha company to borrow money to improve the Kanawha river, and to pledge the tolls on said river for that purpose, so far as its provisions are inconsistent with or are changed by the provisions of this act, is hereby repealed: provided, however, that such repeal shall not affect the validity of the pledge heretofore made by the company, in pursuance of said act, of the tolls from the Kanawha river for the improvement of the said river.

7. The stockholders of the James river and Kanawha company shall have the power in general meeting to dispense with and terminate the powers of the said Kanawha board, composed of five directors as aforesaid, at any time they may deem it expedient to do so, after the improvement of the Kanawha river from its mouth to Loup creek shoals, as provided for by this act, shall have been completed. And this act shall expire by its own limitation, if the improvement of the Kanawha river, contemplated by it, shall not be commenced in good faith on or before the first day of July eighteen hundred and fifty-nine, and be completed within four years thereafter, unless the stockholders shall determine in general meeting, before the expiration of such period, to extend the said period for completing the work: provided, however, that if this act should be permitted to expire under the foregoing limitations, the rights and liens of the holders of bonds that shall have been issued and sold in pursuance thereof, shall not be affected thereby.

8. This act shall be in force from and after the time that the stockholders of the company shall accept the same in general meeting: provided, that the legislature hereby reserves the right at any time hereafter to modify, amend or repeal the powers and privileges hereby conferred, but the right of parties who may loan money under the provisions of this act for the improvement of the Kanawha river, shall not be affected or impaired by any such amendment, modification of repeal.

on account of the debts for which the state is responsible as security of the company, or on account of the annuity to the old James river company; and shall, by proper deeds, release to said company all liens, whether by deeds of trust, mortgages or otherwise, held by the state upon the works and property of the company, to secure any debt due to the state, or which may be guaranteed by the state.

4. Upon the receipt of the certificates for the said seventy-two thousand shares of the stock, the Board of public works is hereby directed, upon the surrender by the holders thereof, of any of the bonds of the James river and Kanawha company, for the payment of which the state is responsible, to issue to said holders a corresponding amount of the bonds of the state, made in the manner prescribed by law, payable thirty-four years after their date, and bearing interest at the rate of six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually. And the board shall thereupon cancel and file the bonds so surrendered, and deliver to the James river and Kanawha company a statement thereof, with the number, amount and date of each bond.

5. And upon the receipt of the certificates of the residue of two thousand shares of said stock, the Board of public works is directed to issue and deliver to the company the bonds of the state for the aggregate amount of two hundred thousand dollars, to be applied to the extinguishment of the floating debt of the company.

The said interest shall be paid semi-annually into the treasury of the commonwealth, for the benefit of the holders of said bonds, on or before the first day of January and July in each year; and the same shall be paid to the holders thereof, upon the warrant of the second auditor, out of said funds so paid into the treasury by said company.

7. The said company, after they may have issued such bonds, shall set apart, on the first day of January and July in each year, a fund not less than the rate of one per centum per annum for a sinking fund for the payment of the principal of such bonds, or such larger rate as may be necessary to provide a fund sufficient for such redemption, at the maturity of such bonds. And the amount to be set apart annually as a sinking fund, shall be paid by the company, one-half thereof on or before the first day of January and July in each year, to the commissioners of the Sinking fund, and invested by them in stocks, as required by the general law regulating the action of said commissioners; and the said commissioners shall keep an account of, and hold and apply the same to the redemption of said bonds, in pursuance of this act: and shall make report to the general assembly, at each session, of their proceedings under this act.

8. Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to render the state liable, in any manner whatever, otherwise than as a stockholder of the company, to the holders of any bonds executed for money borrowed under this act.

9. Be it further enacted, that there shall be issued to, and placed under the exclusive control of the Kanawha board of 116 directors of said company, or their successors, as constituted under the act of the general assembly entitled an act providing more effectual means for the improvement of the navigation of the Kanawha river, passed fifteenth of February one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, three hundred thousand dollars of the six per cent. registered stock of the commonwealth, to be issued in the mode now provided by law, and the said stock so issued shall be used by said Kanawha board of directors for the improvement of the navigation of said river, from the mouth thereof to Loup creek shoals: provided, however, said Kanawha board shall not dispose of said registered stock at less than par. And said registered stock shall not be issued for an amount exceeding one hundred and fifty thousand dollars in any one year, nor exceeding twenty thousand dollars in any one month: But before any of said stock shall be issued, the said James river and Kanawha company, by the president thereof, shall execute a deed of trust or mortgage upon the works, property and net revenue of said Kanawha line of improvement, from the mouth thereof to said Loup creek shoals, to the commonwealth, for the payment of the principal and interest of said three hundred thousand dollars: or upon the failure or refusal of said company to execute such deed of trust or mortgage, when required by the Kanawha board, then the said Kanawha board, by their president pro tempore, or other agent, may execute such deed of trust or mortgage: and the same shall be deemed to have the same effect as though it had been executed by said company: and such lien shall take precedence over any lien created by said company, to secure their bonds authorized to be issued by this act. The said Kanawha board shall pay into the treasury of the commonwealth three and one-half per centum on or before the fifteenth day of June and December of each year, on such amount of said registered stock as may be issued under this section, for interest and to provide a sinking fund. 10. The debts of said company, which may not be paid as authorized by this act, or if the holders thereof shall refuse to receive in payment thereof the seven per centum bonds of said company, authorized to be issued by this act, shall not, by reason of the passage of this act, be in any better condition for enforcing the payment theerof; but the liens of the commonwealth existing before the passage of this act, on the works, property and revenue of said improvement, shall, as to them, be deemed to be in full force.

11. 12. In addition to the rights and powers heretofore granted to and conferred upon the James river company 118 and the James river and Kanawha company, for the collection of tolls on the Kanawha river, the said James river and Kanawha company, their collectors and agents, are hereby authorized and empowered to sue out an attachment before any justice of the peace, against boats and cargoes upon the Kanawha river, for tolls due and unpaid by said boats and cargoes, their owners, masters or shippers.

act shall take effect or the Board of public works shall make the subscription to the stock of said company, authorized by it, or release or discharge the liens which the commonwealth holds on the property of the said company, the private stockholders of said company shall, in general meeting assembled, accept the provisions of this act, and duly certify their acceptance thereof to the Board of public works.

14. Be it further enacted, that before the provisions of this act shall take effect, the said James river and Kanawha company shall, in general meeting of the stockholders, accept the same, and such acceptance shall be deemed an acceptance of all the provisions of this act, and as a complete acquiescence in and recognition of all the authority and independent and other powers conferred upon the said Kanawha board by this act.

ACTS OF THE RESTORED GOVERNMENT OF VIRGINIA, ACTS AND CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS OF WEST VIRGINIA, AND ACTS OF UNITED STATES CONGRESS IN CONNECTION WITH THE FORMATION OF THE STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

The true purpose of all government is to promote the welfare and provide for the protection and security of the governed, and when any form or organization of government proves inadequate for, or subversive of this purpose, it is the right, it is the duty of the latter to abolish it. The Bill of Rights of Virginia, framed in 1776, reaffirmed in 1830, and again in 1851, expressly reserves this right to a majority of her people. The act of the General Assembly, calling the Convention which assembled at Richmond in February last, without the previously expressed consent of such majority, was therefore a usurpation; and the Convention thus called has not only abused the powers nominally entrusted to it, but, with the connivance and active aid of the executive, has usurped and exercised other powers, to the manifest injury of the people, which, if permitted, will inevitably subject them to a military despotism.

The Convention, by its pretended ordinances, has required the people of Virginia to separate from and wage war against the government of the United States, and against citizens of neighboring States, with whom they have heretofore maintained friendly, social and business relations:

It has attempted to subvert the Union founded by Washington and his co-patriots, in the purer days of the republic, which has conferred unexampled prosperity upon every class of citizens, and upon every section of the country:

It has attempted to transfer the allegiance of the people to an illegal confederacy of rebellious States, and required their submission to its pretended edicts and decrees:

It has attempted to place the whole military force and military operations of the Commonwealth under the control and direction of such confederacy, for offensive as well as defensive purposes:

It has, in conjunction with the State executive, instituted wherever their usurped power extends, a reign of terror intended to suppress the free expression of the will of the people, making elections a mockery and a fraud:

The same combination, even before the passage of the pretended ordinance of secession, instituted war by the seizure and appropriation of the property of the Federal Government, and by organizing and mobilizing armies, with the avowed purpose of capturing or destroying the Capital of the Union:

They have attempted to bring the allegiance of the people of 6
the United States into direct conflict with their subordinate allegiance to the State, thereby making obedience to their pretended ordinances, treason against the former.

We, therefore, the delegates here assembled in Convention to devise such measures and take such action as the safety and welfare of the loyal citizens of Virginia may demand, having maturely considered the premises, and viewing with great concern the deplorable condition to which this once happy Commonwealth must be reduced unless some regular adequate remedy is speedily adopted, and appealing to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe for the rectitude of our intentions, do hereby, in the name and on the behalf of the good people of Virginia, solemnly declare that the preservation of their dearest rights and liberties and their security in person and property, imperatively demand the reorganization of the government of the Commonwealth, and that all acts of said Convention and Executive, tending to separate this Commonwealth from the United States, or to levy and carry on war against them, are without authority and void; and that the offices of all who adhere to the said Convention and Executive, whether legislative, executive or judicial, are vacated.

[Wheeling Acts, Session June 11, 1861, p. 6.]

An ORDINANCE for the Reorganization of the State Government.

Passed June 19, 1861. 6

The People of the State of Virginia, by their Delegates assembled in Convention at Wheeling, do ordain as follows:

1. Passed January 23, 1860.

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, that the secretary of the commonwealth, the auditor of public accounts and the adjutant general, any two of whom may act, shall be and are hereby appointed commissioners, with authority to audit and settle all accounts for expenses incurred in assembling, arming, equipping and maintaining troops, and for transportation and pay of same, and for the purchase of arms and munitions, and for other incidental expenses incurred in the defence of the state, and in the execution of prisoners under sentence of the circuit court of Jefferson county.

†In the first edition this sum was "seventy" thousand dollars: by act of 1850 51, p. 33, c. 41, §9, it was increased to seventy-five thousand; and by act of 1853-4, p. 25, c. 33, §1, the sum of five thousand dollars additional was annually appropriated.

Said accounts, before being allowed, shall be sustained by proper vouchers, verified by officers in command, or shall be such accounts as were incurred in the execution of legal orders issued by competent authority. And when the said accounts are so sustained and allowed, the said commissioners are hereby authorized to direct the auditor of public accounts to issue his warrants for the several amounts thereof in behalf of those severally entitled thereto; to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated: provided, however, that no account claimed by or due to any general, field or staff officer or rail road company, shall be paid by the commissioners aforesaid; but the same shall, when audited, be reported by them to the general assembly; and in auditing any account or accounts due to any rail road company in arrear or indebted to the commonwealth, the amount due from said rail road company to the state shall be first deducted: and provided further, that if the commissioners aforesaid deem it doubtful what law of congress, under the Code of Virginia, fixes the pay of company and non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates, they shall report the fact to the general assembly: provided, however, that the appropriation hereby authorized shall not exceed the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

2. The said commissioners shall keep an accurate account 129 of all moneys allowed by them, and paid by their order. They shall ascertain also the accounts heretofore paid by orders of the executive for similar expenditures; and it shall be their duty to report both amounts to the general assembly as soon as practicable.

3. Immediately after the passage of this act, the commissioners shall advertise for the presentation of claims; and unless the same are presented within six months from the passage of this act, they shall not be considered by said commissioners.

4. The commissioners aforesaid are authorized to employ a clerk.

5. This act shall be in force from its passage.

CHAP. 28.—An ACT making an additional Appropriation to defray the Expenses incurred for the Defence of the Commonwealth.

Passed March 6, 1860 129

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, that the board created by the act entitled an act appointing commissioners to audit and pay the expense incurred by the executive for the purchase of arms and for the defence of the commonwealth, passed twenty-third January eighteen hundred and sixty, shall continue to audit the claims which they are authorized to audit and pay by said act, and to issue warrants on the treasury for the amount due and unpaid, under the limitations and restrictions imposed by said act; and for that purpose, an additional sum of seventy-five thousand dollars shall be and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

2. In the payment of any claim hereafter presented to the auditor, which has been allowed under this or the act aforesaid, no claim which shall have been assigned by the original claimant to another person prior to the passage of the joint resolution authorizing extra pay, shall be paid to any person but to the said original claimant, or his authorized agent, by an order given subsequent to the passage 130 of said resolution. But the general assembly disapprove of the principle adopted by the commission on the Harpers Ferry accounts in auditing the accounts of officers, insomuch as the allowances for horses and servants not in the service of such officers are concerned, and hereby direct the said commission to reaudit the said accounts so far as that point is concerned, and to exclude from their settlement all allowances of any kind for horses and servants not actually in the service of any officer, and all allowances for any service of a constructive nature, and not actually rendered by the officer making the claim.

3. This act shall be in force from its passage.

CHAP. 29.—An ACT making further Appropriations to pay Expenses for the Defense of the Commonwealth.

Passed March 28, 1860.

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, that the additional sum of thirty-one thousand dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of defraying the expenses incurred by the executive, in consequence of the raid on Harpers Ferry; to be expended upon the principles and under the restrictions imposed by the several acts passed at this session, making appropriations "to defray the expenses incurred for the defence of the commonwealth."

2. The commissioners appointed by the act to audit and pay the expenses incurred by the executive for the purchase of arms and for the defence of the commonwealth, passed January twenty-third, eighteen hundred and sixty, shall be and they are hereby authorized to pay all claims of officers and rail road companies which have been heretofore reported by them to the general assembly, and all claims of officers and rail road companies which may be hereafter audited by them, upon the principles and under the limitations and restrictions imposed by the said act, and by the act making an additional 131 appropriation to defray the expenses incurred for the defence of the commonwealth, passed on the eighth day of March eighteen hundred and sixty.

3. This act shall be in force from its passage.

* * * * *

Passed April 2, 1858. 4

Whereas there is some difficulty between the states of North Carolina and Virginia as to the precise point where the line dividing the two states now is: and whereas the citizens of each state immediately along the same, are equally desirous of having it more certainly fixed and established: therefore,

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, that the governor be and he is hereby authorized and required to appoint a commissioner, who, together with the commissioner who may be appointed on the part of North Carolina, shall cause the said line to be accurately surveyed, traced, and marked with stone monuments, not exceeding five miles apart, beginning at the county line dividing Pittsylvania and Henry counties, where it intersects with the North Carolina line, and thence running west to the intersection of the line of the state of Tennessee.

2. It shall be the duty of the commissioners, after running, locating, establishing and marking the said line, to make a report, setting forth all the facts touching the same, and to forward copies of the joint report to their respective legislatures. And upon ratification of such report by the legislatures of the states of North Carolina and Virginia, the said boundary line shall be fixed and established; to remain forever, unless changed by the mutual consent of the said states.

3. That the governor shall be and is hereby authorized to pay one-half of all the expense which may be incurred in running and marking said line as aforesaid, and also the sum of five dollars per day to the commissioner appointed by the executive of this state, for each day he may be engaged in performing the service, and ten cents per mile for each mile he may travel to and from his residence in going to and returning from the line aforesaid; to be paid, upon the order of the governor, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

4. This act shall be in force from its passage.

Black, for their services rendered and expenses incurred by them in running said line; and he is hereby empowered to draw his warrant on the treasury for the amount ascertained by him to be due, payable out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated; and that he be further authorized, if he shall deem it necessary, to appoint a commissioner to examine the account and take evidence in relation to the said claim for compensation and expenses.

3. Resolved, that the governor be and he is hereby authorized to appoint one or more commissioners to run again and re-mark the line between Virginia and Tennessee, in strict conformity with the compact of eighteen hundred and two, ratified by the legislature of Virginia in eighteen hundred and three; and he is authorized to allow to such commissioner or commissioners a reasonable compensation for their services.

4. Resolved, that the governor be directed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the governor of Tennessee, with a request that the authorities of that state will concur, and appoint a commissioner on their part.

No. 15.—Resolutions concerning the Boundary Line between Maryland and Virginia.

Adopted March 10, 1860. 699

Whereas the legislatures of Maryland and Virginia have each passed an act (the former, March twenty sixth, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-two, and the latter, March twenty-ninth, A. D., eighteen hundred and fifty-eight), providing for the surveying, retracing and marking of the boundary line between the two states, which runs from Watkins' Point, on the Eastern Shore, to the Atlantic ocean:

And whereas, in accordance with the provisions of said acts, Colonel Thomas J. Lee, on the part of Maryland, and Colonel Angus W. McDonald, on the part of Virginia, were appointed commissioners, jointly to have (among other things) the said line retraced, surveyed and marked, and have, with the assistance of Lieutenant N. Michler of the United States corps of engineers, assigned to that service by the war department, caused said line to be retraced, surveyed and marked, and full and elaborate plats and maps of the same made and returned to each of said states: Therefore,

1. Resolved, that suitable and permanent monuments should be erected at the termini and along said line, to perpetuate the location of the same, at the joint cost of said two states, and that Virginia's portion of such cost is provided for by the said act of March twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight.

2. And be it further resolved, that the governor of this commonwealth, if he deem it expedient, be and he is hereby authorized and requested to send to England a competent agent, and obtain from thence all record and documentary evidence tending to ascertain and establish the true lines of boundary between Virginia and the states of North Carolina, Tennessee and Maryland: The cost of such agency not to exceed two thousand dollars; provision for which is also made by said act of March twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight.

In addition to the duties before mentioned to be performed, the geologist who may be employed by virtue of this act, shall also ascertain by accurate barometical observations the height of the principal mountains in the state; and in the progress of the surveys and examinations hereby directed, shall collect and preserve all such specimens of rocks, fossils, ores, mineral compounds and organic remains, as shall tend to exemplify the general geological structure of the state, or be in any wise useful or interesting. The specimens, so far as prac-

3. Be it further enacted, That said geologist shall annually, and before the tenth day of January in each year, make report to the president and directors of the board of public works, of his progress in the work hereby authorized and required, accompanying 68

International Exchanges.

No 1.—Preamble and resolutions relative to a national interchange of productions of art, science, industry and natural history. —[Adopted March 23, 1848.] 353

Whereas the legislature of Virginia regards with interests the noble design of a national interchange of productions of art, science, industry and natural history, projected by Mons. Alexandre Vatte-mare, and patronized with such munificence by the French government, and is desirious of contributing to a work so important:

1. Resolved by the general assembly, That the spirit which has conceived this design is an admirable as the disinterested enthusiasm which has achieved it; and that this legislature, as a testimonial of its appreciation of the character and services of its distinguished author, hereby invite him to visit the halls of legislature during the session of the legislature, and hereby tender to him the appointment of agent of the state of Virginia, for conducting the exchange of such subjects as may be presented by Virginia to France.

2. Resolved, That the legislature has learned with gratitude that France, of whose prosperity we always hear with pleasure, and in whose misfortunes we always sympathize, has presented to Virginia, literary works of a rare, useful and costly character, for which it is incumbent to make some return even if inadequate.

3. Resolved, That the state librarian be instructed to forward to the agent of international exchanges such copies of the code and of the law reporters, of the journals and other legislative documents, or other works as may be spared without detriment to the library; he shall forward such reports of the moral, social and political statistics of Virginia as may tend to diffuse amongst other nations a correct knowledge of her institutions, her condition and her capacities; that he shall likewise forward any private donations intended for the department of international exchanges; and that he be required to report annually to the joint committee of the library.

2. The said treasury notes shall be made payable to the order of the person or persons to whom they are given in evidence of money borrowed, and shall also be payable at the treasury of the commonwealth not more than one year after their respective dates. From which dates, until the dates at which they are severally payable and no longer, they shall bear such interest as shall be expressed on the face of the said notes. Which rate of interest upon each several issue of the said notes shall be fixed by the governor, with the advice of the auditor of public accounts; but shall in no case exceed the rate of six per centum per annum. The said notes shall be redeemed and paid at the treasury to the holders respectively, upon the warrant of the auditor of public accounts; and the said redemption and payment shall include the principal of each note, and the interest which may be due thereon at the time of payment. For this payment and redemption, at the times and place herein specified, the faith of the commonwealth of Virginia is hereby solemnly pledged.

9. The said treasury notes shall be prepared under the direction of the governor, and shall be signed, on the part of the commonwealth, by the treasurer, and countersigned by the auditor of public accounts, from time to time, as they are delivered to the parties from whom money is borrowed, and to whose order they are made payable. And those officers respectively shall, as checks upon each other, and to secure the public safety, keep separate, full and accurate accounts of the number, date, denomination and amount of all the notes signed and countersigned by them respectively, and of the names of the persons to whose order the said notes are severally made payable. Which said amounts shall be carefully preserved and kept on file in their respective offices, and also similar accounts kept and preserved in the same manner of all the said notes redeemed, as the same shall be returned and canceled. The auditor of public accounts shall further account monthly for all notes delivered to him by the treasurer, to be countersigned for delivery. The said auditor is authorized, with the consent of the governor, to employ such additional temporary clerks as the duties enjoined on him hereby may render necessary: provided, that the expense of such clerks shall not exceed, in the aggregate, nine hundred dollars per annum. 19

* * * * *

12. A sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby appropriated annually for three years, for defraying the expense of preparing, printing, engraving and signing the treasury notes hereby authorized, and other expenses incident thereto. The plate or plates for such engraving shall be carefully preserved, as the governor may direct, and shall be destroyed when the issue of the said notes shall cease.

come, shall be subject to such future disposition as may by law be directed for the payment of the interest and redemption of the principal of the sums borrowed under the act aforesaid.

And it shall be the duty of the said proxy, if in his power, to cause to be transmitted to the said board copies of the annual and other reports of the president and directors of said company, the proceedings of the stockholders, and other interesting documents relating to the said improvement.

CHAP. 12.—An ACT providing for the negotiation of loans for purposes of internal improvement.

(Passed April 9, 1838.) 24

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, That all loans hereafter authorized by law for the payment of subscriptions on behalf of the commonwealth to the capital of joint stock companies incorporated for purposes of internal improvement, or for defraying the expense of any work of internal improvement in which the state is or may be interested, as well as all such loans heretofore authorized, shall be negotiated according to the provisions of this act, except so far as may be otherwise specially provided by the acts authorizing the loans.

2. The board of public works, in effecting such loans, shall borrow upon the credit of the commonwealth, at the lowest rate of interest at which the necessary amount can be obtained, not exceeding in any case five per centum per annum. Upon the payment of the money so borrowed into the treasury, which shall be done upon the warrant of the second auditor, the treasurer shall issue a certificate or certificates of loan for the amount thereof, purporting that the commonwealth of Virginia owes to the lender, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, the principal sum so borrowed, together with the interest at the rate agreed on, that the interest is payable semi-annually at the treasury of the commonwealth, and that such certificate or certificates were issued under authority of the special act authorizing such loans. Each certificate shall be signed by the treasurer, and countersigned by the second auditor, and be registered in a book to be kept for that purpose by the second auditor, and shall be transferrable on the books of his office in person or by attorney. All loans negotiated in conformity to this act shall be irredeemable for twenty years, but shall afterwards be redeemed at the pleasure of the general assembly.

Until such other sufficient funds shall be provided, so much of the income of the fund for internal improvement, not otherwise specially appropriated, as may be necessary to supply the deficiency, is hereby pledged for such purpose; and if at any time the dividends and other income arising from the stock or work as aforesaid, together with the income of the fund for internal improvement, shall be insufficient to pay the interest due upon the loan when demanded, the auditor of public accounts shall, upon the application of the board of public works, issue his warrant upon the treasury, directing the payment of such interest out of any moneys therein not otherwise appropriated. And in case of the inability of the treasury at any time to discharge such warrants, the board of public works shall be and they are hereby authorized to borrow the necessary amount from the banks of this state, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, on the credit of the commonwealth, to be repaid in such manner as the general assembly may by law direct.

4. The surplus dividends and other income arising from any stock or work as aforesaid, and remaining after the payment of the interest due upon the certificates issued for loans applied to such stock or work, shall from time to time be applied by the board of public works to the purchase of such certificates, if to be procured on satisfactory terms; and if not, then of any other certificates of state debt, or any other public debt or other stock which can be so purchased, which shall be held as a fund for the payment of the interest and redemption of the principal of the loans obtained for the payment of such stock or such work, and the interest accruing therefrom shall also from time to time be invested and held in like manner: and the said certificates of debt so purchased, together with the stock pledged, shall be disposed of in such manner as the general assembly may direct: Provided, That the certificates so purchased on account of any particular loan, or such part thereof as may be necessary, shall from time to time be sold by the board of public works to reimburse the fund for internal improvement for all payments of interest made out of the income for that fund on account of such loan, by virtue of this act.

5. The board of public works shall be and they are hereby fully authorized and empowered to procure any or all of the loans authorized by law, either in the United States or in Europe, as they may deem most advantageous to the public interest, and for that purpose to appoint, if they see fit, one or more agents, with the necessary powers, and to allow him or them such compensation as they may deem reasonable. In the event of a loan or loans being effected in Europe, the said board may provide for the payment of the interest on the same semi-annually, in London or elsewhere, and may stipulate for the payment by the lenders of the amount of such loans in England or elsewhere, conforming the certificates to be issued to the terms of the loans. They shall also be empowered generally to do and execute all such acts and writings as may be necessary to complete the said loans, and to cause the prompt payment of the amount thereof into the public treasury.

6. Be it further enacted, That the person or persons, body or 26 bodies politic or corporate, in whose names any of the certificates of the public debt of this commonwealth shall be issued, in conformity to the provisions of this act, shall be deemed as to the commonwealth the owner of the said stock until a transfer shall be duly made on the books of the second auditor, or other proper officer, to some other person or body politic or corporate. And if the person or body politic or corporate, in whose name the said certificate shall stand, shall for valuable consideration, and bona fide, sell and deliver the said stock to any other person, body politic or corporate, accompanied by a power of attorney duly executed and authenticated, such sale and delivery shall vest in the transferree all the title of the transferrer, either in law or equity, to the said certificate; and upon the application of the attorney, and delivery of the certificate of debt therein assigned to the second auditor, or other proper officer of the commonwealth, it shall be his duty to transfer the same, and issue a new certificate or certificates therefor in the name of the transferree: Provided, however, That all payments made by the commonwealth prior to such transfer, on account of the interest on such certificate, shall discharge the commonwealth from all claim on account of the interest so paid.

7. If any person, in whose name the said stock shall stand on the books of the commonwealth, shall die without having made a sale or transfer thereof, and his executor or administrator shall produce to the second auditor, or other proper officer, the original certificate or certificates of the said stock, and duly authenticated evidence that he is, by the laws of the country in which such holder may have died, the lawful executor or administrator of such holder, the second auditor shall, on his application in person, or by power of attorney duly authenticated, transfer the said stock to the said executor or administrator, or to such person as he may direct.

8. Whenever any certificate of stock created in pursuance of the provisions of this act, or by authority of any previous act, for purposes of internal improvement, shall have been lost by the holder or holders thereof, it shall and may be lawful for the second auditor and treasurer to renew the same in the manner mentioned in this act: Provided, however, That such certificate shall not be renewed until the party applying for the same shall produce satisfactory proof of his having advertised the same for at least three months previously to his application; shall execute a bond with sufficient security, to the treasurer and his successors, conditioned to indemnify the commonwealth against any loss in consequence of the renewal of such certificate, and shall moreover file an affidavit, setting forth the time, place and circumstances of the loss aforesaid.

9. It shall be lawful for any bank incorporated in this commonwealth, through its proper officers, and by the authority, and under the direction of the said board, to act as the agent of the board of public works in negotiating, obtaining or contracting for any loan which may be so authorized, and to do all necessary acts for the transfer of the proceeds of such loan into the public treasury, in specie or other satisfactory funds, by bills of exchange or otherwise, and to make on behalf of the said board the necessary arrangements for the punctual and regular payment of the interest on such loan, according to the terms of the contract therefor.

10. And whereas, should large sums be borrowed, of which a 27 considerable part would necessarily lie idle until required for the purposes for which the loans may be respectively designed, whereby a great loss of interest would be incurred, the board of public works may deposite the same with the banks of this commonwealth, at such rate of interest as may be agreed upon by the board and said banks. The said board may also lend such part thereof to joint stock companies, as the said companies may be entitled by law to receive from them at subsequent periods, on such conditions and security as the board may deem expedient.

11. This act shall be in force from its passage.

CHAP. 86.—An ACT to provide for further subscriptions on the part of the state to the Exchange bank and Northwestern bank of Virginia.

(Passed March 19, 1839.) 52

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, That the treasurer of this commonwealth shall be, and he is hereby required to subscribe for four thousand five hundred shares of stock in the Exchange bank of Virginia on behalf of the commonwealth, and shall pay up, at par value, the entire amount of so many shares so subscribed for, as shall be equal in number to the shares fully paid up by subscribers other than the state, and shall also pay on the residue of the additional shares so subscribed for by him, as much as may, from time to time, be paid on a like number of shares by individuals other than the state, not exceeding, however, one hundred dollars per share; and for the purpose of paying such subscription, it shall be lawful for the treasurer, from time to time, to borrow upon the credit of the state, the amount required upon each payment so to be made, and to issue a certificate or certificates of loan to the lender for the amounts so borrowed, stating therein that the commonwealth owes the principal sums specified in such certificate or certificates with legal interest payable at the treasury semi-annually, and redeemable after twenty years, in whole or in part, at the pleasure of the commonwealth. Such certificates shall be made and signed by the treasurer of the commonwealth, and countersigned by the auditor of public accounts, and shall be transferrable in his office in the manner prescribed by law, for the transfer of certificates of loan issued for the purposes of internal im- 53
provement. And the general assembly hereby pledges itself to provide adequate funds for the redemption of the principal sums hereby authorized to be borrowed, and for the payment of the interest accruing thereon, at the time it shall become due: Provided, That the commonwealth shall receive upon the stock which may be hereafter subscribed in its name, such proportion of the dividends afterwards declared, as the period of time between the subscription and the making of the dividends, shall bear to the term of six months.

2. Be it further enacted, That to enable the treasurer of the commonwealth to pay up the state's subscription to the Northwestern bank of Virginia, heretofore made, he is hereby authorized to borrow upon the credit of the state, the amount required to complete the same, and to issue a certificate or certificates of loan to the lender for the amount so borrowed, stating therein that the commonwealth owes the principal sums specified in such certificate or certificates, with legal interest, payable at the treasury of the commonwealth and redeemable after twenty years, in whole or in part, at the pleasure of the commonwealth; such certificate shall be made and signed, countersigned and transferrable in the same manner, and upon the same terms and conditions in all respects, as is herein provided for the payment of the additional stock to the Exchange bank of Virginia; and the general assembly doth hereby pledge itself to provide adequate funds for the redemption of the principal sums authorized to be borrowed by this section, and for the payment of the interest accruing thereon, at the time it shall become due.

thirty cents, the ascertained debt of the commonwealth on the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two. The sum so set apart shall be called the "Sinking Fund," and shall be applied to the payment of the interest on the state debt and the principal of such part as may be redeemable; and if no part of said debt be redeemable, then the residue of the sinking fund, after the payment of such interest, shall be invested in the bonds or certificates of the commonwealth, or of the United States, or of some of the states of the Union, and applied to the payment of said debt as it shall become redeemable.

2. Whenever after the said first day of January eighteen hundred and fifty-two, a debt shall be contracted by the commonwealth, there shall be set apart, in like manner, annually for thirty-four years, a sum exceeding by one per cent. the aggregate amount of the annual interest agreed to be paid thereon at the time of its contraction, which sum shall be part of the sinking fund, and shall be applied in the manner hereinbefore directed.

3. If at any time the legislature shall direct a sale of the stocks held by the commonwealth in internal improvement and other companies, the proceeds of such sale, if made before the payment of the public debt, shall constitute a part of the sinking fund, and be applied in like manner. The sinking fund, and its accruing interest, shall not be otherwise appropriated than is herein directed, except in time of war, insurrection and invasion.

4. It shall be the duty of the auditor of public accounts, upon the receipt of statements of the amount of the public debt hereinafter required to be furnished him by the second auditor, to pay into the treasury of the commonwealth, on or before the first day of January eighteen hundred and fifty-three, and annually thereafter, out of the accruing revenues, such portion of the sum set apart for the sinking fund provided by this act, as shall be applied to the redemption of the state debt existing on the first of January eighteen hundred and fifty-two. He shall, in like manner, pay into the treasury, to the credit of the said, fund, on or before the first day of January eighteen hundred and fifty-three, and first day of July eighteen hundred and fifty-three, and on the same days of each successive year, the amount of the semi-annual interest on said debt which shall be due and payable at each respective date.

5. It shall also be his duty, in like manner, to pay into the treasury, on or before the first day of January eighteen hundred and fifty-three, and annually for thirty-three years thereafter, out of the accruing revenues of the state, to the credit of the sinking fund, one per centum on the aggregate amount of debt contracted by the state between the first day of January eighteen hundred and fifty-two and said day; and also to pay, in like manner, one per centum annually for thirty-four years on the aggregate amount of debt which shall be contracted in each or any subsequent year. He shall pay, in like manner, into the treasury, to the credit of the said fund, on or before the first day of January and first day of July eighteen hundred and fifty-three, and on the same days in each successive year thereafter, the amount of the semi-annual interest which shall be due and payable on the aggregate amount of such additional debts at those days respectively: provided however, that the amount of the interest payable on that part of the debt created by the issue of coupon bonds, shall be set apart and paid into the treasury to the credit of said fund, thirty days in advance of the respective semi-annual periods on which it shall become due.

6. For the purpose of managing, preserving and applying the sinking fund created by this act, the auditor of public accounts, register and secretary of the commonwealth, for the time being, are hereby constituted a corporate body under the style of "The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund."

7. It shall be their duty to apply the moneys appropriated out of the said fund to the payment of the interest and redemption of the principal of the state debt at the respective periods prescribed in the fourth and fifth sections of this act for the payment of the sinking fund into the treasury by the auditor of public accounts, and to invest any part of the appropriations for the latter purpose, which cannot be so applied to the purchase of public stock, agreeably to the provisions of the second and third sections of this act.

8. The said commissioners, at their discretion, may apply that part of the sinking fund set apart for the redemption of the principal of the debt, to the payment in the first place of such bonds and certificates as the state is bound to redeem at fixed periods, provided such bonds and certificates shall be redeemable by the state before the arrival of such fixed periods.

9. All the certificates of debt which shall be redeemed under this act, shall be canceled by the second auditor, and delivered by him to the treasurer of the commonwealth at the time of payment therefor, who shall carefully preserve the same in his office.

10. At each period for the payment of the installment of interest and the redemption of any part of the principal of the debt, the said commissioners shall, by a special order entered on the minutes of their proceedings, authorize the second auditor to issue his warrants on the treasury, from time to time, to the persons entitled thereto, in the same manner as they have heretofore been paid in his office.

11. They shall cause to be published in the Enquirer and Whig of the city of Richmond, and in the Union and National Intelligencer of Washington city, a list of the bonds or certificates intended to be redeemed from time to time, at least three months previously to the time fixed upon by them for that purpose, showing the date, number and amount of each, and calling for the surrender thereof on or before a specified day, and stating that the interest thereon will cease on and after that day.

12. Any two of said commissioners may form a board for the transaction of business. They may appoint a secretary, and shall keep a correct journal of their proceedings, of which they shall make a report to each regular session of the legislature. They shall hold their meetings in the second auditor's office, in which their books and papers shall be deposited for safe keeping.

13. It shall be the duty of the second auditor to prepare the necessary statements, showing the amount of the semi-annual interest payable on the public debt at each successive period, and the amount of the principal of the debt proposed to be redeemed at each or either of them, and to furnish the same to the commissioners of the sinking fund, by whom they shall, if approved, be certified to the auditor of public accounts for his government. He shall also prepare and deliver to the commissioners of the sinking fund, lists in detail of such bonds or certificates of state debt as they shall from time to time designate, for redemption, and furnish them with such other statements and information as they may at any time require of him. He shall keep the accounts of the sinking fund with the treasury in such manner as to show distinctly at all times the amount of the transactions, on account of each appropriate head of receipts and expenditures, and shall report the same to each session of the legislature.

14. All moneys belonging to the sinking fund shall be paid into the treasury on the warrant of the second auditor, and shall be paid out in like manner when authorized by the commission of said fund.

15. The treasurer shall receive and pay the moneys belonging to the sinking fund as herein required. He shall keep a distinct account of the same, and report to each session of the legislature the aggregate receipts and disbursements on account thereof up to the first of October or first of January, as the case may be, preceding each session of the legislature, and the balance remaining unexpended at such time.

16. In order to collect in one office the accounts of the debt of the commonwealth and the transaction of all business connected therewith, it is hereby provided that the existing certificates of debt of the state, registered in the office of the auditor of public accounts, and amounting to four hundred and fifty thousand one hundred and seven dollars, being part and remainder of the debt created by authority of an act to provide for the further subscriptions on the part of the state to the Exchange Bank and Northwestern Bank of Virginia, passed March the nineteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, shall, on and after the twentieth of December next, be registered and transferred to the second auditor's office, and the semi-annual interest accruing thereon shall be paid at the treasury out of the sinking fund, on his warrants, on and after the first day of January eighteen hundred and fifty-three, until the said certificates shall be redeemed. The new certificates issued on transfers of said stock shall be countersigned by him; and all other duties which are imposed on the auditor of public accounts, as well as any rights conferred in relation to said certificates of debt, shall, on and after the above day, be transferred to and devolve upon the second auditor, in whose office all the books and papers connected with said stock, which shall be necessary for the proper performance of said duties, shall be delivered to said second auditor: provided, that the amount of the semi-annual installment of interest of the first of July eighteen hundred and fifty-two, and the unclaimed interest on said debt, which shall remain due and unpaid on the first of January eighteen hundred and fifty-three, shall be set apart and paid to the persons entitled thereto by the auditor of public accounts, in the manner, and out of the appropriations made by the laws now existing, and not out of the sinking fund herein provided.

17. The accruing interest on the six per cent. revolutionary debt of twenty-four thousand and thirty-nine dollars and seventeen cents, and the seven per cent, war debt of eighteen hundred and fourteen, of three hundred and nineteen thousand dollars, belonging to the Literary fund, shall continue to be paid, when it becomes due, as heretofore, out of the public revenue, upon the warrant of the auditor of public accounts.

18. The semi-annual installment of interest payable the first day of July eighteen hundred and fifty-two, on the aggregate internal improvement debt, registered at that date in the second auditor's office, shall be provided for and paid, as heretofore directed by law, on the warrant of the second auditor, and should that be insufficient, the deficiency to be paid out of the public treasury; and any portion of the said installment or previous installments which shall remain unclaimed and unpaid on the first day of January eighteen hundred and fifty-three, shall be paid in the same manner, from time to time, as it shall be applied for.

19. The semi-annual interest becoming due at the same time, on that part of the state debt ofeighteen hundred and thirty-nine, registered in the office of the auditor of public accounts, shall, together with the unclaimed interest due thereon, be paid out of the public treasury on the warrant of said auditor: provided, that no part of the interest on the stock of either description above referred to shall be paid out of the sinking fund.

20. It shall be the duty of the Board of public works to cause to be paid into the treasury, to the credit of the commonwealth, on the first day of January and first day of July one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three, or within thirty days after such dates, and semi-annually thereafter, the net surplus revenue of the Fund for internal improvement during each half year preceding those days respectively, after deducting the fixed and incidental charges and special appropriations made by law on the revenue of said fund: provided, however, that nothing in this act is intended to discharge the said board from the obligation to pay the future semi-annual installments of the interest on the certificates of the internal improvement debt owned and held by the Literary fund, as they shall hereafter become payable on and after the said first day of January eighteen hundred and fifty-three; but said interest shall be duly paid or set apart as a charge on said revenue before such surplus shall be ascertained and paid over as herein directed.

CHAP. VIII.

An Act to Provide for the Education of the Poor.

[Passed February 12, 1811.]

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That all sums of money which have accrued, or may hereafter accrue to the literary fund established by an act, entitled an act, to appropriate certain escheats, penalties, confiscations and forfeitures to the encouragement of learning, shall be, and the same are hereby vested in the following persons, to wit: The governor, lieutenant governor, treasurer, attorney general and president of the court of appeals of this commonwealth for the time being, and they and their successors are hereby constituted a body politic and corporate under the denomination of the president and directors of the literary fund, with power to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and to hold lands and tenements, goods and chattels, and the same to sell, dispose of or im-

And the said commissioners, or any three of them shall have power to constitute a board for the transacting of all buisness relative to the said fund, of which board, when present, the governor shall be president, and they shall have power to appoint a clerk without their own body, and such other officers as they may deem necessary, and 9 to make such rules and regulations for the better ordering of their proceedings as to them may seem meet; Provided they be not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of this commonwealth. And the said president and directors shall report to the general assembly once in every year the state of the funds committed to their charge, with such recommendations with regard to the improvement thereof, as to them shall seem advisable.

2. And be it further enacted, That in further aid of the said fund, the said president and directors are hereby empowered to raise annually for a term of years not exceeding seven, by lottery, any sum not exceeding thirty thousand dollars. 4. And be it further enacted, That as soon as a sufficient fund shall be provided for the purpose, it shall be the duty of the directors thereof to provide a school or schools for the education of the poor in each and every county of the commonwealth.

5. And whereas by an act, entitled an act to appropriate certain escheats, penalties, confiscations and forfeitures to the encouragement of learning, it is provided, that the literary fund herein mentioned shall be appropriated to the sole benefit of schools to be kept in each and every county in this commonwealth, an object equally humane, just and necessary, involving alike the interests of humanity and the preservation of the constitution, laws and liberty of the good people of this commonwealth; the present general assembly solemnly protest against any other application of the said funds by any succeeding general assembly to any other object than the education of the poor.

6. This act shall commence and be in force from the passing thereof.

CHAP. 20—An ACT amending and reducing into one the several acts concerning the re-organization of the Lexington arsenal and the establishment therewith of a military school at Washington college.

Passed March 29, 1839.

Whereas it is represented to the general assembly, that the state arsenal situated near the town of Lexington, in the county of Rockbridge, can be advantageously converted into a public military school without endangering the public arms, or other property, thereto belonging, and without imposing any additional expense upon the commonwealth:

1. Be it therefore enacted, That the sum of six thousand dollars, be and the same is hereby appropriated annually from the public treasury for the establishment and support of a military school at the said arsenal, upon the plan hereinafter provided for, which said school shall be called the "Virginia Military Institute."

2. Be it further enacted, That the governor of this commonwealth shall annually appoint nine fit and proper persons, who, together with the adjutant general shall constitute a board of visitors for said military school, any four of whom shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of the mere ordinary business, but in making arrangements for the erection of buildings, or for material and permanent alterations of the present buildings, as well as the removal of professors from office, not less than six shall constitute a quorum. And it shall be the duty of said visitors on or before the first day of June next, and annually thereafter, at such times as they themselves shall designate, to meet at said arsenal, and there to establish and declare such regulations as they may deem necessary and proper for the organization and good government of said school. Said visitors shall have power to establish such by-laws for the management of the school, and the protection of the public property, as shall not be inconsistent with the laws of this state, or of the United States; shall appoint a treasurer, taking from him bond with ample security, made payable to the governor, and his successors in office, and conditioned for the faithful keeping and disbursement of such moneys herein appropriated, and such other moneys as shall be allowed by said visitors, from time to time, to come into his hands; they shall also examine and settle his accounts an- 18
nually or oftener; inspect the public arms and other property, at said arsenal, and make minute and full report of their condition, as well as the condition of the school to the governor, to be by him laid before the general assembly; shall have power to appoint one or more professors qualified to give instruction in military science, and in other branches of knowledge, which they the said managers may deem essential; to fix the salaries of said professors, and to remove them for a good cause; but in every case of removal, a majority of the whole number of visitors shall concur, and shall communicate to the governor in writing, a full statement of the reasons upon which the removal was made. Besides prescribing the general terms upon which students may be admitted, the course of their instruction, the kind and duration of their service, (which duration shall not exceed five, nor be less than two years,) the said visitors are still further empowered to admit as the regular students or cadets at said military school any number of young men not fewer than twenty, nor exceeding forty, and who shall not be less than sixteen nor more than twenty-five years of age; and in this admission to be made upon undoubted evidence of fair moral character, a strict regard shall be had to the proportionate population of the four great constitutional divisions of the state, taking in the first place one from each senatorial district offering one, so that the relative claims of each one to a due participation in the benefits of said school may be secured; but in the event of any of the constitutional divisions of the state not furnishing their full proportions of students, the board of visitors after having given due notice of such deficiency, shall be and are hereby authorized to fill such vacancy or vacancies, with proper applications from any other of the constitutional divisions of the state. The students at the school thus admitted shall be formed into a military corps, and shall constitute the public guard of the arsenal aforesaid. And whenever the said visitors shall certify to the governor that the said school is ready to go into operation, and that a sufficient number of students or cadets have been admitted, to guard effectually the public arms, and other property at the said arsenal, the governor shall forthwith disband the present public guard, and order the grounds, buildings, arms and all other property belonging to said arsenal, to be surrendered to said visitors, or to any one thereof, who may have been designated by them to receive such surrender. And the said professors and military students shall be collectively and individually responsible for the safe keeping, protection and preservation of the said grounds, buildings, arms and other property, in all respects, as the commandant, other officers and public guard are now responsible.

3. Any three of the visitors may form a board for the transaction of business, and all vacancies occurring from death, removal, refusal to act or otherwise, shall be immediately communicated by the residue of said visitors to the governor, who shall forthwith proceed to supply them. All reasonable expenses incurred by said visitors in discharging the duties hereby imposed upon them, (not including however any wages or per diem compensation,) shall be allowed, and when admitted by the governor, shall by him be caused to be paid by warrant on the treasury.

4. Any commissioned officer of the militia of Virginia, may enter as a pupil the school hereby established for a period of time not exceeding ten months, and receive instruction in any- 19 or all of the departments of military science, therein taught, without being required to pay any fee or charge whatsoever, but such officer shall not be recognized as a regular student, and as such admitted to the further privileges hereafter provided for.

5. And whereas it is believed by the general assembly, that some auxiliary connexion between the arsenal hereby erected into a public school, and Washington college, which is situated in its vicinity, might be established, and in such way as to promote the purposes and benefits of instruction, in both: Be it therefore enacted, That the visitors aforesaid shall have full power to enter into any legal arrangement with the trustees of said Washington college, by which the students at the arsenal and those at the college may respectively be admitted to all the advantages and departments of instruction provided for at either place, and upon such terms as said parties shall mutually stipulate, and which terms may from time to time be varied, or may be revoked as the parties may mutually determine.

6. That it shall be lawful for the board of visitors to expend so much of the appropriation herein provided, as may be proper for the repair and erection of such buildings as may be necessary for the accommodation of officers and students of said military school. Said board of visitors shall be and are hereby authorized to contract for and have erected, at such time as they may deem proper and necessary, such additional building or buildings: Provided however, That such expenditure shall not exceed one thousand dollars annually for the first three years, and in any subsequent year shall not exceed the sum of five hundred dollars.

7. The act, entitled, "an act re-organizing the Lexington arsenal, and establishing a military school in connexion with Washington college," passed March the twenty-second, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, is hereby repealed.

8. This act shall be in force from the passing thereof.

CHAP. 15.—An ACT providing for the erection of a steward's house, and for furnishing a supply of water for the Virginia military institute.

[Passed March 6, 1840.] 26

Whereas it is represented to the general assembly, that a reorganization of the Lexington arsenal has taken place, agreeably to the provisions of the act passed March the twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, entitled "an act to reorganize the Lexington arsenal, and to establish a military school thereat," and that a military school is now in successful operation; and whereas it is represented by the board of visitors, as well as by the principal professor of the Virginia military institute, that a house for the steward and his family is greatly needed, as also a supply of good water within the enclosure of said institute:

1. Be it therefore enacted, That the sum of four thousand five hundred dollars be and is hereby appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, which sum shall be applied to the erection of a steward's house, the conveying of water by iron pipes to the institution, and to such other purposes as the board of visitors may consider necessary to its prosperity: Provided nevertheless, That the said sum of four thousand five hundred dollars shall be paid by the warrant of the first auditor on the treasury in three payments, as follows: fifteen hundred dollars in the present year, fifteen hundred dollars in the year eighteen hundred and forty-one, and fifteen hundred dollars in the year eighteen hundred and forty-two: And provided also, That no money shall be expended under this act, until a contract or contracts shall have been made to complete the several works herein provided for, so that the entire cost thereof shall not exceed the above mentioned sum.

2. This act shall be in force from the passing thereof.

CHAP. 27.—An ACT providing for the erection of a magazine and shelter for artillery at the Virginia military institute.

Whereas it is represented to the general assembly that a magazine for the safe-keeping of powder is necessary, as well to the security of the public property as to the safety of the professors and cadets of the Virginia military institute, and that a shelter for the artillery at that post is also necessary for its preservation:

1. Be it therefore enacted, That a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars shall be and is hereby appropriated for the erection of the said buildings; the work to be contracted for by the superintendent of the institute, with the sanction of the board of visitors, upon whose certificate of the execution and cost of the work, the auditor shall issue his warrant or warrants for the amount, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

2. This act shall be in force from the passing thereof.

CHAP. 17.—An ACT concerning the Virginia military institute, the University, and the colleges of the commonwealth.

[Passed March 7, 1848.] 18

Whereas it is represented to the general assembly by the board of visitors of the Virginia military institute, that they have been constrained to provide a residence for the additional professor authorized by the act of the last session of the general assembly; and also, that a small but convenient hospital should be erected for said institute:

1. Be it therefore enacted, That for the purpose of erecting a house for said professor, and for the purpose of erecting a hospital at said institute, the sum of four thousand five hun- 19
dred dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, payable out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the treasurer of the said institute: Provided, That the money hereby appropriated shall be so expended as to fully complete and finish the buildings hereby authorized to be erected.

* * * * *

CHAP. 19.— An ACT making an appropriation for the erection of new barracks at the Virginia military Institute.

[Passed March 8, 1850.]

Whereas it appears to the general assembly, by various reports of the board of visitors of the Virginia military institute, that the buildings occupied as quarters for the cadets are wholly inadequate in extent, are unsuitable in their construction for the purposes of a military school, are in a dilapidated and uncomfortable condition, exposing the health of the cadets and subjecting the large amount of public property in the arsenal to destruction by fire, and that improvements in regard to other buildings and to the grounds and enclosures are absolutely necessary: 17

1. Be it therefore enacted by the general assembly, That the sum of eleven thousand five hundred dollars a year for four years shall be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be applied to the construction of suitable buildings for quarters for the cadets and for other purposes, as specified in the report of the board of visitors of the fifteenth September, eighteen hundred and forty-nine; this appropriation to be drawn upon the order of the board of visitors from time to time, after contracts have been made and approved by the said board for the said buildings and improvements.

2. This act shall be in force from its passage.

CHAP. 20.—An ACT appropriating the public revenue for the fiscal year 1851 and 1852.

[Passed June 5, 1852.] 20

* * * military school at Lexington, for support, seven thousand, seven hundred and ten dollars; and for balance of appropriation for erection of new barracks, under the act of eleventh of March, eighteen hundred and fifty, five thousand dollars; * * *

CHAP. 34.—An ACT making provision for additional accommodation for the cadets of the Virginia military institute.

[Passed May 29, 1852.] 29

Whereas it is represented by the board of visitors of the Virginia military institute that the quarters provided in the new barracks erected under the act of March eighth, one thousand eight hundred and fifty, are insufficient to accommodate the additional state and pay cadets designed to be admitted, and an addition of funds is needed for this purpose, and also to meet the cost of the improved heating and lighting arrangements introduced by the board of visitors:

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, That the sum of thirty thousand dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated, from any funds in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for these purposes, and the auditor of public accounts is hereby instructed to issue his warrant for the same, upon the order of the president of the board of visitors.

2. Be it further enacted, That so much of the first section of the act, entitled "an act appropriating the public revenue," passed March seventh, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one, as appropriates the sum of twenty-three thousand dollars to the military school at Lexington for erecting new barracks, be and the same is hereby repealed.

3. This act shall be in force from its passage.

CHAP. 42.—An ACT providing for the completion of the barracks and the erection of a mess hall at the Virginia military institute.

Passed March 1, 1854. 31

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, that the sum of twenty thousand dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing the barracks and erecting a mess-house at the Virginia military institute, to be paid in installments of five thousand dollars each: the first to be paid on the first day of April eighteen hunderd and fifty-four; the second, on the first day of June, eighteen hunderd and fifty-four; the third, on the first day of August eighteen hundred and fifty-four; and the fourth, on the first day of October eighteen hundred and fifty-four.

2. The expenditure of the appropriation herein authorized shall be made under the supervision of an architect to be appointed by the board of visitors.

3. This act shall be in force from its passage.

CHAP. 162.—An ACT making an appropriation to the Virginia military institute for the purpose of completing its buildings, enclosing its grounds and procuring a supply of water for said institute.

Passed March 31, 1858. 115

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, that the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars be and is hereby appropriated to the Virginia military institute out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended as follows: Sixteen thousand dollars to meet the deficiency in the building fund and complete the barracks and mess hall; six thousand for procuring a supply of water for the institution, and three thousand for enclosing the grounds; but not more than ten thousand dollars of the appropriation herein made shall be called for in any one of the two fiscal years ending on the thirtieth of September eighteen hundred and fifty-nine.

2. Before any part of the money herein appropriated shall be expended for the objects severally specified, except the sum of ten thousand dollars to meet the present deficiency in the building fund, the board of visitors shall obtain from competent men, practically acquainted with such matters, in no wise connected with the said institution, plans and estimates of cost for each item of expenditure; and if the estimated cost shall not exceed the sums herein specified for each of the objects contemplated, and are approved by the board, the work shall be contracted for by the board, and executed under the supervision of the superintendent of the said institution: provided, that it shall be the duty of the board to contract for such work at the lowest price for plain and substantial constructions suitable to said several objects, and shall not under any circumstances exceed the amounts thereto respectively appropriated, or pledge the faith and credit of the state in any manner to pay a greater sum therefor than is herein specially provided: and provided further, that if more work is done than is contemplated by this act, or at a cost greater than that therein specified, the said superintendent alone shall be responsible therefor. 116

3. Nothing in this act is to be construed as an approval of the board of visitors in exceeding the appropriations heretofore made to the military institute; and it is the express intent and purpose of the general assembly that no contract shall be entered into for any work or object contained in this act, unless the same is strictly limited to an amount not exceeding the sums respectively designated for such work or object.

4. This act shall be in force from its passage.

CHAP. 7.—An ACT making an additional appropriation to the Virginia Military Institute.

Passed March 28, 1860.

1. Whereas it is represented to the general assembly of Virginia, by the board of visitors of the Virginia military institute, that the present buildings at the said institute are insufficient for the purposes of the school as a military organization, and that additional appropriations are absolutely required to provide additional accommodations for cadets and for the support of the school: and it appearing further, that the corps of cadets, in the course of their regular military education, may readily be employed to prepare such munitions of war as may be demanded by the wants of the state:

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, that the sum of twenty thousand dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated from any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of such additional buildings as may, in the judgment of the board of visitors, be demanded for giving effect to the purposes of this act: the same to be drawn in two annual payments—one-half in eighteen hundred and sixty, and the other half in eighteen hundred and sixty-one, upon the order of the board of visitors aforesaid.

2. The board of visitors shall admit, as state cadets, free of charge for board and tuition, not less than fifty young men, in lieu of the number now required, with the qualifications now prescribed by law, one of whom shall be selected from each of the senatorial districts as at present constituted. Whenever a vacancy has occurred, or is likely to occur, due notice of the time and place of making the appointment to supply the vacancy shall be given. If, after such notice, no suitable person shall apply from any district, the vacancy may be supplied from the state at large. And for the purpose of providing a fund for the support of the state cadets herein required to be admitted, the additional sum of five thousand seven hundred and ninety dollars is hereby appropriated annually; and the auditor of public accounts is hereby authorized and required to issue his warrant or warrants 104 on the treasury for the same, in the manner that other warrants to the said institute have been heretofore issued.

3. This act shall be in force from its passage.

Be it enacted by the general assembly that the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated to the University of Virginia, for the purpose of repairing and improving the buildings thereof, and for furnishing a supply of water for the protection and preservation of the said buildings and other valuable property of the institution.

2. The appropriation hereby directed shall be paid out of the treasury of the commonwealth, upon the order of the bursar of the university, on the auditor of public accounts, and shall be applied to the purposes named in the first section of this act, and to none others whatsoever.

3. This act shall be in force from its passage.

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly, That the superintendent of public buildings be and he is hereby authorized and required to contract, on behalf of the commonwealth, for such repairs to the capitol in the city of Richmond, as in the opinion of the said superintendent may be deemed necessary for the preservation and good appearance of the building, including stuccoing, plastering, carpenter's work, painting, stone masonry, and any other description of mechanical labour which may be necessary to effect that object; and to make a suitable communication between F street and the capitol square, at the northern end of the Museum, or other suitable place at or near thereto: also for such alterations in the ground floor of the building, as may be calculated to improve the condition of the public offices, and preserve the public records and papers deposited therein: and it shall be the duty of the said superintendent to cause the stoves now in the hall of the house of delegates to be removed, and to substitute therefor either suitable fire places or open stoves, to be placed in such parts of the hall as will more comfortably and effectually warm the same; and also to make such alterations in the fire-places in the senate chamber as may be necessary, or to substitute Franklin stoves therefor; also to purchase a neat and substantial chandelier for the use of said hall, and also one for the use of the senate chamber. The said superintendent shall, in such manner as the governor may direct, cause to be fitted up and put in good order a room for the office of the clerk of the senate, and also a room for the office of the clerk of the house of delegates, for the preservation of the books and papers belonging to their respective offices: Provided, however, That the expenditures for all the said repairs and improvements, shall not exceed the sum of ten thousand five hundred dollars.

2. Be it further enacted, That any contract made by the superintendent, under the authority of this act, shall be submitted to the governor and be approved by him, before any such contract shall be binding on the commonwealth, and that it shall be the duty of the said superintendent to superintend the execution of the work hereby authorized, and see that the same be faithfully performed according to contract. All accounts for the repairs and improvements hereby required to be made, shall be certified by the superintendent of public buildings and approved by the governor, whereupon they shall be paid out of the treasury on the auditor's warrant for the same.

3. This act shall be in force from and after the passage thereof.

Whereupon the auditor of public accounts shall, upon the production to him of such deed or deeds, duly certified by the clerk of the proper court, as having been admitted to record in his office, accompanied by a certificate from the executive that all the preliminaries of the conveyance have been fully complied with, issue his warrant or warrants on the treasury, in favour of the grantor or grantors, or their order, or their heirs or assigns, their executors or administrators, for the amount of such purchase money, payable out of any money therein not otherwise appropriated. 7. The said directors shall, so soon as the hospital hereby established, shall be finished, give notice thereof by advertisement in some paper printed in the city of Richmond, to be published thirty days; a copy whereof shall be sent, under the direction of the Executive, to every county and corporation court of this Commonwealth; upon the receipt whereof, it shall be the duty of all magistrates or courts, having custody of or jurisdiction over persons of unsound mind, to have all such as may be confined in the county jails or elsewhere, (for want of room in the present public hospital,) removed to the hospital hereby established. And in all cases that may afterwards occur west of the Blue Ridge, wherein it may be necessary to remove persons of unsound mind, they shall be removed to the hospital hereby established, so long as it can conveniently receive them. If it be full, they shall be sent to the hospital now at Williamsburg. And, so long as the latter hospital cannot conveniently receive any persons that may be sent to it, such persons shall be sent to the hospital hereby established, from whatever part of the Commonwealth they may come. When the hospital at Williamsburg can conveniently receive them, all such persons east of the Blue Ridge shall be sent thither.

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That the sum of twelve thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise disposed of, toward the completion of the Western Lunatic Hospital, to be paid by instalments, as the progress of the work may require: And the Auditor of Public Accounts is hereby required to issue a warrant on the Treasury, to the order of the Court of Directors for the said hospital, for such sum as the said court may from time to time deem necessary, so as not to exceed the appropriation aforesaid.

3. This act shall commence and be in force from and after the passing thereof.

CHAPTER 7.—An act concerning the Western Lunatic Hospital.

Whereas, it is represented to this General Assembly, by the court of directors of the Western Lunatic Hospital, that the land purchased by them is not sufficient for the humane purposes of the institution:

1. Be it therefore enacted, That the said court of directors be, and they are hereby authorised, if they shall deem it expedient, having a due regard to economy, to procure by purchase, an additional quantity of land, adjoining the present lot, not exceeding six acres: But if they, the said president and directors of the Western Lunatic Hospital, shall be unable to procure the said quantity of land, situate as aforesaid, on terms by them deemed fair and reasonable, they may proceed to have the same condemned for the purpose aforesaid, by applying to the county court of Augusta, for a writ of ad quod damnum; having given ten days previous notice to the proprietor thereof, if he be found in the county, and if not, then to his agent, if any he hath, which court shall thereupon order their clerk to issue such writ, to be directed to the sheriff, commanding him to summon and impannel twelve fit persons, to meet upon the lands so proposed to be condemned for the use of the said Hospital, on a certain day to be named by the court, and inserted in the said writ, of which notice shall be given by the sheriff to the proprietor or his agent as before directed. The freeholders taken, shall be charged by the said sheriff impartially and to the best of their skill and judgment, to view the lands so situate as aforesaid, and to locate and circumscribe by certain metes and bounds six acres thereof, or any smaller quantity, as desired by the said president and directors, and to appraise the same according to its true value. The inquest so made and sealed by the said jurors, together with the said writ, shall by the said sheriff be returned to the succeeding court, who shall thereupon order summonses to be issued to the several persons, proprietors or tenants of the lands so located, to shew cause why the same shall not be condemned for the use aforesaid. If on such inquest, or other evidence, it shall appear to the court, that the valuation of the said lands, has been just and reasonable, and the location has been properly made, they shall order the same to be recorded, whereupon the said president and directors of the Western Lunatic Hospital, shall out of any funds which are or may be appropriated for the completion of the said Hospital, make payment of such assessed valuation, to the proprietor or proprietors thereof, according to the said inquest, and the land so located shall vest in the Commonwealth absolutely, for the uses and purposes aforesaid.

2. This act shall commence and be in force from and after the passage thereof.

IN THE

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. , ORIGINAL.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

BRIEF ON BEHALF OF THE BONDHOLDING CREDITORS OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA.

The Case.

In the first quarter of the nineteenth century the Commonwealth of Virginia entered upon a system of public internal improvements which, it was contemplated, should include the entire territory of the State. This system embraced in its design the construction of graded roads, bridges, canals, and railways, extending through the State from tidewater toward the Ohio river, and adapted not to the needs of any one region of the State only, but of the State as a unit in interest. The construction of these works was interrupted by the outbreak of the civil war, and their completion was prevented by the separation of the territory now forming the State of West Virginia and the erection thereon of that new State. The cost of the construction of these works, so far as that construction had progressed up to the first day of January, 1861, was defrayed by the proceeds of loans made in the United States and in Europe, and evidenced by the bonds of the Commonwealth of Virginia, which were issued from time to time, as the exigencies of the work required, under the authority of several acts of the General Assembly of Virginia.

The amount of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, evidenced by the bonds issued under these acts, was, on the first of January, 1861, $33,897,073.82.

On the 20th day of August, 1861, certain citizens of Virginia, residing in the western parts of the State, assembled in convention in the city of Wheeling, and there adopted an ordinance to "provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State," and, prior thereto, there was organized a form of government known as the "Restored State of Virginia."

On the 31st day of December, 1862, an act was passed by the Congress of the United States, which provided that the new State formed in pursuance of the ordinance aforesaid should, upon certain conditions, be admitted into the Union by the name of "West Virginia," with a constitution which had theretofore been framed for it and adopted by the people of that territory.

On the 20th day of June, 1863, the new State of West Virginia was formally admitted into the Union as one of the coequal States thereof.

The constitution under which the new State was admitted into the Union contained, among other provisions, the following, viz:

> "No debt shall be contracted by this State except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the State, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, or defend the State in time of war.

"The legislature may, at any time, direct a sale of the stocks owned by the State, in banks and other corporations, but the proceeds of such sale shall be applied to the liquidation of the public debt, and hereafter the State shall not become a stockholder in any bank.

"An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

Sections 5, 7, and 8 of Article 8 of the Constitution.

From the year 1865 down to a short time before the institution of this suit the Commonwealth of Virginia had sought in every practicable way to obtain from West Virginia a friendly settlement of the matter, looking to the ascertainment of the reasonable and proper proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, which, by her constitution, that State had assumed to pay; but, after her liability for an "equitable proportion" had thus been recognized for many years, West Virginia, by a subsequent convention, withdrew such formal recognition from her constitution, and, by repeated acts of her legislature, expressly disclaimed any liability whatever for any part of such public debt.

Appendix to the Record, p. 247.

Virginia, deprived of one-third of her territory and population, divested of those vast mineral sources of wealth, by the development of which she had reasonably expected to redeem her obligations, acquire a fixed and certain source of revenue, and restore contentment and happiness to the inhabitants of her western parts, had yet retained her credit in the money markets of the world, and no cloud of doubt had as yet been cast upon her willingness and her ability to discharge her obligations.

The attitude assumed by those in control of the political government of West Virginia made it necessary for Virginia to act promptly and decisively with reference to her outstanding obligations.

By act approved March 30, 1871, the General Assembly of Virginia provided that—

> "The owners of any of the bonds, stocks or interest certificates heretofore issued by this State, which are recognized by its constitution and laws, as legal, except the five per centum dollar bonds, and what are known as sterling bonds, but including the stock of the James River Company, and the bonds of the James River and Kanawha Company guaranteed by this State, may fund two-thirds of the amount of the same, together with two-thirds of the interest due or to become due on the first day of July, 1871, in six per centum coupon or registered bonds of this State, of the denomination of one hundred and multiples thereof, dated that day, and to become payable and due in thirty-four years after date, but redeemable at the pleasure of the State, after ten years, the interest so to be payable semi-annually, on the first days of January and July of each year. * * * The holders of the five per centum dollar bonds, may, in like manner, fund the same in like bonds, bearing five per centum, instead of six per centum interest."
> "3. Upon the surrender of the old, and the acceptance of the new bonds for two-thirds of the amount due, as provided in the last preceding section, there shall be issued to the owner or owners for the other one-third of the amount due upon said old bond, stock, or certificate of indebtedness so surrendered, a certificate bearing the same date as the new bond, setting forth the amount of the bond which is not funded, as provided in the last preceding section, and that payment of said amount, with interest thereon at the rate prescribed in the bond surrendered, will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall thereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia, in regard to > the public debt of Virginia existing at the date of the dismemberment, and the State of Virginia holds said bonds, as far as unfunded, in trust for the holder or his assignees; and provided further that until such final settlement with West Virginia, there shall be paid upon what are known as sterling bonds, in the manner now prescribed by law, two-thirds of the interest accruing on said bonds, after July first, 1871, and for the interest accrued to that date, certificates, dated on that day, shall be issued, drawing the same rate of interest as the bonds, two-thirds of which shall be paid as provided to be paid on the bonds. The remaining one-third of unpaid interest, both as to the bonds and the certificates shall be payable in money, and the principal of said certificates in new sterling bonds of the same character as the old, in accordance with such final settlement as may be made with West Virginia."

Under this act of 1871, and under the subsequent acts of 1879, 1882, and 1892, bonds and other evidences of indebtedness to the amount of several millions of dollars were surrendered by the holders thereof, and new bonds of the Commonwealth of Virginia, for two-thirds of their several amounts, and certificates for the other one-third of such amounts—representing the estimated proper proportion of such indebtedness to be borne by the State of West Virginia—were issued by Virginia and accepted by the holders of the old bonds who had surrendered them.

Under a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia, approved March 6, 1894, and an act of March 6, 1900, a commission was created and—

> "authorized and empowered, by and with the advice and approval of the attorney general of Virginia, to take such action and institute such proceedings on behalf of the State as may, in the judgment of said commission and attorney general, be needful and proper to protect the interest of the State, and bring about, and carry into effect a settlement as aforesaid" (1 May's Compend., pp. 40-44).

On January 15, 1905, the commission addressed a communication to the Governor of West Virginia, which was approved by the attorney general of Virginia, and on the first of February, 1905, Mr. Randolph Harrison, a member of the commission, and on behalf of the commission, made an address before the finance committee of the legislature of West Virginia, in which he set forth fully and clearly the grounds on which a friendly adjustment of the matter should be entered upon by the two States (1 May's Compend., pp. 68-82).

On January 20, 1905, the legislature of West Virginia had adopted the following joint resolution, viz.:

> "Resolved by the legislature of West Virginia, That it is the sense of this legislature that the State of West Virginia does not owe any part of the so-called Virginia debt, and that this legislature is opposed to any negotiations whatsoever on the subject" (Appendix to Record, p. 248).

On the — day of ——, 1906, the Commonwealth exhibited her bill in equity in this court, in which are set forth fully and distinctly the grounds on which she asked the relief there prayed, and invoked the aid of this court to protect her from the intolerable burden of that proportion of the public debt incurred by the Commonwealth of Virginia during a period of forty years prior to the erection of the new State within her ancient borders, and created, as the bill charges, by the hearty concurrence and earnest efforts of the representatives in the legislature from that region of the old State which now forms the State of West Virginia, and which should be borne by West Virginia.

In February, 1907, the State of West Virginia appeared, by her attorney general, and tendered a demurrer to the bill on eight assigned grounds. On the argument before the court the defendant State, through her counsel, assigned a wholly distinct ground, on which the argument mainly proceeded. That ground was that a compact had been entered into between the two States, by the terms of which the legislature of West Virginia had been made the sole arbiter of the fact and the amount of West Virginia's liability, and that this court was without jurisdiction to hear and determine that question.

The demurrer was overruled on all the grounds assigned and argued, and the defendant State was required to answer the bill.

In October, 1907, West Virginia filed her answer to the bill.

On May 4, 1908, a decree was made referring the cause to a special master, with directions to ascertain and report on seven designated subjects of inquiry. The special master heard the evidence offered on either side, and in March, 1910, he filed his report to this court, with certain documents referred to and more specifically indicated in a letter accompanying his report, and to be read and considered therewith.

(NOTE.—The attorney general of West Virginia has caused to be printed and has distributed a correct transcript of the pleadings in the cause, with all the proceedings had thereon, the oral and printed arguments of counsel, and the orders and decrees made in the cause, which by consent, with the approval of the court, will be used and cited in the further arguments offered, in lieu of or in connection with the original record.)

The Pleadings in the Case and the Issues Resulting therefrom.

In The State of Rhode Island vs. The State of Massachusetts, 14 Peters, 257, this court said:

> "The proceedings in this case will therefore be regulated by the rules and usages of the court of chancery. Yet, in a controversy where two States are contesting the boundary between them, it will be > the duty of the court to mould the rules of chancery practice and pleading, in such manner as to bring this case to a final hearing on its real merits. It is too important in its character, and the interests concerned too great, to be decided upon the mere technical principles of chancery pleading. * * * And in a case like the present, the most liberal principles of practice and pleading ought unquestionably to be adopted, in order to enable both parties to present their respective claims in their full strength."

That was one of the earliest cases brought before this court presenting a controversy between two States, and the views expressed there have since been somewhat modified; but we do not object to their application here in their strictest form.

Attention is called to the case presented in the bill and the answer, as showing what facts alleged in the bill are admitted in the answer, and what denials made in the answer are responsive to any allegations made in the bill, and also to the affirmative averments made in the answer which the defendant State, under the rules of chancery practice, must support by proof, but has wholly failed to do.

The bill is arranged in twenty-two numbered paragraphs, the first twenty of which each contains a distinct charge of some material fact. The answer following this order takes notice of each of these distinct charges of fact and undertakes to reply to them.

(1.) The bill charges that on the first day of January, 1861, Virginia was indebted in the sum of about $33,000,000, evidenced by her obligations and contracts made in connection with the construction of works of internal improvement throughout her then territory, and that in addition to the above liability there was a large indebtedness to the commissioners of the sinking fund and to the literary fund of the State.

The answer of the defendant admits the charge of the amount of the debt of $33,000,000, but denies the charge of indebtedness to the two boards.

(2.) The bill charges that "the completion of some of the main lines of improvement beyond the said range, and through to the Ohio river, since the first day of January, 1861, has increased to a very great and material extent the values of real estate, including coal and timber, in the said territory, now included in West Virginia, thus carrying into effect the original scheme of improvement, which could not have been done had not the lines east of said range been first constructed."

The answer of the defendant denies "that such increase was caused by the improvements made within her present territory prior to 1861, but nearly all of the improvements and developments of resources in said State have been made within the last twenty-five years, and are due to railroads and other public works constructed by her own people and by private capital brought within her territory, and by appropriations made by Congress and are almost entirely disconnected and independent of any expenditures made by Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, either by the proceeds of bonds issued and sold by her, or from any other means derived from the creation of any debt by her."

(3.) The bill charges that Virginia entered upon this scheme of internal improvements, in a very large measure, for the purpose of developing the resources of the western part of the State, now constituting West Virginia, and that it was with this view that she took upon herself the burden of debt for which her bonds were issued, and that in corroboration of this, as she further charges, the public records of the legislature show that the appropriations for the improvements, and the indebtedness incurred by the bonds issued therefor, were carried through the legislature by the votes of the members of the house and senate from the counties now forming the State of West Virginia, and against the votes of the members from the counties now forming Virginia.

The answer denies the charge of the motive and purpose, but admits the charge as to the votes of the members from the western counties.

(4.) The bill charges that the system of public improvements was incomplete in 1861, "though a very considerable portion of such improvements had, prior to that time, been constructed in the territory now constituting West Virginia in order to meet the needs of the people in that portion of the State for their local purposes."

The answer denies this charge in the very words in which it was made, and yet the report of the special master, under article 1, pages 31-36, shows hundreds of turnpikes, railways, and navigation companies constructed in the western parts of the State with the proceeds of these bonds long prior to 1861.

(5, 6, and 7.) These charges of the bill are not denied in the answer.

(8.) The bill charges, and sets out in exact terms, certain acts of the legislature of the restored State of Virginia, and states their legality and effect.

The answer does not deny the acts as recited, but denies the effect given to them in the bill.

This is matter of construction for the court.

(9.) The bill charges another act of that legislature.

The answer admits the act, but denies the effect given to it by the bill.

(10.) The bill recites certain provisions in the constitution of the State of West Virginia and states their effect.

The answer admits the provisions, but denies the effect as given in the bill, yet this court, in passing on the demurrer to the bill, has distinctly held that the effect charged by the bill was the true effect, and that the words "public debt" and "previous liability" referred to the public debt of Virginia and to nothing else.

(11.) The bill charges that after the year 1865 and prior to the year 1872 Virginia had made many attempts to have the amount of West Virginia's liability on account of the public debt ascertained, but without effect.

The answer, through six of its pages, denies this charge, which is now established beyond dispute by the production of the official records of the two States.

The answer makes no denial, but indulges in irrelevant comments on Virginia's course.

(13.) The bill charges that since the first day of January, 1861, Virginia has actually paid off, retired, and discharged, or has assumed and given her new obligations for the aggregate sum of over seventy-one million dollars on account of the common debt; that West Virginia, in the early years of her history, conceded that she should bear an equitable portion of this common debt, but that she has for a number of years refused to recognize that any liability whatever rested on her on that account.

The answer does not deny this charge, but contents itself with the remark that "this is a matter of which the Commonwealth of Virginia cannot complain."

(14.) The bill charges that by the acts for the settlement of her debt it was provided that the bonds of Virginia, so far as not funded in the new obligations issued by her, should be surrendered to and held by her, who would hold the same, so far as unfunded, in trust for the creditor who deposited the same, or his assigns, and certificates to this effect were given by her to each creditor who so surrendered.

The answer, not denying this charge, affirmatively avers that all the bonds so deposited were in fact "surrendered and cancelled," and that the Commonwealth of Virginia now holds said certificates in trust only for the owners thereof.

Which, with great respect for the State of West Virginia, we venture to characterize as sheer nonsense and contradicted by the acts themselves.

The answer further denies, under this article, that "Virginia used any means for an amicable settlement of said debt with West Virginia, except as stated in paragraph XI of the answer."

(15.) The bill charges that as she has taken up and holds nearly all of the old bonds issued by her, she has now the right to call on West Virginia for a settlement, etc.

The answer, not denying the fact charged, denies that this fact gives Virginia a right to call on West Virginia for a settlement.

(16.) The bill charges that by reason of the facts charged she has a right and a just claim against West Virginia for contribution to the extent of West Virginia's equitable liability therefor.

The answer denies that Virginia has any claim against West Virginia on account of any payments made by Virginia; denies that West Virginia is liable for any part of the obligations mentioned in paragraphs 15 and 16 of the bill.

(17.) The bill charges the existence of certain obligations on which Virginia was bound prior to 1861 as guarantor, which should be included in the proposed settlement with West Virginia.

The answer denies the liability of West Virginia on account of such debts.

(18.) The bill charges as a recapitulation five grounds, on all or either of which West Virginia should be held liable for a proper proportion of the public debt of Virginia.

The answer denies that West Virginia is liable on any of these grounds except the second.

The second ground, as is manifest, is but a historical fact, which is recited, without any admission of its validity or force, in the same manner and to the same extent that a debtor who admits and agrees to pay a debt barred by limitations may be held liable on it, even though the deed in which such admission be made be held void and fraudulent.

(19, 20.) The bill charges that by a joint resolution, approved March 6, 1894, and by an act approved March 6, 1900, of the General Assembly of Virginia, a commission was created to bring about a settlement with West Virginia, and that such commission did "make most earnest efforts to bring about an amicable settlement of the matter."

The answer appears to deny the facts charged, and indulges in several pages of explanation.

This concludes all the charges of fact made in the bill and all the responses made to these charges by the answer of the defendant.

But the defendant did not stop in its answer with these responses, but proceeded to aver certain affirmative grounds of defense to the case presented by the bill, which were not responsive to any charge made in the bill, but rest upon the construction given to certain ordinances and acts of the legislature which are set out in the bill.

(1.) In paragraph XX of the answer (May's Comp., p. 22) it is averred as follows, viz.:

> "And so this respondent is advised and now avers, that when West Virginia framed her constitution and inserted in it the provision concerning the adjustment of the public debt of Virginia, and the Commonwealth of Virginia, through her legislature, by the act aforesaid approved the constitution of West Virginia, as the basis of her consent for the formation of that State and her admission into the Union, and upon the passage of the act of Congress admitting the said State into the Union, a compact between the two States prescribing the manner in which this respondent's equitable proportion of the debt should be ascertained was concluded, and it became, and is binding upon the Commonwealth of Virginia and the State of West Virginia.
> "The respondent avers that her equitable proportion of said debt cannot be otherwise ascertained or determined than by the action of the State of West Virginia, through her legislature, as provided by her constitution, nor can its liquidation be otherwise pro> vided for than by a sinking fund of sufficient amount to pay the accrued interest and redeem the principal of whatever sum may be thus ascertained within the period of thirty-four years as likewise therein provided. Respondent therefore pleads and relies upon said compact in bar of plaintiff's right to prosecute and maintain this suit in this honorable court, and prays that the said bill may be dismissed."

(2.) The second ground of defense, nearly allied to the first, but so as with a difference, rests upon the ninth section of the ordinance passed by the convention of August, 1861, entitled "An ordinance to provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State." It appears that the people who assembled in that August convention, with the purpose and intent of converting the territory of the "Restored State of Virginia" into the new State of West Virginia, recognized that some provision must be made for meeting and discharging such proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia as must reasonably be borne by that portion of the territory and population of the ancient Commonwealth which they proposed to erect into a new State, before the Congress of the United States would admit such new State into the Union, and accordingly they attempted to insinuate into the ordinance providing for such new State this ninth section, by which a fantastic device was contrived for relieving the new State of any liability whatever for any part of said public debt.

> "And when the constitution of West Virginia was framed and adopted in the year 1861, the said section nine was in full force, and both the Commonwealth of Virginia and the citizens residing in that portion thereof out of which the proposed new State was to be formed, were satisfied with the methods therein provided for ascertaining this respondent's equitable proportion of said public debt, and the constitution was framed and adopted and West Vir- ginia's equitable proportion of said public debt was assumed on the basis of the said ordinance and not otherwise."

In these two grounds so set out in the answer of West Virginia there is presented the sole defense which she here sets up to the demand of the bill, that she should be required to contribute to the discharge of a reasonable and proper proportion of the public debt of Virginia, created prior to the erection of the new State. Much of these grounds of defense has already been disposed of by this court in the decrees heretofore made in the cause, and the disposition of the several members of the court is quite unmistakably indicated in the course of the oral arguments made at the bar on the demurrer and on the order of reference. These are more minutely pointed out in the subsequent parts of this brief.

The contention made on behalf of West Virginia, then, is that the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance, providing a method or scheme for ascertaining the equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia, was a proposition made by Virginia to the inchoate State of West Virginia, and subsequently accepted by that State, and thereby became and continues a constituent term in a compact entered into between these two States.

That such ninth section was a valid, constitutional, and operative feature in the ordinance to provide for the creation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of Virginia.

It does indeed appear that the attorney general of Virginia seems to have assented to much of this view. In his oral argument before the court, at the October term, 1896, after reciting the ninth section of the ordinance, he said:

> "This is the basis upon which the consent of the Commonwealth of Virginia was given to the formation of the new State. The stipulation imposed by Virginia upon West Virginia as a condition upon which her consent was given, and which afterwards, > in forming the State of West Virginia, the people of that new Commonwealth accepted and assented to, was that the new State should assume and take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained in the manner therein prescribed. That was a fundamental as well as a contractual provision, and it constitutes a primary obligation and lies at the very foundation of the right of West Virginia to be a State" (1 May's Compend., p. 325).

And again, in his printed brief (2 May's Compend., p. 136), this learned attorney general says:

> "While the basis of settlement prescribed by the Wheeling ordinance, is, as we have always considered it, arbitrary and inequitable, we have never taken the position that that ordinance, reasonably and fairly construed, and taken and applied together with the Act of the Restored Government of Virginia of February 3, 1863, and section 8 of Article VIII, of the Constitution under which West Virginia became a State, was not binding on both States."

The writer of this brief, who, by the grace of this court, has been permitted to appear and argue this case on behalf of the bondholding creditors of the Commonwealth of Virginia (who are the sole beneficiaries under that trust which Virginia assumed, and in execution of which this suit was in large measure brought and prosecuted, and who must be the sole recipients of whatever amount may be here recovered), dissents in toto from the views expressed by the attorneys general of the two States respectively, and he has in the subsequent parts of this brief ventured to expose the fallacies which infect the views so presented. He will endeavor to show under subsequent headings in this brief:

> 1. That the ninth section of the ordinance was not "the basis upon which the consent of the Commonwealth of Virginia was given to the formation of the new State." But that such ninth section was never, for one instant of time, recognized by any convention or legislature as having any binding force upon either State or person, and that as a proposition made by Virginia to West Virginia it was never accepted by the latter State.

2. That the ninth section was not "a stipulation imposed by Virginia upon West Virginia as a condition upon which her consent was given and which was afterwards accepted and assented to by the people of West Virginia."

3. That it was not "a contractual or a fundamental provision, and that it did not constitute a primary obligation, or lie at the foundation of the right of West Virginia to be a State."

West Virginia became a State by being admitted into the Union by the Congress of the United States, upon the consent, first obtained, of the Restored State of Virginia, and such consent, in its express terms, referred to the constitution framed for West Virginia, and did not by expression or implication refer to the ordinance or to any of its provisions.

4. The "basis of settlement prescribed by the Wheeling ordinance," whether taken alone or in connection with any legislation or constitutional provision, was never binding "on both States" or on either State.

It was not referred to in the case of Virginia vs. West Virginia, in 11th Wallace, and, as shown by Mr. Faulkner, the counsel for West Virginia in that case, had no relevancy or connection with the line of argument taken by either the counsel or the court in that case.

The bondholding creditors, whose interests this court has allowed to be represented here, are creditors of Virginia and of West Virginia alike. They are not formal parties to this cause, but their interests are fully recognized and secured by the several acts of the General Assembly of Virginia, which form part of this record, and under which Virginia has received and holds the bonds deposited by them, as a trustee, as to the unfunded one-third of the amounts of such bonds. The Commonwealth of Virginia has by her bill exhibited here disclosed fully her relations to her bondholding creditors and to the State of West Virginia, who, as a constituent part of the original debtor State, is liable for an equitable proportion of such common debt. Her chief ground for the relief asked is that West Virginia has disclaimed and repudiated all liability for any part of such indebtedness, and Virginia fears that unless this codebtor be made to pay such equitable portion of the debt that the burden of paying it will fall upon her. She asks that this threatened danger be averted by a decree of this court requiring West Virginia to pay so much of such debt as may be ascertained to be her equitable proportion thereof.

These creditors insist that they should not be prejudiced in their rights by any contracts or agreements entered into between the two debtor States, or by any concessions or admissions that may be made as either the law or the facts by the counsel representing these States at this bar.

It will be observed that of the seven subjects for inquiry and report referred to the special master, five of them relate exclusively to the matters involved in the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance. The master now reports, under the third paragraph of that order of reference, that the plan of ascertainment proposed by the ninth section of the ordinance bears no relation whatever to the amount of the public debt.

It may not unreasonably be inferred that such inquiry would not have been directed by the court but for the apparent concurrence of view of the attorneys general of the two States.

THE ARGUMENT.

The bill was filed by Virginia to have ascertained the proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia which should justly and equitably be borne by West Virginia, and to require her to pay such amount to the exoneration of Virginia from that portion of the common burden.

The first and controlling subject of inquiry is, What plan or method shall be adopted for ascertaining this proportion? But two have been proposed and urged by the parties to the cause.

It would seem to be obvious that the proper proportion of this public debt which should be borne by West Virginia should be ascertained by the proportion that her territory and population bore to the territory and population of the Commonwealth of Virginia on the first day of January, 1861, or on May 13, 1862, when Virginia consented to the erection of the new State, or on the 20th of June, 1863, when West Virginia was admitted into the Union.

On the part of Virginia and of her bondholding creditors, who are the beneficiaries of the trust which Virginia took upon herself, it is insisted that the only just and reasonable plan or method for ascertaining the proportion of the debt to be borne by West Virginia is that stated and approved by the writers on international or public law, and which was announced by Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of this court, in the case of Hartman vs. Greenhow, 102 U. S., 672. He said:

> "Duringthe war a portion of her territory was separated from her, and by its people a new State named West Virginia, was formed, and by the Congress of the United States was admitted into the Union. Nearly one-third of her territory and people were taken from her jurisdiction. But as the whole State had created the indebtedness for which the bonds > were issued, and participated in the benefits obtained by the money raised, it was but just that a portion of the indebtedness should be assumed by that part which was taken from her and made a new State. Writers on public law speak of the principle as well established, that where a State is divided into two or more States, in the adjustment of liabilities between each other, the debts of the parent State should be ratably apportioned among them. On this subject, Kent says: 'If a State should be divided in respect to territory, its rights and obligations are not impaired, and if they have not been apportioned by special agreement, their rights are to be enjoyed, and their obligations fulfilled by all the parts in common' (1 Comm., 25). And Halleck, speaking of a State divided into two or more distinct sovereignties, says: 'In that case the obligations which have accrued to the whole before the division are, unless they have been the subject of a special agreement, ratable binding upon the different parts. This principle is established by the concurrent opinions of text writers, the decisions of the courts and the practice of nations' " (International Law, c. 3, sec. 27).

Among the writers on public law, referred to by the learned justice, whose opinions concur in the view expressed by him, there may be mentioned the following:

Puffendorf, Law of Nature and Nations, Book VIII, chap. 12, sec. 5.

Phillimore, International Law, Part II, chap. 137.

Wheaton, Dana's ed., sec. 30.

Moore's Int. Law Digest, p. 334.

Wharton, Int. Law Digest, sec. 5, p. 19.

1 Openheim International Law, p. 122.

5 Moore on International Arbitration, pp. 4618-4619.

Mr. Hannis Taylor's International Law is cited with great approbation by the counsel for West Virginia and copious extracts from his chapter on this subject are quoted. Mr. Taylor, however, closes this chapter with a "summary" of his views, which seems to have escaped the attention of counsel. It is as follows:

> "SEC. 168. After a careful review of all the authorities the general statement may be made, (1) That no matter whether a State is entirely extinguished by a division into two or more States, or (2) whether it loses its identity by being absorbed into another State, or (3) whether a State, without loss of its identity, has a portion of its territory taken from it to form an integral part of another State, or (4) whether such severed part is erected into an entirely new and independent State, all local charged and guaranteed debts to which certain domains and their revenues are dedicated survive as charges upon the localities to which they relate, with their equities unimpaired. In the case first named the general debt of the State would certainly be ratably binding, morally, if not legally, on its several parts. In the second, it passes as a whole to the absorbing State. In the third, the acquiring State should assume a ratable proportion of it, and in the fourth, every principle of equity and good conscience requires that it should be provided for out of the common State property, and the residue divided in the proportion to the resources of the two distinct Commonwealths. In the notable case of West Virginia that obligation, though formally recognized, has never been discharged."

The public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia is evidenced by her bonds issued by her, under the authority of several acts of the General Assembly, from the year 1823. These bonds are shown in the schedules annexed to the two first paragraphs of the report of Special Master Littlefield, as to which the master says (Report, p. 29):

> "The schedules hereto annexed and marked Par. I, Ex. 1, Par. I, Ex. 2; Par. I, Ex. 3, show by what authority of law, and for what purposes the same was created, and the dates and nature of the bonds being the evidence of said indebtedness."

From these schedules there has been compiled a series of tabulated statements showing that these bonds fall into eight distinct groups, distinguished by the purposes for which each series of bonds was issued, the rates of interest borne by each, and the proportion of each which should be borne by Virginia and West Virginia respectively. There is further shown the calculations made upon the established bases of territory, population, and valuation, by which is ascertained the exact proportion of the entire debt which West Virginia should bear on each of such bases.

The amount of the public debt of Virginia as found by the master	$33,897,073.82

Annexed to the report, under paragraph I, are three tabulated schedules which, the master states, "show by what authority of law and for what purposes the same was created, and the dates and nature of the bonds being the evidence of said indebtedness" (page 29).

It appears from Schedule 3 that of the bonds evidencing this debt certain of them bore interest from their date to their maturity at the rate of six per cent per annum to the amount of	$30,842,659.43
and certain others bore interest at the rate of five per cent	2,077,204.50
Making the total of interest-bearing principal	$32,919,953.93
Which, with the interest accrued thereon to January 1, 1861	977,209.89
makes the aggregate debt as of January 1, 1861	$33,897,073.82

The master was directed to ascertain and report the extent and assessed value of the territory of Virginia and of West Virginia as of June 20, 1863, and the population thereof, with and without slaves.

He has responded to that direction in paragraph II, page 37, of his report, by a tabulated statement, which shows that—

West Virginia contains of the extent of the area of the old State..... 36.1843 per cent and of the land area, exclusive of water.. 37.3686 per cent and of the assessed valuation..... 21.7812 per cent and of the population, with slaves..... 24.5125 per cent and of the population, without slaves... 33.5231 per cent

From the evidence taken before the master, and which appears in the printed volume accompanying his report (pages 341-379), I have had prepared a tabulated statement, which will be found in the printed pamphlet filed as part of this brief, which shows, on pages 16 and 17, West Virginia's proportion of the public debt, calculated on each of the foregoing bases, including therein the bonds held by the sinking fund, the literary fund, and the board of public works.

West Virginia's proportion on the basis of
land area $39,637,940.59
West Virginia's proportion on the basis of
total area 38,381,719.81
West Virginia's proportion on the basis of assessed valuation 23,103,940.50
West Virginia's proportion on the basis of population, with slaves 26,003,229.86
West Virginia's proportion on the basis of population, without slaves 35,528,615.64

Since the master's report was returned, showing that he has rejected the claim of Virginia to have the bonds held by these State boards, included in the total amount of the public debt, evidenced by the State bonds, I have had the calculation made on that basis (it appears in two printed pages filed in the pamphlet with brief):

Land area	$36,595,744.45
Total area	35,435,938.09
Assessed valuation	21,330,722.30
Population, with slaves	24,007,492.37
Population, without slaves	32,829,776.90

The pamphlet filed with this brief shows that the public debt of Virginia on the first of January, 1861, was evidenced by bonds issued under different acts of the legislature, maturing at different periods, and bearing different rates of interest. These bonds are classified in eight separate groups, an index of which appears on page 1 of the pamphlet, and each of said groups is presented as required by paragraph I of the decree.

If the liability of West Virginia is determined in accordance with the doctrine laid down by the writers on public or international law, which appears to have been approved by this court in Hartman vs. Greenhow, supra, such liability must be for an ascertained proportion of the public debt of Virginia evidenced by said bonds, such proportion to be ascertained on one or the other of the several bases above calculated. The public debt for which West Virginia is liable is the debt evidenced by the bonds, and must be, therefore, for the principal of said bonds and the interest that accrued thereon up to the maturity thereof. The interest has been accordingly calculated on each of the eight groups of bonds according to rate prescribed by the bond and up to the date of its maturity.

The constitution of West Virginia, under which she was admitted into the Union, provided that—

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by the State," &c.

An equitable proportion of the public debt as it stood on January 1, 1861, embraced both the principal and the interest of the debt as it was then evidenced, and if it was evidenced by bonds that bore interest until they were redeemed or paid, West Virginia's proportion of the debt so evidenced, embraced the principal and the interest thereon up to the redemption of the bond or to the expiration of the period through which, according to its terms, the bond bore interest.

Even against a sovereign government, when its consent to pay interest "has been manifested by an act of its legislature, or by a lawful contract of its executive officers, interest has been allowed" (United States vs. North Carolina, 136 U. S., 216). The United States has been required to pay interest in one case on an implied contract (United States vs. New York, 160 U. S., 598).

Both on the ground of public or international law and on the express provision of the constitution of the State, under which Congress admitted it into the Union, the liability of West Virginia for an equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia appears to be unavoidable and, indeed, does not appear here to be questioned.

We have then "the amount of that public debt as of January 1, 1861, the form in which it was evidenced, the authority of law by which it was created, and the dates and nature of the bonds and other evidence of said indebtedness." We have the extent and assessed valuation of the territory of Virginia and of West Virginia June 20, 1863, and the population thereof, with and without slaves. We have then every factor necessary for a correct ascertainment of the actual amount of the equitable proportion of the public debt which West Virginia should contribute, and we have all the calculations accurately made on each of the several bases indicated by the court in its decree, and we show what that proportion is under each of said several bases.

Of the five several bases on which the ratable proportion of the debt to be borne by West Virginia may be ascertained, the least reliable is that of the "assessed valuation" of the real and personal property. The last assessment of real estate prior to January 1, 1861, was made in 1856, the assessments being at that time made every ten years, and the master has shown in his treatment of this subject, under paragraph V (pages 142 to 173), that the assessment of that year forms no safe or fair basis. He has pointed out that both real and personal property suffered great depreciation in quantity and in value during the early period of the war.

Paragraphs IV and V of the decree do not appear to have been intended by the court as the means of affording bases for the ascertainment of the proportion of the public debt to be borne by West Virginia, but only, as their language imports, for affording a basis for ascertaining "such proportion of the ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia since any of said debt was contracted as was properly assignable to the counties which were created into the State of West Virginia."

Paragraph II (page 37) directs the ascertainment of "the extent and assessed valuation of the territory of Virginia and of West Virginia June 20, 1863, and the population thereof, with and without slaves."

The decree gives no direction that warrants the distinction taken in the report between the land area and the water area of the two States. It only directs that the "extent of the territory" be ascertained. The difference is too small to justify a formal exception to the report on that ground, and we submit that as valuation is the object sought, and as land only, and not the water surface, was the subject of valuation, that the land area affords the only proper basis.

As to the matter of "slaves," they appear in both the States, but in far greater number in Virginia, in proportion to the entire population, than in West Virginia. How far they should be taken into any account in this case is questionable, because their status as persons was uncertain and their value as property was even more uncertain. The Emancipation Proclamation of President Lincoln certainly impaired the value of slaves as property in the border States of the South, while it did not tend to make them citizens. It made both their value and their status uncertain, and hence they cannot safely be accepted as fixed factors in any equation employed to ascertain the certain proportion of the public debt of Virginia which West Virginia should bear. They were without civil or political capacities in either State, and should not be reckoned as part of the population, on the basis of which the proper proportion of the debt due from West Virginia should be ascertained. The only fair, reasonable, and just bases on which such proportion can properly be established are total population of white citizens and total land area of the several States.

The amount of the public debt of Virginia as of January 1, 1861, is ascertained and is undisputed.

The evidences of that debt are shown to be bonds, issued by the Commonwealth, and which appear by the master's report to have been issued for different amounts and at different dates and with different periods of maturity. (See schedules annexed to paragraph I, "Joint Exhibit A-1," page 213, Record). The pamphlet filed with this brief shows the calculations by which the amount to be borne by West Virginia is ascertained on each of the several bases.

The bonds evidencing the public debt of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, and surrendered by the holders thereof to the Commonwealth of Virginia, under the provisions of the several funding acts, were not canceled or extinguished as to the one-third of the amount thereof, estimated to be the equitable proportion of such debt to be borne by the State of West Virginia.

It has been repeatedly insisted by counsel for West Virginia, in their oral and printed arguments, that all of the bonds that were surrendered by the holders under the funding acts were actually canceled and thus extinguished, and that both States were thereby released from liability by reason of those bonds.

By the act of March 30, 1871 (pages 14-17), it was provided in section 2:

> "The owners of any of the bonds * * * may fund two-thirds of the amount of the same, together with two-thirds of the interest due or to become due thereon * * * in coupon or registered bonds of this State."

And in section 3:

> "Upon the surrender of the old and the acceptance of the new bond for two-thirds of the amount due as provided in the last preceding section, there shall be issued to the owners or owner, for the other one-third of the amount due upon the bond * * * so surrendered, a certificate bearing the same date as the new bond, setting forth the amount of the bond which is not funded, as provided in the last preceding section, and that payment of such amount * * * will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia, * * * and that the State of Virginia holds said bonds, so far as unfunded, in trust for the holder or his assignees."

And in section 4:

> "Each bond * * * to be funded as herein provided, shall first be delivered to the second auditor, who shall calculate and determine the amount for which a bond shall be issued, and the amounts for which certificates shall be issued, under the second and third sections of this act, * * * The treasurer shall, by proper endorsement, written or stamped upon each bond * * * so surrendered and delivered to him, cancel the same and endorse thereon the date of such cancellation." * * *

So it appears that the cancellation was to be made only of the bonds that were to be funded, and not of so much of such bonds as were not to be funded, but were to be held by Virginia in trust for the holder or his assignee. By the act of March 28, 1879, section 6 (page 20), it was expressly provided:

> "The rules prescribed under the act approved March 30, 1871, in respect to preparing, signing, and issuing the new bonds and coupons, regulating the same, and in taking in, cancelling, and registering the old bonds shall be observed by the officers of the treasury in the execution of this act, * * * Whenever an obligation of the State shall be presented to the second auditor to be funded under this act, he shall note the fact and date on the proper register in his office, shall punch a hole through the name of the second auditor, signed or countersigned thereto, and shall issue his warrant upon the treasurer for the new obligations required. * * * But in cancelling and registering the bonds as above directed, in every bond and coupon surrendered under this act, holes shall be punched in one or more places and in such manner as to render a new funding of the same impossible, and every bond or coupon so cancelled shall be filed for reference."

In the 7th section it was provided:

> "The acceptance of the said certificates for West Virginia's one-third, issued under this act, shall be taken and held as a full and absolute release of the State of Virginia from all liability on account of said certificates."

By none of these acts were the bonds surrendered by the holders for funding directed or authorized t obe canceled, except to the extent that such bonds could be funded. They could not be funded as to the one-third of their amount estimated to be due from West Virginia.

In his oral argument before this court (page 351), Mr. Carlisle said:

> "Now what was the obligation assumed by Virginia by the issue of these certificates? Was it to pay money? None of the counsel has said to the court that if Virginia should fail to provide for this additional one-third by a settlement with West Virginia, that the holders of these certificates could come back upon the State of Virginia and demand their money. That has not been suggested. What the holder could do, perhaps, would be to demand his bond, but that would be of no value to him, because the bond has been cancelled, and I will also show before I get through that nearly all of the holders of these certificates issued under the act of 1871 have deposited their certificates with the commission under a contract which releases Virginia."

It is certainly true that no suggestion has been made by counsel for Virginia that the certificates issued by her were intended to, or that they did, create or evidence any indebtedness on her part to the holders of them. And hence it was that in the acts and on the face of the certificates was the admonition, distinctly given, that the "acceptance of the certificate for West Virginia's one-third, issued under this act, shall be taken and held as a full and absolute release of the State of Virginia from all liability on account of this certificate."

And on each certificate it was stated that it was issued "without recourse upon this Commonwealth."

It was to expressly declare that Virginia, being already liable on the bonds held by her in trust for the owner, would not be made liable for the same debt by virtue of these certificates, which were issued as mere memoranda of the trust on which Virginia held the bonds as to the unfunded one-third of their several amounts.

The bondholders did surrender their bonds to the State of Virginia, the debtor and obligor. Such surrender, unexplained or unqualified, would tend to prove the satisfaction and extinguishment of the bonds as evidences of indebtedness. But Virginia was satisfying them only as to two-thirds of their amounts. The other one-third was not paid, satisfied, or discharged, but was kept alive as a still subsisting obligation. Hence the agreement, that all the bonds so surrendered should be held by Virginia as satisfied and extinguished as to the two-thirds paid by Virginia by the substitution of her new bonds, but as held in trust by her for the creditors to the extent of the remaining one-third, and as to this one-third the bonds were not canceled, and this the acts of the legislature and the certificates themselves fully attest.

The Commonwealth of Virginia has never been discharged from liability on the bonds issued by her prior to January 1, 1861, except as to the extent of the two-thirds of the amount thereof, for which amount the holders of the old bonds surrendered them as to such two-thirds and received in lieu thereof new bonds of the Commonwealth.

In the brief filed on behalf of West Virginia in support of the demurrer to the bill, and repeatedly thereafter, it has been insisted that—

> "these certificates were accepted by the creditors without recourse upon Virginia, in payment or settlement of this one-third of her debt, thereby releasing Virginia from the payment of the one-third of her old, original debt" (1st May's Comp., page 121).

Mr. Carlisle, in the brief signed by him alone (1st May's Comp., page 383), makes the same assertion, but with some qualification. He says:

> "We think it clear that Virginia has been released by the provisions contained in the various acts, by the surrender and cancellation of the bonds, by the acceptance of the certificates under the acts, and by the contracts entered into between the creditors and the commissions; but, even if there had been no for> mal or voluntary release, the State has repeatedly declared in the funding acts and in the joint resolution of March 6, 1894, and the act of March 6, 1900, under which this act is brought, that she is not liable for the unfunded one-third of the debt."

A brief notice of the several funding acts here relied on will serve to dispel the notion that they provided for, or even contemplated, release of Virginia from her obligation of the unfunded one-third of her bonded debt.

The act of March 30, 1871, is set out in full (May's Comp., pages 14-17), and it contains nothing to warrant the assertion. Indeed, counsel for West Virginia, in their first brief, expressly say:

> "Under the terms of this statute Virginia still remained liable for the payment of her entire debt, including the one-third unfunded, for which deferred certificates were to be issued, payable upon a final settlement between Virginia and West Virginia" (May's Comp., page 112).

The next act in course was that of March 28, 1879 (Ibid., pages 17-22). It does provide in section 7, page 21:

> "The acceptance of the said certificates for West Virginia's one-third, issued under this act, shall be taken and held as a full and absolute release of the State of Virginia from all liability on account of this certificate."

Not from all liability on account of her bond, which was held by Virginia, unfunded and uncanceled, in trust for the depositor as to the one-third thereof, but from liability on account of this certificate. The reason is plain. The State acknowledged her liability on her bond, but the bond had been surrendered into her hands by the holder of it, because she had paid two-thirds of the full amount of it. She had not paid the remaining one-third of it, because she looked to West Virginia to provide for that, but the holder entrusted her with the bond on her assurance that she would hold it in trust for him. Being liable on the bond, she did not intend that she should be also liable on the certificate, which merely represented the bond. She was not willing to have outstanding two written, negotiable evidences of the same indebtedness. Hence the stipulation that she should not be held liable "on account of said certificate."

The third act was that of February 14, 1882 (Ibid., pages 22-31). The form of the certificate prescribed by this act provided on its face (page 30) as follows:

> "The Commonwealth of Virginia has this day discharged her equitable share of the bond for —— dollars, held by —— ——, dated the — day of ——, and numbered —, leaving a balance of —— dollars, with interest from ——, to be accounted for by the State of West Virginia, without recourse upon this Commonwealth."

Her "equitable share of the bond" she had estimated at two-thirds of its full amount. The remaining one-third she estimated to be the equitable share of West Virginia, but she knew that she was legally liable for the entire bond, and that this certificate was but an additional evidence of so much of that liability, and for that reason she provided that she should not be liable on the certificate.

The next act was that of February 20, 1892 (Ibid., pages 32-40). The form of the certificate prescribed by this act appears on page 37, and it concludes, "without recourse upon this Commonwealth."

So it appears that by none of the acts of the Virginia legislature providing for the ascertainment of Virginia's share of the public debt was it stipulated or declared that Virginia should be released from her legal liability for the one-third of the debt evidenced by the West Virginia certificates.

West Virginia's Plan.

On the part of West Virginia, it is insisted that the two States have, by a special agreement or compact entered into between them, provided that the method for ascertaining West Virginia's proportion of the public debt, proposed in the ninth section of the ordinance passed on the 20th day of August, 1861, entitled "An ordinance to provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State," is the only method proper to be now employed.

That ninth section is as follows, viz.:

> "The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of the debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period. All private rights and interests in lands within the proposed State, derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation, shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in the State of Virginia."

In the answer filed by West Virginia in this case, it is averred in paragraph XX (May's Comp., page 21):

> "After the promulgation of the ordinance of the convention the people of Virginia, as well those residing in that part of the territory to be converted into a new State as those residing in the other parts of the Commonwealth of Virginia, which constitutes the present territory of that State, were fully advised as to the provisions of the said ordinance, defining the manner in which the equitable proportion of said debt was to be ascertained, and when the con> stitution of West Virginia was framed and adopted in the year 1861, the said section nine was in full force, and both the Commonwealth of Virginia and the citizens residing in that portion thereof out of which the proposed new State was to be formed were satisfied with the methods therein provided for ascertaining respondent's equitable proportion of the said public debt, and the constitution was framed and adopted, and West Virginia's equitable proportion of said debt was assumed on the basis of said ordinance and not otherwise."

In his argument before this court, Mr. Carlisle said (May's Comp., page 290):

> "Our argument was that Virginia had made a proposition in the 9th section of the ordinance, and tendered it to West Virginia; that when West Virginia's convention assembled, which was the first time that State could speak on the subject, it accepted the proposition, with the addition to it, that the legislature of West Virginia should be the tribunal to ascertain her just proportion of the debt, and that Virginia, subsequently, by the passage of the act asking for the admission of West Virginia into the Union, under that constitution, had agreed to this additional clause which the West Virginia convention had inserted in it. So, we argued, that the compact consisted not only of the 9th section of the ordinance, but of the whole of the eighth section of the West Virginia constitution, including that part of it, of course, which provided that the legislature should ascertain her just proportion."

Here then is the alleged "compact" entered into between the two States of Virginia and West Virginia, and here are the grounds upon which it is claimed that such compact was actually entered into, and on which alone its existence is maintained.

Let these grounds be examined.

There was a convention in Wheeling, in June, 1861, of the people of that part of Virginia which at present constitutes the State of West Virginia, and that convention did, in August of that year, adopt the ordinance entitled "An ordinance to provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State," and the ninth section of that ordinance was as above recited, and that convention did adjourn sine die.

There was another convention called to frame a constitution for the proposed new State of West Virginia, and that convention did frame such constitution. But it is altogether inaccurate and misleading to speak of this second convention as though it were another and distinct people there assembled, to say, "When West Virginia's convention assembled, which was the first time that State could speak on the subject;" for the fact cannot be disguised that the second convention represented the same people as the first, and none other. The same counties were represented in both conventions, and these were the same counties that were represented in the legislature of the Restored State of Virginia, and then later of the State of West Virginia. The fallacy that pervades and infects the entire argument lies in the assumption that two distinct bodies of people were concerned here and were contracting with each other.

In the written opinion given by Attorney General Edward Bates to President Lincoln, as to the action he should take on the act of Congress admitting West Virginia into the Union, he said:

> "And the legislature which pretends to give the consent of Virginia to her own dismemberment is (I am credibly informed) composed chiefly, if not entirely, of men who represent the forty-eight counties which constitute the new State of West Virginia. The act of consent is less in the nature of a law than of a contract. It is a grant of power; an agreement to be divided. And who made the agreement? The representatives of the forty-eight counties with themselves. Is that fair dealing? Is that honest legislation? Is that a legitimate exercise of a constitutional power by the legislature of Virginia? It seems to > me that it is a mere abuse, nothing less than an attempted secession, hardly valid under the flimsy forms of law."

The tenth section of the "ordinance to provide for the erection of a new State," &c., provided that—

> "when the General Assembly shall give its consent to the formation of the new State, it shall forward to the Congress of the United States such consent, together with an 'official copy' of such constitution, with the request that the new State may be admitted into the Union of States."

It did not provide that a copy of the "ordinance" should be forwarded to Congress, and there is nothing in this entire record to sustain the assertion that Congress ever saw or knew of that ordinance or of its provisions.

The constitution framed by the November convention for the new State of West Virginia provided, in the eighth section of its eighth article, as follows, viz.:

> "8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

On the 18th of May, 1862, the legislature of the Restored State of Virginia gave its consent to the formation and erection of the State of West Virginia within the jurisdiction of this State, to include the counties of * * *; then follows the names of the forty-eight counties forming West Virginia,

> "according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the constitution for the said State of West Virginia, and the schedule thereto annexed, proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 26th day of November, 1861."

Provision is further made in this act for the inclusion of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson and Frederick whenever the voters of said counties shall ratify and assent to the constitution.

The Congress of the United States, by act approved December 31, 1862, in which the names of the forty-eight counties were recited, did admit the State of West Virginia into the Union.

These were the same counties, and none others, that constituted the Restored State of West Virginia.

The argument that the convention which framed the constitution for West Virginia was bound by the provisions of the ordinance adopted by the preceding convention, and that the requirement of the eighth article of the constitution, that "the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable," meant that the legislature should ascertain the equitable proportion of the public debt to be borne by West Virginia, according to the method prescribed by the ninth section of the ordinance, finds no support from anything disclosed in this record.

That ordinance, as shown by its title, was to provide for the formation of the new State. All of its sections, except the ninth, were directed toward that end. The State was formed when its constitution was framed and adopted by the people. The ordinance then became functus officio, and ceased to have any operation. The ninth section, as said by Mr. Carlisle in his argument, "was a proposition made by Virginia, and tendered to West Virginia." If this be true, then West Virginia's day of grace was when she was assembled in convention in November, 1861—three months after the proposition was tendered; then, and only then, while she was framing her constitution could she have signified her acceptance of the proposition by embodying it in her constitution. But she did not embody it. She embodied something altogether different, and made no reference to the ninth section of the ordinance. But the view now urged on behalf of the defendant State is, that while her constitution does not expressly refer to the ordinance, yet when it directed that the legislature should ascertain the amount due from West Virginia it meant that the legislature should ascertain such proportion by the method proposed by the ninth section of the ordinance, which is merely assuming the very thing that West Virginia has undertaken to prove.

The entire defense here made by West Virginia to the bill rests upon the ninth section of the ordinance—that the fantastic plan there proposed for ascertaining the "equitable proportion of the public debt" which the constitution prescribed should be assumed by West Virginia—was, by solemn compact between the Commonwealth of Virginia of the one part and the State of West Virginia of the other part, adopted and agreed upon as the method to be employed.

Few men in the State of West Virginia had more intimate and thorough knowledge of the history of those times than the Hon. Charles James Faulkner, a lifelong resident of Berkeley county, a Representative in Congress from that district prior to the Civil War, and United States Minister at the Court of France at the breaking out of that war. Mr. Faulkner had been leading counsel for the State of West Virginia in the case of Virginia vs. West Virginia, reported in Eleventh of Wallace, which involved the question of the status of Berkeley and Jefferson counties, and to his ability and skill must be allowed the credit of that victory. Because of his familiarity with the whole history of the evolution of West Virginia, his opinion was asked as to the effect that should be allowed to the ninth section of the ordinance. His opinion was given in 1884, in the course of which he said:

> "After a careful examination of the case of Virginia vs. West Virginia, I cannot perceive that the court attaches any peculiar legal efficacy to the ordinance of August, 1861. It is true it referred to that > ordinance historically, but only for the purpose of showing that even at that early period of our history the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson were contemplated as possible additions to the State of West Virginia. My reasons for supposing that the court might not regard the ordinance of 1861 as prescribing a binding rule for settlement of the debt are, that by the subsequent constitution, framed and adopted by the people of West Virginia, this basis of settlement is abandoned, and we are there made to assume an equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia prior to January 1st, 1861, and the legislature is directed to ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable. Virginia, in giving her consent to the formation of a new State in May, 1862, expressly does so upon the provisions set forth in the constitution of West Virginia. Upon these terms we were admitted by Congress as a State of the Union, and the constitution of 1863, thus ratified by the two States and by Congress, would be more likely to be taken as the basis of the contract than the effete ordinance of August, 1861."

And the view here expressed by this great lawyer, that the constitution framed and adopted by the people of West Virginia altogether superseded and supplanted the propositions of the August convention, finds strong support in the decision of this court in the case of Strauder vs. Graham, reported in the 10th of Howard, where it was said:

> "The State comes in under the provisions of its own constitution; you cannot look outside of it; you cannot look behind it. This is the final, ultimate expression of its civil and political rights and powers."

It is denied on the part of Virginia that the method proposed by the ninth section of the ordinance adopted by the convention on the 20th of August, 1861, for ascertaining West Virginia's just proportion of the public debt of Virginia, formed part of any compact or agreement whatever between the two States, or of the consent given by Virginia or that such method was proposed as a condition or as a measure upon the acceptance or rejection of which the formation of the new State in anywise depended.

It does not purport to have been proposed as a condition or term of an agreement between the two States. The form and structure of the section in which it appears precludes the belief that it was anything more than a suggestion or recommendation offered to the convention which was soon thereafter to assemble. It is wanting in all the characteristic features of a solemn condition or limitation prescribed by a State as a term upon the acceptance of which alone she will consent to a cession of a portion of her territory. Many compacts between States of this Union have been before this court, but all of these have appeared clothed in a form and expressed in language that left no room for doubt as to their significance and purpose.

The compact between Virginia and Maryland in 1785, entered into at Mt. Vernon, was clear, formal, and unambiguous, and stated in a series of distinct paragraphs, each embodying a distinct term of the agreement.

City of Georgetown vs. Alexandria Canal Co., 1 Peters, 94.

The compact between South Carolina and Georgia of April 12, 1787, was expressed in solemn, formal style in numbered articles.

South Carolina vs. Georgia, 93 U. S., 4.

And so in the compacts which received consideration by this court in the cases of—

Poole vs. Flegar, 3 Wheat., 212.
Burton, lessee, vs. Williams, 3 Wheat., 529.
Green vs. Biddle, 8 Wheat., 1.

The subject-matter of the ninth section of the ordinance—that is, the mere plan or method by which an amount should be ascertained—cannot be made the subject of a compact or a condition upon which an existing State consents to a cession of part of her territory for the erection of a new State.

The subject-matter of such compacts cannot be allowed to embrace any other subjects than the extent of the territory so ceded and the usual and ordinary incidents appurtenant to such territory.

All other matters fall within the exclusive power and control of the new State so formed.

In none of the compacts made between States does it appear that the parent State has ever sought or been allowed to impose on the new State any such conditions, limitations, or burdens as were not immediately connected with the territory ceded for the new State.

In Virginia vs. Tennessee, 148 U. S., 520, and in Wharton vs. Wise, 159 U. S., 170, this court, referring to section 10 of article 1 of the constitution, prohibiting any State from entering into any agreement or compact with another State, quote from Story, Comm., section 2403, as follows:

> "Compacts and agreements might then very properly apply to such as regarded what might be deemed mere private rights of sovereignty, such as questions of boundary, interests in land situate in the territory of each other, and other internal regulations for the mutual comfort of States bordering on each other."

The territory ceded, its boundaries, the rights to and in water courses flowing through and by it, the rights, titles, and interests therein acquired from the parent State, these and other kindred matters may form the subject of a compact between States, but other matters affecting the domestic concerns of the new State, such as the basis and the rate of taxes to be laid therein, its police policy and regulations, its powers in the contracting and payment of its public debts, all these, and others like them, are beyond the power of the parent State to control or in anywise affect, and are exclusively within the control of the sovereign State so created.

The public debts of a State are burdens resting upon it, for the discharge of which the revenues of the State arising from taxation laid upon its lands are justly applicable, and where a State burdened with a large public debt is divided into two or more States it may very well be deemed proper and provision may be made by conditions annexed to the cession or by compact between the parent State and each of the proposed new States that such new States should assume and bear their respective proportions of such public debt. The new States may thus be required to take their respective portion of the territory ceded, with the burdens resting upon such portions.

All other matters connected with the discharge of the liabilities thus assumed must be left to the new State so assuming them. Any other requirement would indeed be, what Mr. Justice Johnson, in Green vs. Biddle, 8 Wheat., 99, characterized as "cutting deep indeed into the sovereign powers of the State."

Virginia might with great propriety have imposed the condition to the erection of the new State within her territory that such new State should take upon herself a just proportion of the public debt. She knew that West Virginia would be liable—under the doctrine of public or international law—for her just proportion, but what concern was it of Virginia's how West Virginia should ascertain the amount of such liability, or whether she did so by her legislature or her Governor or her treasurer or by the method prescribed by the ninth section of the ordinance? Virginia knew, as any creditor would know, that if the amount so ascertained was not a "just proportion" it would not be accepted as such. Why should Virginia, in convention assembled, insist that the new State, for whose creation she was providing, should bear a just and reasonable part of a common debt, and then further insist that such part should be ascertained only by the new State, through her legislature, and by a method which is admitted by counsel and found by the master in this case to have no relation whatever to the amount of that debt? This inquiry serves to bring to the light the grave fact, not adverted to heretofore, that the State of Virginia, which adopted this ordinance and gave its consent to the creation of the new State, consisted only of the same territory and the same people who were to constitute the State of West Virginia.

Less than one-third of the territory and less than one-third of the population of the Commonwealth of Virginia were participating or represented in the conventions and legislatures that were engaged in the creation of this new State.

To be sure, they were recognized by the political departments of the Federal Government as being the Commonwealth of Virginia, and it is beyond question that the political product of their labors—the new State of West Virginia—was invested with sovereignty and autonomy that are indestructible and must endure. But will that panoply serve, in this judicial investigation, to shield this defendant State from the scrutiny that must result in the discovery that the two alleged contracting parties—the one submitting a proposition and the other accepting it—were in truth and in fact but one person and the same person throughout? The counties that composed the Restored State of Virginia, and which were represented in these conventions and legislatures, were the same counties and none other that composed the State of West Virginia and were represented in her councils.

Here we find the explanation of the curious feature that the State of Virginia in giving her consent to the erection of West Virginia imposed it as a condition of that consent that West Vrginia should be the arbitrator to ascertain the amount of her "just proportion," and that she ascertain it by a method which Virginia then knew, and which we all know now, would bring Virginia in debt to West Virginia, or else would find a very small balance the other way.

The public debt was evidenced by the bonds of Virginia to the amount of about $33,000,000. These were outstanding in the hands of holders for value. To the extent that West Virginia was released from her liability on these bonds would the liability of Virginia be increased. Why, then, should Virginia desire to release West Virginia from her just proportion of this liability? Because the Virginia that was thus seeking to release West Virginia would in a short time cease to exist; she would be merged into and become herself West Virginia, and so, when the bondholder presented himself and demanded payment of the bond of Virginia held by him, the only Virginia remaining to make response to his demand would be the present Commonwealth of Virginia, and when she should call on West Virginia to contribute her proper proportion of this common indebtedness she would be met by the reply that has greeted us here, "Virginia has entered into a compact with West Virginia by which West Virginia has been released from all liability on these bonds."

No Compact Was Ever Entered into Between Virginia and West Virginia.

The compact, as West Virginia contends, was formed by a proposition made by Virginia to West Virginia by and through the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance. This proposition, as contended, was accepted by West Virginia by and through the eighth section of the eighth article of her constitution, "with the addition to it that the legislature of West Virginia should be the tribunal to ascertain her just proportion of the debt, and that Virginia subsequently, by the passage of the act asking for the admission of West Virginia into the Union under that constitution, had agreed to this additional clause which the West Virginia convention had inserted in it." (Carlisle's argument, 1 May's Comp., p. 290.)

Conceding, for the sake of the argument, that the plan for ascertaining West Virginia's just proportion of the public debt was a proposition submitted by Virginia for West Virginia's acceptance, did West Virginia ever accept it as it was offered? It is admitted that she did not; but it is said that she did accept it with an additional term added. It is insisted that Virginia subsequently acceded to this additional term by the act of May 13, 1862.

In Minneapolis, &c., Railway Co. vs. Columbia Rolling Mill, 119 U. S., 149, this court said:

> "As no contract is complete without the mutual assent of both parties, an offer to sell imposes no obligation until it is accepted according to its terms. So long as the offer has been neither accepted nor rejected, the negotiation remains open, and imposes no obligation upon either party. The one may decline to accept, or the other may withdraw his offer; and either rejection or withdrawal leaves the matter as if no offer had ever been made. A proposal to accept, or an acceptance upon terms varying from those offered, is a rejection of the offer, and puts an end to the negotiation unless the party who made the original offer renews it or assents to the modification suggested. The other party, having once rejected the offer, cannot afterwards revive it by tendering an acceptance of it."

To the same effect is the case of Compania Bilbania vs. Spanish American Co., 149 U. S., 497, and Virginia Hot Springs Co. vs. Harrison, 93 Virginia, 569.

The text-writers concur in the doctrine thus announced. In 1 Chitty on Contracts (11 Amer. ed.), page 15:

> "Where an agreement is sought to be established by letters, such letters will not constitute an agreement unless the answer be a simple acceptance of the proposal without the introduction of any new term."

In Anson on Contracts (2 Amer. ed.), page 22, it is said:

> "Acceptance must be absolute; unless this is so the intention expressed by one of the parties is either doubtful in itself or different from the other. If A > offers to X to do a definite thing, and X accepts conditionally, or introduces a new term into the acceptance, his answer is either a mere expression of willingness to treat, or it is, in effect, a counter-proposal."

The ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance proposed that

> "the new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government, since any part of the debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the new State during the same period."

That was the proposal made by Virginia.

The eighth section of the eighth article of the constitution of West Virginia provided:

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

That was West Virginia's acceptance of the proposal. Not only was it not an "absolute acceptance" of the proposal as made, but it was materially and essentially different in each of its terms.

It provided for an "equitable" instead of a "just" proportion of the debt. It ignores the plan of ascertainment by the deduction of payments from receipts. It provides that the legislature of West Virginia shall be the sole arbiter to ascertain and determine the amount that West Virginia shall assume. It provides that the debt to be assumed by West Virginia shall not be liquidated for thirty-four years.

Was there an agreement of minds of the two parties as to the terms of the alleged compact? Manifestly not, as the matter stood upon the proposal and the alleged acceptance.

But it is said that subsequently Virginia, "by the act asking for the admission of Virginia into the Union under that constitution, had agreed to this additional clause which the West Virginia convention had inserted in it."

By "this additional clause" is meant the clause making the West Virginia legislature the sole arbiter in the matter. But even that does not meet the other additional terms inserted by the West Virginia convention.

Now look at the act referred to (1 May's Comp., p. 438). It gives the consent of Virginia to the erection of the new State within the jurisdiction of Virginia.

If the legislature had had before it the plan proposed by the ordinance and that prescribed by the constitution, and had intended to exclude the conclusion that it approved of and adopted the terms of the ordinance, it could not have employed more apt and adequate terms. It makes no reference whatever to the ordinance, nor does it in anywise refer to the public debt or to the proportion of it to be borne by West Virginia, but it gives the consent of Virginia to the erection of the new State "according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the constitution for the State of West Virginia, and the schedule thereto annexed, proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 26th day of November, 1861."

If the plan proposed by the Wheeling ordinance was but a proposition made by the June convention of Virginia to the State of West Virginia, then West Virginia, assembled in convention on the 26th of November, 1861, should have either accepted or rejected the proposition thus made. It did neither; it simply ignored it altogether. Indeed, from all that appears here, the convention of West Virginia had no notice or knowledge of the proposition so made, for it nowhere refers to it. It makes provision for the same subject-matter, but that provision, as we have seen, is altogether different from the proposition made in the ordinance.

By what rule of construction can it be contended that when the West Virginia convention provided in the constitution it was framing that "the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable" meant that the legislature should ascertain the same in accordance with the plan proposed by the ordinance framed by the Virginia convention? Even if it be true that an act or ordinance passed by one State may be construed in pari materia with an act or ordinance passed by another State, which we do not admit, construing the ordinance of the Virginia convention with the constitutional provision of the West Virginia convention must result only in the conviction that the latter body, after considering the provision proposed by the former, found it absurd, inequitable, and improper, and rejected it.

The method proposed by the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance should not be accepted as the proper plan for ascertaining West Virginia's just proportion of the public debt of Virginia for which she is liable.

1. The method proposed has no relation whatever to the public debt, and it cannot be applied so as to ascertain any proportion of that debt.

In his response to the third paragraph of the decree of reference, the master, in his report, says (page 39):

> "The Wheeling ordinance is not predicated upon the amount of the public debt. Upon the assumption that West Virginia would be liable for 'a just proportion of the public debt' in case of separation, the ordinance prescribes an arbitrary method by which that 'just proportion' shall be ascertained, &c."

And this view of the master has strong support from the admissions of counsel for West Virginia at the bar of this court. Mr. Carlisle, in his argument, said:

> "I say that the method of settlement provided for in the ninth section of the ordinance has no relation to the amount of the public debt of Virginia existing on the first day of January, 1861. In other words, it is wholly unnecessary, in making a settlement under the terms of that ordinance, to ascertain what the amount of Virginia's public debt was on the first day of January, 1861."

Upon this declaration Mr. Justice White then said from the bench:

> "Then, if that provision for settlement has no relation, and does not concern itself at all with a just proportion of the public debt, which you say is the case, is there not an absolute incompatibility of the constitution with the provision of the ordinance?" (2 May's Compilation, p. 281).

Mr. Carlisle had elsewhere said:

> "An examination of the Wheeling ordinance shows that the amount of the Virginia debt, as it existed prior to January 1st, 1861, is not a factor to be taken into consideration in ascertainng West Virginia's just proportion" (1 May's Comp., p. 190).

And further (page 360) he said:

> "The amount of the debt and the purpose for which it was created have nothing whatever to do with the settlement under the terms of the ordinance. They are not factors in the problem submitted under that agreement."

And Senator Spooner said (2 May's Comp., page 253):

> "Counsel are very accurate when they say that this ordinance does not deal in terms with the debt; that is true; it is no assumption of any part of the debt, as such."

True, the ninth section of the ordinance does declare that "the new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861," and it does purport to prescribe a method by which that "just proportion" shall be ascertained.

Yet here we have the iterated solemn declarations of the counsel for West Virginia that this ordinance "is no assumption of any part of the debt," and that the "amount of the debt and the purpose for which it was created are not factors in the problem submitted under that agreement." The amount, then, that might be ascertained by the method prescribed by the ordinance would be no proportion of the public debt at all. It would be only the difference between the amount expended by legislative appropriations and the amount paid into the treasury from the counties forming West Virginia through a period of about forty years.

But, assuming for the sake of argument, that the proposition had been made by Virginia, and had been accepted by West Virginia, that the method prescribed by the ninth section of the ordinance should be the method for ascertaining West Virginia's just proportion of the debt, what does an examination of that method disclose? We have seen that the master has reported, and that counsel for West Virginia have insisted, that by that method no proportion of the debt could be ascertained; that there was no relation between that method and the amount of the debt.

In the case of Hume vs. United States, 132 U. S., 406, a contract between the two parties was held to be "extortionate and unconscionable on its face," and Fuller, C. J., speaking for the court, referred to the opinion of Lord Hardwicke in Chesterfield vs. Janssen, in which he said:

> "Fraud may be apparent from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself; such as no man in his senses, and not under delusion would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other," &c.

I invite the application of this test to the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance.

Would the Commonwealth of Virginia, knowing as she did that the State of West Virginia was liable for a just and reasonable proportion of her public debt, have agreed that such proportion should be ascertained by this method, and that the legislature of West Virginia should be the tribunal to ascertain it?

In the answer of West Virginia it is distinctly averred (page 20, sec. XX) that—

> "the finance committee of one branch of her legislative body had ascertained and reported that there was no liability upon her part to the Commonwealth of Virginia, on account of the said public debt under the ordinance of the Wheeling convention, and this respondent now denies that she owes, or will owe any sum whatever to the State of Virginia, upon a settlement made in the mode provided in said ordinance."

And this answer is sworn to by the Governor of West Virginia. The Governor could conscientiously swear to that averment, because he knew that the "mode provided" had been intelligently provided to produce that result, and, in the hands of the West Virginia legislature, it had produced the result originally contemplated.

The master in this case has succeeded by the application of certain fixed principles, which have resulted in the rejection of many items claimed by West Virginia, and the allowance of others to which that State objected, in obtaining a very different result from that reached by the West Virginia legislature, and in so doing he has disappointed the expectations of the framers of the method of the ordinance; but the result reached by the master has no relation to the public debt of Virginia, or to West Virginia's liability for a proper proportion thereof, because the method itself had no such relation, and the pretense that the two States had by compact agreed upon that method as the mode of ascertainment is found to be wholly without support.

We have endeavored to show heretofore that the acts of the conventions and legislatures, relied on as constituting a "compact" between Virginia and West Virginia, do not, on any reasonable principles of construction, suffice to form such compact; that they are altogether inadequate in their forms and character to be construed as intended to constitute a solemn compact between sovereign States, and that the mere method to be employed in ascertaining the amount for which a State is liable cannot be made the subject-matter of such a compact.

We now ask that the transaction be considered in the light of the alleged compact itself, its terms and provisions, its efficiency for the object had in view, its reasonableness and its fairness, the parties to it, their known relation to each other, and their evident object in contriving the method proposed by the Wheeling ordinance.

1. It is found by the master, and is admitted by counsel for West Virginia, that the method proposed is not adapted to ascertain West Virginia's just proportion of the public debt. While the ordinance provides that West Virginia shall take upon herself a just proportion, "to be ascertained" by this method, that it is now admitted that this method cannot accomplish that result. It is immaterial to the present purpose how or why it was adopted as the method. It is enough to know that it is altogether inadequate, and hence cannot be employed to ascertain the result sought.

How, then, can this court be asked to accept as the proper plan for ascertaining the amount of West Virginia's just proportion of this debt a method now known to be improper and ineffectual?

2. The method proposed, even if agreed on by the two States, should not be accepted and applied by this court, because it discloses on its face not only its inefficiency, but its unreasonableness and its unfairness. The professed object of the two States was to provide a method by which a just proportion of the amount of a known public debt could be ascertained. When that method is examined it is found to have no relation whatever to that amount, but to consist only of the difference between the amounts received and the amounts expended by certain counties within a certain period. But when that difference is ascertained by that method it affords no aid toward ascertaining the proportion of the public debt proper to be borne by West Virginia. It is not pretended that the two States ever agreed that the amount so ascertained should be accepted in lieu of a just proportion, or that it should be the measure of such just proportion. The only "compact" claimed to have been made is that West Virginia should take up herself a just proportion of the public debt, to be ascertained in the manner agreed. If the two States through error, mistake, or ignorance agreed upon a rule of measurement that is now found to be impracticable, they cannot ask this court to apply that impracticable rule. If, on the other hand, the two States agreed upon this rule, knowing at the time it was impracticable, that it could not ascertain the result sought, then their conduct is open to scrutiny and they must explain why they agreed on a rule known by them to be unfit. And this inquiry must lead to an investigation as to the parties to such agreement.

3. The parties to the agreement appear to be the State of Virginia and the State of West Virginia.

But the method of asceertainment appears to have been contrived and proposed by Virginia, and she was the obligor in the bonds that constituted the debt. In providing for the erection of a new State from a part of her territory, and thus diminishing her sources of revenue by the cession of nearly one-third of her territory and her population, a sane regard for her own interests and the interests of her bondholding creditors should have prompted Virginia to require of the proposed new State some recognition of her liability for a just proportion of that public debt and some provision for the discharge thereafter of such liability. She did require that the new State should take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt, but she further proposed that such just proportion should be ascertained by the method indicated.

What fair and reasonable construction should be placed upon this conduct? Virginia must be held to have had intelligent regard to her own interests, yet she was not only ceding near one-third of her territory, but was also releasing West Virginia from her liability for her proportion of the debt. How can these be reconciled? Plainly enough. There were two Virginias. One had preceded the formation of the Union; the other was a reorganization of the government of the former, effected on June 13, 1861, in the city of Wheeling. It took upon itself the name and sought to perform the functions of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and it was recognized by the Federal Government as being the true and real Commonwealth of Virginia. It sent Senators and Representatives to the Congress of the United States, and received from the United States money that belonged to the Commonwealth of Virginia. The reason of the existence of this Restored State was the conversion of the territory occupied by it and that of the population of such territory into a new State, which was to be admitted into the Union as an independent sovereign State. Such new State could not be erected within the territory and jurisdiction of Virginia without the consent of Virginia, and the State of Virginia, whose capital was in the city of Richmond, it was reasonably feared would not give such consent. Hence the necessity of forming another Virginia whose consent could be obtained. So the Restored State of Virginia was formed of forty or more counties of the old Commonwealth, and two months later it provided by ordinance for the erection of the new State, which was composed of those same counties, and none other. The Restored State of Virginia became the State of West Virginia. Its territory and its population became the territory and population of West Virginia, and all that remained to that evanescent State was its name and its Governor. The Governor was, to be sure, a resident of the new State of West Virginia, but his sense of official duty required that he should retain his office and his government, although there remained to him nothing to govern. He removed the seat of his government to Alexandria, and later, after the evacuation of the city of Richmond, he removed to that city and held himself out as Governor.

On March 2, 1867, Congress, by an "act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States" (14 St., p. 428), declared that—

> "Whereas no legal governments or adequate protection for life and property now exist in the rebel States of Virginia, etc., * * * and
> "Whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said States until loyal, republican governments can be legally established, &c.," and the entire government of the Restored State of Virginia was swept out of existence, and a major-general of the U. S. Army reigned in its stead. So we can now perceive why it was that the two States of Virginia and West Virginia might very intelligently have entered into such a compact. The Restored State knew that her days were numbered and that the only function of her sovereign existence was to provide for the transformation of herself into the new State of West Virginia. She took care to provide a method for ascertaining West Virginia's proportion of the public debt, which would secure West Virginia from all but a nominal liability, and it concerned her not at all that the burden of the entire debt should fall upon the old Commonwealth of Virginia when she emerged from the horrors of war. Now we can all plainly see that while there appeared to be two parties entering into a solemn compact, these two were but one and the same party at different stages of its political existence.

The convention that framed the constitution for the proposed new State did not regard itself as bound by any suggestions or requirements made by the Wheeling ordinance, and it either ignored or repudiated the suggestions made as to the name of the proposed State, and as to the method of determining the proportion of the public debt of Virginia for which West Virginia should be held liable.

The Wheeling ordinance, as its title declared, was framed and passed only "to provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State."

It was not intended and it did not purport to do anything more than make appropriate provision for the organization of such new State, by calling a convention which should be empowered to frame a constitution for the new State, and to do anything else that was within the power of a constitutional convention.

The convention had been called under the provisions of the ordinance, and that instrument had now performed all its functions and ceased to be any longer operative and binding.

The first section of the ordinance had provided that—> "The people of Virginia, by their delegates in convention assembled, do ordain that a new State, to be called the State of Kanawha, be formed and erected out of the territory included within the following-described boundary," &c.

Article 1, section 1, of the constitution framed by the convention assembled under that ordinance, provided:

> "1. The State of West Virginia shall be and remain one of the United States of America."

In the very important feature of the name of the new State, the first act of the convention was to disregard altogether the requirement of the ordinance that the new State should be called "Kanawha," and to fix upon it the name of West Virginia.

So, as has been seen, in the matter of providing the method for ascertaining the proportion of the public debt to be borne by the new State, the convention disregarded the suggestion or requirement of the ordinance and made a wholly different provision.

The convention called to frame the constitution for the new State was elected, and it assembled and entered upon the discharge of its duties, in obedience and pursuant to the mandate of the ordinance, but when it assembled and had organized it recognized the fact that it represented the sovereign powers of the people who had called it together and had clothed it with full authority to exercise those powers. The people it represented had imposed no restrictions or limitations upon it, and the preceding convention, which had framed and passed the ordinance under which it had been called, was without authority to impose such restrictions or to prescribe to it the duties it was to perform. If that convention had the power to dictate to it the provisions of the constitution it was called to frame—even the single provision as to the method by which the amount of the public debt to be borne by the new State should be ascertained—then, plainly, it was not what it purported to be, representing the sovereign powers of the people who were thus "in convention assembled," but it was merely empowered to record the prescripts and mandates of the former convention.

It doubtless had before it the ordinance under which it had been called into being, and was fully advised of all that the ordinance contained, and was further advised as to its obligations and duties under the ordinance. It did not regard itself bound by those obligations and duties to adopt the name of the State prescribed by the ordinance, and, doubtless, for the same reasons disregarded the suggestion made in the ordinance as to the method proposed for ascertaining the amount of the liability of the State for the public debt.

The argument urged on behalf of West Virginia in this case has been that when that State accepted the constitution framed for her by the people of Virginia, then within the territory of the proposed new State, she accepted it under the ordinance, and thereby assented to each and all of the provisions of that ordinance, and among these the provisions embraced in the ninth section, prescribing the method for ascertaining the amount of West Virginia's liability for the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

That argument, however, assumes as a postulate the very thing to be proven. Where and how does it appear that the people of West Virginia, when they ratified and adopted the constitution that had been framed for them, "assented to each and all of the provisions of the ordinance" under which the convention had been assembled?

They certainly did not assent to the provision as to the name by which the proposed State should be called, and they assented to the provision made by the convention, and not to that made by the ordinance, for the ascertainment of the amount of the liability of the new State.

But, it is insisted, the provision of the constitution referred to and adopted as an implied, although unexpressed term, the method proposed by the ordinance in this, that it directed that "the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable," and the legislature could ascertain it only by the method proposed by the ordinance.

But here, again, is a desperate assumption as a fact of what at most is but conjectural. Why was the legislature restricted as to the method of ascertainment to that fantastic device proposed by the ordinance?

We have shown, and may repeat, that by the method of the ordinance it is now agreed and insisted by counsel for West Virginia no proportion whatever of the public debt of Virginia could possibly be ascertained. If by the method prescribed or proposed it is now agreed that no proportion—just or equitable or possible—could be ascertained, how can it be reasonably contended that the two States did solemnly agree that by that method only should West Virginia's liability be ascertained? If there was such an agreement or compact entered into between the two States, and they did know at the time that the method agreed on was impracticable, futile, and impossible, and with such knowledge did enter into such compact, then it was a fraud on the creditors whose rights they professed to be providing for and a deliberate fraud on the real Commonwealth of Virginia, upon which, at last, the entire burden of the public debt, as they well knew, inevitably falls. On the other hand, if the two States entered into this compact in ignorance of the fact that the method agreed on between them was impracticable and could not accomplish the result for which it was intended, then the compact, void as to this feature of it, because founded on mutual mistake.

But was the provision made by the constitution based upon the provision made by the ordinance and intended by its framers to be carried out by the method proposed by the ordinance?

Let the two provisions be contrasted with each other:

Ninth Section of the Ordinance.

The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of the debt contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period. All private rights and interests in the lands within the proposed State derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed new State, and shall be governed by the laws now existing in the State of West Virginia.

Eighth Article of Constitution.

An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years.

The general purpose and avowed object of both provisions was to fix upon the new State to be formed out of a part of the territory of Virginia a reasonably proper proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth to the creation of which the people of both the old and the new State had, through their common legislature, contributed and in the benefits of which that people had equally participated. If, as insisted now by West Virginia, the framers of her constitution intended that her legislature should ascertain such proportion by the method proposed by the ordinance, and that method appears on its face and without the aid of external evidence to have been impracticable and impossible and leading inevitably to absurd and monstrous consequences, should any construction be given to the constitution that must involve such result?

Judge Cooley, in speaking of the rules for the construction of constitutions, and particularly of "unjust provisions," says (Constitutional Limitations, ed., p. 73):

> "We do not say, however, that if a clause should be found in a constitution which should appear at first blush to demand a construction leading to monstrous and absurd consequences, it might not be the duty of the court to question and cross-question such clause closely, with a view to discover in it, if possible, some other meaning more consistent with the general purposes and aims of the instrument."

The application of this rule of construction must relieve the constitutional convention of the charge made by West Virginia that it intended by the eighth section of the eighth article of the constitution framed by it to adopt the method proposed by the ordinance as the only method by which the legislature should ascertain the amount of West Virginia's liability. It is by construction only that the conclusion can be reached that the two States by solemn compact agreed, through the medium of this constitutional provision, that the method of the ordinance was the method that should be employed.

Passing from the matter of construction, let us proceed to contrast the two provisions. We observe, in the first place, that the constitutional provisions employ different words and phrases from those employed in the ordinance. On the theory that the provision of the constitution is but a continuation of that made by the ordinance—that they are to be construed in pari materia, and, if possible, made to stand together—the inquiry is at once suggested, why this change of words? This court has said that "a change in phraseology creates a presumption of a change in intent" (Crawford vs. Burke, 195 U. S., 190).

The ordinance said: "The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion."

The constitution said: "An equitable proportion, &c., shall be assumed."

Does this "change in phraseology create a presumption of change in intent?" Have the words employed in the one a different significance from those employed in the other?

In Anderson's Dictionary of Law (1889) these words are thus defined:

> "JUST.—Probable, adequate, equivalent.
>
> "EQUITABLE.—1. According to natural right and justice, just and right in a particular case, as distinguished from the strict rule of a general law.
> "2. That which can be sustained or made available or effective in a court of equity, or upon principles of equity jurisprudence."

"Just" characterizes the result sought to be reached by arbitration, while "equitable" characterizes the result sought to be reached by the chancellor in applying the rules and principles of equity jurisprudence.

The arbitrator is controlled by what he regards as the rules of common sense—fairness between man and man. The chancellor is controlled by ascertained and established rules and doctrines laid down in judicial decision and by text-writers of accepted authority.

The results to be reached by the application prescribed by the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance were doubtless regarded by its framers as "just" under all the circumstances of their status, historical, economical, and political; but under the interpretation given to that method by the learned counsel for West Virginia and from its admitted inadequacy for the ascertainment of the proper proportion of this public debt to be borne by West Virginia, it cannot be accepted as "equitable."

Indeed, it is manifest that the counsel for West Virginia, in their contentions on the demurrer, have regarded the matter in dispute here as having been referred by both States to the arbitrament and award of the legislature of West Virginia. Mr. Carlisle, in his argument on the demurrer (1 May's Comp., p. 181), said:

> "Virginia referred this matter absolutely to the judgment of the legislature of West Virginia and tacitly agreed to abide by the action of this legislative body."

And again (page 190) he said:

> "An examination of the Wheeling ordinance shows that the amount of the Virginia debt, as it existed prior to January the first, 1861, is not a factor to be taken into consideration in ascertaining West Virginia's just proportion."

That is, the just proportion of a thing may be ascertained without knowing what the thing is—the amount or the extent of the thing of which the just proportion is to be ascertained is not a factor to be taken into consideration in the calculation.

Now, when we find the convention with the ordinance before it rejecting the word "just" and employing the word "equitable," is it not a reasonable presumption that it perceived that the method proposed by the ordinance could not ascertain a "just proportion" or an equitable proportion, and that it was unwilling to employ terms that might indicate that it approved of or countenanced that method, and for that reason it changed the word employed in the ordinance and substituted the word "equitable" to indicate that the proportion to be assumed by West Virginia was such as a court of equity might ascertain, but which could not be ascertained by the method proposed by the ordinance?

But we are told that this court has already decided this question, and has held that when the convention provided by the eighth section of the eighth article of the constitution that "the legislature should ascertain the same as soon as practicable," it referred to the method of ascertainment prescribed by the Virginia convention. Let us examine that contention.

West Virginia demurred to the bill on a ground not stated in either the formal demurrer filed or in the amended demurrer, but stated for the first time in Mr. Carlisle's brief (1 May's Comp., p. 186) as follows, viz.:

> "The two States have, therefore, by compact between themselves and with the consent of Congress, as required by the constitution, designated a tribunal to ascertain and settle West Virginia's share of the debt. This tribunal still exists, and is unquestionably competent to discharge the duties imposed upon it. And, moreover, but most important of all, it is the only tribunal existing or that can be established possessing the power to provide for the payment of West Virginia's share of the debt when the same has been ascertained, in accordance with the terms of the compact. It cannot be coerced by any judicial or other civil process known to the constitution or laws of the country. No court can compel it either to adjust the debt or to provide a sinking fund, or impose taxes, issue bonds, or appropriate money."

It was in meeting that ground of demurrer that the Chief Justice used the language which is now relied on as expressing a final judgment on the facts. He said:

> "It is, however, further insisted that this court cannot proceed to judgment because of an alleged compact entered into between Virginia and West Virginia, with the consent of Congress, by which the question of the liability of West Virginia to Virginia was submitted to the arbitrament and award of the legislature of West Virginia as the sole tribunal which could pass upon it."

And then, after referring to the provisions of the constitution and to the act of the Virginia legislature of May 13, 1862, the Chief Justice proceeded:

> "When Virginia, on August 20, 1861, by ordinance provided for the formation of a new State out of the territory of this State, and declared therein that 'the new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861,' to be ascertained as provided, it is to be supposed that the new State had this in mind when it framed its own constitution, and that when that instrument provided that its legislature should 'ascertain the same as soon as practicable,' it referred to the method of ascertainment provided by the Virginia convention."

The court was not here deciding as a fact that the constitutional convention did refer to the method of ascertainment provided by the ordinance. It was meeting the objection urged in support of the demurrer, that this court could not exercise jurisdiction to "ascertain and settle West Virginia's share," because the two States had agreed to submit that matter to the arbitrament and award of the West Virginia legislature.

It said, in substance: Assuming that this alleged compact was entered into between the two States, yet enough appears on the face of the bill to show that the legislature was not vested with absolute, exclusive power to determine the matter by any method it saw fit to employ, because when the convention referred the matter to the legislature to ascertain West Virginia's equitable proportion of the debt it is to be supposed that it referred to the method provided by the ordinance.

This merely suggests a theory, consistent with the case stated in the bill, which is sufficient to meet the theory advanced by the demurrant. It decides nothing more. The court decides nothing as to the merits of the method provided by the ordinance, nothing as to adequacy, efficiency, or its adaptability to meet the requirements of the professed object of the ordinance, and nothing as to the persons who contrived that method or as to their real object and purpose in contriving it as they did. If it now is made evident that the method provided by the ordinance is inappropriate, that no proportion whatever of the public debt can be ascertained by it, can this court be asked to apply it? If the two States agreed upon, knowing its inefficiency or not knowing it, can a compact founded in fraud or in ignorance be insisted on? If the convention that framed the constitution, having before it the ninth section of the ordinance and being persuaded that the method proposed by it would defeat the very object and purpose of the framers of the constitutions, which was to ascertain an equitable proportion of the debt, did reject that method and employed other and different terms from those employed in the ordinance, should it be presumed to have intended that some other method should be employed by the legislature?

Finally, from all the facts and considerations here indicated, can it be held or presumed that the framers of the constitution intended to adopt, approve, or recognize the method proposed by the ordinance as the method by which they contemplated that the legislature would ascertain the equitable proportion to be borne by West Virginia?

The act of Congress of 31st of December, 1862, admitting the State of West Virginia into the Union, did not affirm the Wheeling ordinance, expressly or by implication, nor did it affirm the alleged compact between Virginia and West Virginia.

Mr. Carlisle has stated the transaction as he contends for it as follows:

> "The compact was entered into by the sovereignty conventions of the two States. In one the proposition was made in the form of an ordinance and in the other it was accepted in the form of a constitutional provision; and then it was consented to by Congress, and thus became an absolute and permanent obligation of the two States, which neither of them could thereafter abrogate or alter" (1 May's Comp., p. 386).

We have seen that the convention of August 20, 1861, which framed the Wheeling ordinance, providing for the election of the constitutional convention, which assembled in November, 1861, directed, in the tenth section of that ordinance—

> "that when the General Assembly shall give its consent to the formation of the new State, it shall forward to the Congress of the United States such consent, together with 'an official copy of such constitution,' with the request that the new State be admitted into the Union of States."

It did not direct that there should be forwarded to the Congress an official copy of the Wheeling ordinance, because between that convention and its function and its work and the Congress of the United States there was no sort of relation or connection. The function of that convention was merely to provide for the assembling of another convention in the future, to which should be entrusted the more important work of framing a constitution for the new State.

The functions and powers of the August convention expired upon its adjournment sine die. It had provided for an election of delegates to the November convention and had laid certain duties upon the Governor of the State and certain other duties upon the legislature, all relating to the work of the approaching convention, and then it adjourned. It performed no act of which the Congress of the United States could take cognizance. It purported to be speaking for Virginia and not for West Virginia, and it was West Virginia alone that was to deal with Congress. Hence it was that the constitution framed by the people of the proposed new State of West Virginia, and not the ordinance framed by the people of Virginia, was the only instrument proper or needful to be forwarded to Congress upon the application of West Virginia for admission into the Union.

We have seen that the convention of November, 1861, when it framed the constitution for West Virginia, utterly ignored and disregarded the provision made by the Virginia convention of August, 1861, for the ascertainment of the just proportion of the public debt of Virginia to be taken upon itself by West Virginia.

The November convention doubtless regarded the provision proposed by Virginia as an attempted invasion of the sovereign rights of the new State an impertinent intrusion into a matter which was peculiarly one of domestic concern to her as to which Virginia could not decently dictate. There is nothing in this record to warrant the suggestion that the Wheeling ordinance was ever before Congress or known to that body when it passed the act admitting West Virginia into the Union. On looking to the act itself, we find that it refers to the constitution framed by the convention which assembled on the 26th of November, 1861, and to the act of the Virginia legislature of May 13, 1862, giving consent to the erection of the new State, but it nowhere refers to the convention which assembled in August or to the ordinance passed by that convention.

We have seen that the consent of Virginia was given to the erection of the new State "according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the constitution for the State of West Virginia * * * proposed by the convention which assembled in Wheeling on the 26th day of November, 1861."

We have seen that the convention which framed the constitution for West Virginia makes no reference whatever to the convention of August or to the ordinance framed by that convention, and although it deals with the matter of West Virginia's equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia, it does not refer to the provision proposed for the same matter by the ninth section of the ordinance. Upon what ground, then, we ask, is it contended that the provisions of that ordinance ever came to the knowledge and received the consideration of Congress, and that Congress admitted West Virginia into the Union subject to a compact between Virginia and West Virginia, which compact embraced the provisions of the ordinance?

The act of Congress admitting West Virginia expressly declares that she is admitted "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever."

The constitutions of the several original States defined their rights, powers, and duties. None of them came into being as members of the Union with any restriction imposed upon them as to their right to determine how and in what manner their domestic concerns should be managed. Yet the claim here asserted is that West Virginia was admitted into the Union shorn of any right or discretion to determine how her proportion of this congenital debt should be ascertained.

We believe that we have shown that the evidence relied on by West Virginia is altogether insufficient to establish any compact or agreement whatever formed between her and Virginia at the period of her creation; that the Wheeling ordinance, and especially the ninth section thereof, was not recognized by the convention that framed the constitution for West Virginia in November, 1861, and did not enter in spirit or substance into that constitution; that it was not known to or considered by the Congress of the United States when it passed the act admitting West Virginia into the Union; that there was no special agreement or compact entered into between Virginia and West Virginia providing a method for ascertaining the contributive proportion to be borne by West Virginia of the public debt of Virginia, and that therefore that proper portion of this public debt to be borne by West Virginia rests alone upon the recognized doctrines of international law, and that no exception has been shown to have existed which takes her case out of the operation of that law.

The act of the Virginia legislature giving consent to the creation of the new State within its jurisdiction did not regard the Wheeling ordinance, and the consent was not given on the condition, expressed or implied, that the ordinance or any of its provisions should form a compact between the States.

The act was passed on the 10th of May, 1862, and is in part as follows:

> "Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That the consent of the legislature of Virginia be, and the same is hereby given, to the formation and erection of the State of West Virginia within the jurisdiction of this State, to include the counties of * * * according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the constitution for the said State of West Virginia, and the schedule thereto annexed, proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 26th day of November, 1861," &c.

The consent, then, was given, not under the provisions of the ordinance adopted by the convention which assembled at Wheeling in August, 1861, but under the provisions of the constitution for the State of West Virginia proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 26th day of November, 1861.

Why was this unusual precision of language used to describe the exact conditions under which that consent was given? Not content with stating that the consent was given to the erection of a State "under the provision of the constitution," they proceed further to identify that constitution as the one proposed by a convention which assembled in November, and not by a convention which had assembled in the same place in the previous August.

The object really appears to have been to exclude the notion, now insisted on, that the ordinance framed by the convention which assembled in August exercised any influence or control whatever on the action of the legislature in giving its consent.

It certainly tends to exclude that notion that the legislature expressly declared that the consent was given to the State which was to be under the provisions of a constitution which was before it, and not under the provisions of the Wheeling ordinance, which was not mentioned or referred to in the act.

How, then, can it be insisted, as it is insisted in behalf of West Virginia, that this act of the Virginia legislature was a ratification of the ordinance?

Mr. Carlisle (1 May's Comp., p. 386) says in his carefully prepared brief:

> "We insist that the compact is binding as a whole or it is not binding at all, and that the act of the Virginia legislature, passed May 13th, 1862, while it was not necessary to the validity of the compact, constituted a ratification of it by that body."

We utterly deny that there was any compact or agreement whatever between Virginia and West Virginia, and that the whole notion is a creation of the imagination of counsel—necessary, it may be, to the completeness of the kaleidoscopic dream which in its varying forms has been projected here as a defense to the bill.

Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, section 1405, says:

> "Thus, where a State is admitted into the Union notoriously upon a compact made between it and the State of which it previously composed a part, there the act of Congress admitting such State into the Union is an implied consent to the terms of the compact. This was true as to the compact between Virginia and Kentucky upon the admission of the latter into the Union, and the like rule will apply to other States, such as Maine, more recently admitted into the Union."

The compact between Virginia and Kentucky was notorious because it was incorporated into the constitution of Kentucky, but the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance was not incorporated into the constitution of West Virginia, but rather, as we have seen, was repudiated and rejected by the convention that framed that constitution. Where, then, shall we look to learn its terms and conditions? It is now insisted that the ninth section was a proposition submitted by Virginia to West Virginia as a condition in which alone Virginia would consent to the erection of the new State.

Mr. Carlisle's construction of the several transactions is thus stated:

> "The convention proposed that a new State might be formed, to be called the State of Kanawha, to include certain counties, and that the new State should assume a just proportion of the public debt of Virginia as it existed on the 1st day of January, 1861, to be ascertained, as stated in the ordinance, by charging to the new State all the money expended > within her limits—within the limits of that territory—since any part of the debt was contracted, and with her just proportion of the ordinary expenses during the same time, and crediting the new State with all money that has been paid in from that territory during the same period. That was Virginia's proposition to the new State. Of course, there was no State of Kanawha at that time, and therefore there was no second party to the proposed contract; but subsequently the people within that territory assembled in a sovereignty convention, and then, for the first time they had a right, and the power, to consent or dissent from the proposition that Virginia had made. It was still open; it had not been withdrawn; and the new State accepted it with these additions; that the amount of the debt should be ascertained by the legislature of the new State as soon as practicable, and that it should establish a sinking fund sufficient to provide for the payment of the interest, and the redemption of the principal within thirty-four years."

> 1 May's Comp., page 357.

This is a full, clear statement of the compact. But, pray, by what process of reasoning and by what rules of construction is the provision made in the eighth article of the constitution made in addition to the ninth section of the ordinance?

We have shown, we think, that the two provisions are repugnant to each other; that the provision made in the constitution was a distinct repudiation and rejection of the provision made in the ordinance; that it was a substitute for it, and was made final and conclusive by being embodied in the fundamental law of the State.

West Virginia at no time and in no form ever accepted the proposition made to it by Virginia through the Wheeling ordinance. The constitution of West Virginia was the final word spoken on the subject, and it nowhere speaks or refers to the proposition contained in the ordinance, but ignores it save in so far as it adopted a wholly different and conflicting provision as to the subject-matter of the ordinance.

An act of legislature repealing a previous enactment may in a loose and very inaccurate sense be said to be an addition to the previous act. It refers in express terms to the previous act, or else in general terms by repealing "all acts inconsistent with this act." It recognizes that there are or may be acts having provisions inconsistent with this act. But here it is apparent, and indeed admitted, that while the ordinance proposes a method for ascertaining a "just proportion of the public debt," that the method proposed is unfit and inadequate for such ascertainment, because there is no relation between the amount of such debt and the method proposed for ascertaining a proportion of it, as counsel for West Virginia insist "that the amount of the debt is not a factor to be taken into consideration in ascertaining West Virginia's just proportion of it." So it is manifest that the method proposed is inconsistent with and repugnant to the expressed object and purpose of the ninth section of the ordinance.

The eighth article of the constitution of West Virginia contains no such vicious method of ascertainment. Its provisions are altogether inconsistent with it. How, then, can the ninth section of the ordinance and the eighth article of the constitution be read together, and how can the method proposed by the ordinance be "added" to the provision of the constitution? As already shown, the suggestion made by this court in its opinion on the demurrer to the bill was but the indication of a view that on a demurrer, where every presumption is to be taken against the demurrant which is warranted by the case stated in the bill, that for all that appeared on the face of the bill it was not impossible that the language used in the constitution had reference to the method proposed in the ordinance. But it cannot be seriously contended here on the final hearing that the opinion of the court on the demurrer was intended to adjudicate and determine any matter of fact involved in the issue on the merits of the case.

The ordinance providing for the creation of the new State was not necessary or material to the creation of that State. The consent of Virginia and the act of Congress were all that was needed, and had there been no ordinance at all the validity of the act of Congress would be beyond question in the courts. When the State was created and admitted into the Union the ordinance became exhausted and at an end.

The point here is whether the ninth section of that ordinance, which assumed to prescribe to the new State the method by which its liabilities should be ascertained and provided for after the State was clothed with sovereignty, was not vain and futile because of an attempted limitation on the sovereignty of the State and an invasion of her domestic concerns.

Summary of the points herein made in support of the argument that the plan or method for ascertaining West Virginia's proper proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, indicated in the International Law doctrine, as recognized in the case of Hartman vs. Greenhow, 102 U. S., 672, is the only plan that can be adopted, and that the plan proposed by the ninth section of the "Wheeling Ordinance" is now shown to be unjust and impracticable.

(1.) The aggregate amount of the public debt as of January 1, 1861, is ascertained to be $33,897,073.82.

This is charged in the bill and admitted in the answer, and now found by the special master in paragraph of his report.

(2.) The government of the "Restored State of Virginia" was set up in June, 1861, and gave its consent to the erection of the new State of West Virginia out of part of the territory of Virginia. The Restored State of Virginia was recognized by the political departments of the United States as the lawful State of Virginia, and as such was represented in the Congress of the United States.

(3.) Upon the partition of the territory of Virginia and the erection of the State of West Virginia upon one of those parts, that new State, under the doctrines of international law, became liable for an equitable and proper proportion of the debt of the parent State on the basis of territory and population, unless some other method of fixing such proportion was provided by a special agreement between the two States.

(4.) The burden of proof lies upon the State claiming under such special agreement to prove the same by adequate evidence, and such evidence must be the same that would be required in a like case between private parties.

(5.) If such special agreement consisted of a proposition made by Virginia to West Virginia, then, before such agreement could be formed, it must appear that West Virginia accepted the terms proposed, without addition thereto or subtraction therefrom, but absolutely and unconditionally. If one term of such proposal was omitted, or other terms added, that was a rejection and not an acceptance of the proposal.

(6.) If the ninth section of the "Wheeling Ordinance" is relied on as the proposal, and the eighth section of the eighth article of the constitution of West Virginia is relied on as the acceptance of the proposal, then it is manifest from a comparison of the two that West Virginia did not accept such proposal in the terms in which it was made, but rejected the same.

(7.) The averment by West Virginia that the language employed in the eighth article of the constitution—"and the legislature shall ascertain the same"—meant that the legislature should ascertain it by the method proposed by the ordinance, finds no support from anything that appears in this record, and is not warranted by the character of the transaction, the relation of the parties, or by the inherent nature of the method proposed by the ordinance, because—

(8.) The method proposed by the ordinance is now admitted by counsel for West Virginia and is found as a fact by the special master to bear no relation whatever to the amount of the public debt, and is inadequate and incapable of employment in the ascertainment of any proportion whatever of such debt.

(9.) That the method proposed by the ninth section of the ordinance for ascertaining West Virginia's proportion of the public debt was not a term proposed by Virginia, upon the acceptance of which she would consent to the creation of the new State. It was not a condition precedent or subsequent to the creation of such new State, and, in both its form and its subject-matter, could not have been intended, or if intended could not have been allowed, as a reasonable and proper provision in an ordinance adopted by one State looking to the creation of a new State within its territory.

(10.) That the act of the legislature of Virginia of February 13, 1862, giving its consent to the erection of the new State, cannot be construed as basing such consent upon the ninth section of the ordinance, because, in express terms, it bases it upon the provision of the constitution, and does it in such terms as to exclude the notion that it contemplated the action of any other convention than the November convention that framed the constitution.

(11.) That the convention that framed the constitution did not regard the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance as controlling its action to any extent appears from the fact that it changed the name of the State from that fixed by the prior convention and prescribed wholly different terms and methods for ascertaining West Virginia's proportion of the debt from that proposed by the ordinance.

(12.) That the Congress of the United States, before it admitted West Virginia into the Union, inquired, through certain of its members, in open session, as to what provision had been made for the payment of the public debt, and not until the assurance had been given that such provision had been made by its constitution did it admit the State. It cannot be supposed that Congress would have admitted it had it appeared that the only provision for meeting West Virginia's proper proportion of the debt was made in the ninth section of the ordinance, which, it is now admitted, bears no relation whatever to the amount of that debt.

These considerations, I confidently submit, make it impossible for this court to hold that the method proposed by the ninth section of the ordinance can be employed to ascertain the proportion of the public debt proper to be borne by West Virginia. The only other method practicable for this purpose is that indicated by the well-established doctrine of international law.

ARTHUR G. POTTER.

PRICE, WATERHOUSE & CO.,
For the Plaintiff.

The foregoing seventeen pages are a calculation of West Virginia's proportion of the debt of Virginia, including the bonds held by the Sinking Fund, the Board of Public Works and the Literary Fund as a part of the debt. The Master in his report has not allowed the bonds held by the Sinking Fund, the Board of Public Works and the Literary Fund as a part of the public debt of Virginia, as the same existed on January 1, 1861, and West Virginia's proportion of these bonds is now deducted from her proportion of the debt as given in the preceding pages of this pamphlet. The accrued interest and the interest from January 1, 1861, as heretofore calculated, on West Virginia's proportion of these bonds is also deducted.

The following five tables show West Virginia's proportion of the debt of Virginia on January 1, 1861, excluding the bonds held by the Sinking Fund, the Board of Public Works and the Literary Fund as a part of the debt; and consisting of principal and interest accrued and payable at that date with interest on the principal from January 1, 1861, as heretofore calculated on the bases shown in joint Exhibit BI:

	West Virginia's Proportion of Debt, including holdings of Sinking Fund, Board of Public Works and Literary Fund.	West Virginia's Proportion of Bonds held by Sinking Fund, Board of Public Works and Literary Fund.	West Virginia's Proportion of Debt, excluding Bonds held by Sinking Fund, Board of Public Works and Literary Fund.

NOTES OF ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL FOR COMPLAINANT.

PREFATORY NOTE.

EXPLANATORY OF ARRANGEMENT OF THE RECORD AND OF REFERENCES MADE IN THE ARGUMENT.

The principal references in the argument of the case will be to—

1. The large volume of exhibits and evidence, returned by the Master with his report, entitled "Record."

This will be referred to by pages, as follows, "R. 20," "R. 55," etc.

The tabulated statements or schedules which constitute a valuable part of that volume, and embody in a condensed form the most important data in the case, have been, for convenience, also printed and bound together in a separate volume, where they will be found arranged for ready reference according to the paging and order in which they appear in the larger volume, and can be readily examined accordingly.

These schedules are designated "Plaintiff's and Defendant's Exhibit" "A-1," "B-1," etc.; or "Defendant's Exhibit" "D-1;" or Plaintiff's Exhibit" "E-3," etc. The great advantage of the method which, under the direction of the Master, was adopted in making up all of the "Joint Exhibits," and some of the more important of "Plaintiff's Exhibits," and of "Defendant's Exhibits," comes from the fact that in those exhibits, so certified by the accountants for both parties, the figures stated are agreed figures,—the only question left open being as to the proper or legal application or use to be made of those agreed amounts in making up the respective accounts to which they relate.

These tabulated statements present in concrete form the claims of the opposing parties, and contain the very gist of the case.

It is important therefore to an intelligent understanding of the numerous questions presented, to clearly understand the method adopted by the Master for presenting the claims of the parties, respectively, and the evidence in support thereof. A clear apprehension of this method can be had from a preliminary examination of the "Record," and the exhibits and schedules referred to, together with the master's report.

2. The Statutes, and extracts from Ordinances, and Constitutions of the two States, most material to the questions in the cause, have been compiled under the direction of the master in a separate volume, designated as "Appendix to the Record." This will be referred to as "App. p. 12, 26," etc.

3. West Virginia has caused two volumes to be compiled, printed and filed in the clerk's office of the Court, containing most of the record of the case down to the appointment of the Special Master; including also the arguments of counsel on the general hearings in this Court, and some papers and documents not a part of the record. The first volume of this compilation was edited by the Hon. Clarke W. May, the late attorney general of West Virginia; the second volume by Hon. W. G. Conley, the present attorney general of that State.

When for convenience this compilation is referred to it will be designated, "West Virginia's Compilation, Vol. 1," etc.

vs.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

No. 3, Original. October Term, 1910.

NOTES OF ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL FOR COMPLAINANT.

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT.

This suit is a result of the dismemberment of the Commonwealth of Virginia and the formation of the State of West Virginia out of her territory.

It is instituted for the purpose of having an accounting with West Virginia, and determining her equitable share of the indebtedness of the undivided Commonwealth.

That indebtedness,—independently of the bonds belonging to the sinking fund and the literary fund, held by the corporations known as the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the President and Directors of the Literary fund,—amounted to $33,897,073.82 on the 31st of December, 1860; of which $32,919,863.93 were principal, and $977,209.89 were accrued interest. The correctness of these figures is conceded by West Virginia.—See Master's Report, pages 1, 2, 3 and 29.

The specific relief sought by Virginia is to have West Virginia's equitable proportion of this common indebtedness fairly ascertained, and to secure the payment of the same by that State.

This large indebtedness—an enormous liability, having reference to the resources of the Commonwealth at the time it was contracted—came upon her with added force after the close of a long and disastrous war; but notwithstanding her impoverishment Virginia has, down to the present time, paid more than thirty-eight millions of dollars in interest, and has retired a considerable amount of the principal of the original debt, in addition to large payments made upon the portion of the debt, payment of which she has assumed and for which she has given er obligations. And yet there are some twenty-five millions of dollars of obligations, issued by Virginia as she exists to-day, outstanding and unpaid, upon which the interest is regularly met by the Commonwealth. So that Virginia has paid off and retired, or assumed and issued her own bonds for, over seventy-four millions of dollars, principal and interest, down to the present year, including the bonds which she has redeemed since 1865.

While the Commonwealth has made this large contribution to the payment of the principal and interest of the common debt, since the formation of the new State,—much of it made during the decades following the Civil War, at a painful sacrifice, from the scant means of an impoverished people,—West Virginia has not paid one dollar upon that common indebtedness, but has refused to pay, and denied her liability to pay, any part of the same. See Resolutions of West Virginia Legislature denying any liability for, and refusing to negotiate in reference to, the Virginia Debt.—App. 247, 248.

There is another fact which it is proper to call to mind in this connection:

The bulk of this large common debt was contracted with the sanction and by the votes of the representatives in the General Assembly of Virginia from the counties now constituting the State of West Virginia,—a large part of it having been actually put upon Virginia by the votes of those representatives over the votes of a majority of the representatives of the counties constituting the Virginia of to-day; and but a small part of that indebtedness would have been contracted had the representatives from West Virginia counties in the General Assembly of Virginia opposed and voted against the Acts by virtue of which the debt was created.

These pregnant facts are specifically alleged in the complainant's bill, and are not denied or questioned in the defendant's answer.—See Paragraph III of the Bill, R. 4; and Paragraph III of the Defendant's Answer, R. 144.

It is also true that more than seven-eighths of the indebtedness of Virginia at the time of the formation of West Virginia was represented by equivalent sums expended on works of internal improvement, which were either designed, begun, and built for the purpose of penetrating and developing West Virginia territory, or are to-day parts of railway systems and lines of communication which serve the territory and people of West Virginia, and afford large regions of that State their best access to the Atlantic seaboard and to the markets of the world.—See Appendix I to this Note of Argument.

The foregoing statement of facts is made here, because they have an important bearing upon the broad equities of the case, and entitle Virginia to fair and just consideration in the application of rules of construction to the statutes, ordinances and provisions of constitutions which are relied upon as determining the rights and obligations of the parties.

They are tremendous facts, and have a mighty bearing upon questions which go to the very right of the cause.

This suit is brought by Virginia for her own protection and relief; and yet, to the extent that it shall result in her exoneration, it will inure to the benefit of the common creditors who have deposited their bonds in her keeping.

She actually to-day holds every bond which was issued by the Commonwealth prior to the formation of West Virginia, which is known to be in existence, and she also holds more than nine-tenths of the certificates which she issued to the common creditors of the two States, who confided those bonds to her keeping.—R. 102.

So that Virginia, and Virginia alone, has, and represents here every substantial right and interest, adverse to the defendant, in any way connected with the unsettled debt of the undivided State, or directly or indirectly involved in this suit.

Such are some of the more important facts which underlie this suit, and such generally are the relations of Virginia to, and her vital interests in, the litigation.

ARGUMENT.

There can be no question, as a principle of public law, public justice and public right, that, on the 20th day of June, 1863, when West Virginia became one of the States of the American Union, the public debt of Virginia, then existing, constituted, independently of any stipulation between Virginia and the new State, an equitable and a moral claim against the people and the property, both of West Virginia and Virginia; and that, as has been decided by the Supreme Court of Virginia in more than one case, and has been held by this court, both States, and the people of both States, were bound for the payment of those obligations.

Higginbotham v. The Commonwealth, 25 Gratt., 627;
Greenhow v. Vashon, 81 Va., 336;
Hartman v. Greenhow, 136 U. S., 672.

Independently of any convention between the two States, according to recognized authorities, the debt should have been ratably apportioned between the two States.

The entire debt of the Commonwealth was created in carrying out what was known as her "Internal Improvement Policy."

The history of that policy of Virginia, from its inception nearly a century ago until 1861 when it was rudely interrupted by war and revolution, will show that the enormous debt incurred by Virginia in carrying it out, was incurred mainly upon the expectation of the return which would reasonably come to the State and her people from the prospective enhancement of the values of real estate which would follow the development of the regions which those works of internal improvement, built in whole or in part by the money represented by the State debt, would create and stimulate.

That these expectations have been largely realized, though not always precisely, perhaps, in the way anticipated, is impressively shown by the remarkable increase of the assessed values of the real and personal property in the two States, and particularly in West Virginia, down to 1908, the latest year for which those facts are established in the cause.

As will be seen from Plaintiff's Exhibit E-3, R. 651, which is made up from the official records of the two States, the aggregate of the assessed values of the real estate, personal, and railroad property in West Virginia were

For 1867 (the first year for which the official figures could be obtained).....$126,060,743.00
For 1908 ..... 937,232,718.54

An increase of $811,171,975.54,
Or 643 per cent!!!

The assessed values of taxable property in Virginia for the same period advanced from.....$354,848,482.69, in 1867,
To ..... 661,796,631.00, in 1908,

An increase of.....$306,948,148.31,
Or about 84 per cent.

While this enormous difference in the increment of the assessed values of taxable property may doubtless be, in part, accounted for by the different standards of valuation adopted in the two States, by no means all of it is ascribable to that circumstance; and the facts and figures shown by the exhibit just referred to have an influential bearing upon the essential equity of the plaintiff's claim that to determine fairly the portion of the burden of the common debt which, as a matter of justice, should be borne by West Virginia, account should be taken of the great enhancement of values which have come to the territory which the internal improvements referred to were designed to develope and have in large measure created. The debt was contracted far more in reliance upon future and prospective values, than upon the values existing at the date of its creation.

There were certain enactments and certain conventional agreements of the restored government of Virginia, at Wheeling, and the new State of West Virginia, which have to be considered in determining what the respective rights and liabilities of the parties are in the premises.

The first of these, was the so-called "Wheeling Ordinance," an ordinance adopted on the 20th day of August, 1861, by what purported to be a convention of the people of Virginia, "to provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State."—(Appendix to the Record, pp. 119 to 122, inclusive).

The ninth section of that ordinance dealt with the debt and provided—

> "9. The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government, since any part of said debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the monies paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period."

That ordinance purported to be an enactment of Virginia alone. It prescribed, upon its face, an arbitrary and what would seem to be an inequitable basis of settlement.

In so far as it provided for the assumption by the new State of a "just proportion" of the debt of the Commonwealth, its language was free from objection. But when it came to indicate the manner in which that proportion should be ascertained, its terms were not only artificial, but on their face, inequitable.

And yet the dominant purpose of the enactment, expressed in the clearest terms, was to require the new State to assume a "just proportion" of the public debt of the Commonwealth prior to the first of January, 1861. Upon elementary principles of construction this will be taken, certainly by a court of equity, to be its controlling purpose; and that intendment will not be suffered to be defeated by such a construction of the language of the ordinance as will lead to a result inconsistent with it, when that language can be sensibly, reasonably, and fairly construed and applied so as to operate in harmony with that expressed paramount purpose.

Fortunately, in the interest of justice, that was not the only enactment upon the subject.

There was a later, a more significant, and a more effective enactment by the legislature of the restored government of Virginia, accepting the provisions tendered by West Virginia, resulting in a compact between the two States, and creating a contractual relation governing both Commonwealths in reference to the settlement of their common debt.

These later enactments of the two States were—

First, that of West Virginia, embodied in the eighth section of the eighth article of the first Constitution of that State (Appendix to the Record, p. 125), which is as follows:

> "8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof, by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

And, second, the act of the legislature of the restored government of Virginia, at Wheeling, passed May 13, 1862, giving the consent of the legislature of Virginia "to the formation and erection of the State of West Virginia within the jurisdiction of this State * * * * * under the provisions set forth in the constitution for the said State of West Virginia and schedule thereto annexed."—Appendix to the Record, p. 125.

Under section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States the new State of West Virginia could not be formed without the consent of the legislature of Virginia.

That consent was given in this instance upon the terms, and in accordance with the provisions, set forth in the constitution adopted for the government of the new State, among the more important of which were the provisions and stipulations set forth in section 8 of Article VIII of that instrument, which required that the new State should assume "an equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one"; and that "the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and to redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

This proposal of the new Commonwealth, thus clearly expressed in its constitution, submitted to the legislature of Virginia and accepted by that legislature as one of the terms and conditions upon which it gave its consent to the partition of her territory and the erection of a new State out of that territory, and sanctioned by Congress, created a contractual relation between the old State and the new—a compact between them, which absolutely determined their rights, and which, whenever the provisions of the antecedent Wheeling ordinance shall come in conflict with the terms of such compact, shall prevail over the terms of that ordinance.

Now the insistence of Virginia has been, and is, that West Virginia should be charged with an equitable proportion of the debt, to be ascertained under the Wheeling Ordinance construed so as not to defeat the expressed controlling purpose of its enactment, and qualified and ruled by the provisions of Article VIII of the West Virginia Constitution, upon which the consent of the Legislature of Virginia and of the Congress of the United States to the formation of the new State, was predicated.

Agreeably to the decision of this court in its opinion, delivered by the late Chief Justice (R. 136), the view of Virginia is, and has been, that the Ordinance and the provisions of the West Virginia

Constitution should be read as being in pari materia; but that the constitutional provision, being the latest, must prevail, if, and whenever there is any conflict between them.

As a logical and inevitable consequence from this, the claim of Virginia was, and is, that, if the language of the Wheeling Ordinance is fairly and reasonably susceptible of such a construction as will, when fairly applied to the facts of the case, lead to an equitable result, and place upon West Virginia an equitable proportion of the debt, such construction should be given to that Ordinance; and that, if the language of the Ordinance is not reasonably and fairly susceptible of such a construction, then the Ordinance must be discarded, and the mandate of the West Virginia Constitution followed. And that, in any event, the provisions of that Constitution will govern in placing a contractual obligation upon West Virginia to pay an equitable portion of the common debt of the undivided State, and to pay interest upon the same from the date when that express contractual obligation accrued, until it shall have been discharged.

But the claim of Virginia was, and is, farther, that the provisions of the Wheeling Ordinance—fairly, justly and sensibly construed, and applied, according to its manifest purpose—places upon West Virginia a just and equitable proportion of the debt; and that West Virginia cannot be heard to repudiate this result of her own express covenant and promise.

On the other hand, West Virginia has insisted, and still contends, that there is no obligation upon that State to pay any part of the Virginia debt; but that, if there is any liability whatever upon West Virginia, it is a liability for a settlement and accounting which must be made under a construction of the language of the Ordinance, which would absolutely defeat its declared purpose, and, instead of placing a just proportion, or any proportion, of the debt upon West Virginia, would actually, as was contended for West Virginia, bring Virginia in debt to West Virginia.

With the issues thus made up, this court, in order to place in its possession the data necessary to enable it to intelligently and fairly decide the case, referred the cause to Special Master Charles

E. Littlefield, by its decree of reference, entered on the 4th of May, 1908, and directed the Master to take and report to the court seven separate accounts set forth in seven paragraphs of the decree.—R. 173, 174, 175 and 207.

After considering a great mass of testimony, statements, and accounts prepared by the accomplished expert accountants employed by the parties, respectively, and the elaborate arguments of counsel, and after a laborious and painstaking investigation and consideration of the case, the Master, on the 17th of March last, filed his report, in which he returns his findings upon each of the seven inquiries submitted to him, and with great fairness and great ability presents the grounds upon which those findings are based.

The cause is now submitted for final adjudication.

It comes before the court upon the pleadings and papers formerly considered by the court, upon the decisions and decrees heretofore rendered in the cause, and upon the Master's report, together with the evidence returned therewith and referred to therein, and upon the exceptions filed by the parties to that report.

Your Honors must have been already impressed with the fact that it is a cause of as much complexity as any which has ever come before you for decision, and with the novelty and difficulty of some of the problems which it presents.

Much of what appears at the threshold to be complex will disappear upon a careful examination of the bill and answer, the 9th section of the Wheeling Ordinance, the 8th section of Article VIII of West Virginia's Constitution of 1862-3, the decisions and decrees heretofore rendered in the cause, and the tabulated statements or accounts, the figures in which have, in almost every instance, been assented to by both parties.

Still a painstaking consideration of the Master's report, and of the exhibits and evidence referred to therein and in the arguments of counsel, will be necessary to any fair understanding of the issues in the cause, and to their decision according to the very right of the case.

We have, therefore, to crave the patient and indulgent attention of the court to a somewhat detailed and tedious discussion of the facts, figures, and principles upon which a righteous decision of the cause depends.

The chief points of difference are sharply presented by such of the exceptions to the Master's report as are specifically relied upon by the parties respectively, and by the "Joint Exhibits" or accounts which exhibit their opposing claims in contrast.

Upon the great majority of these the Master's findings are, and are shown by him to be, so plainly right that further discussion of them is rendered needless.

After full consideration, however, the counsel for Virginia deem it to be their duty, upon the case as it is presented, to earnestly urge objections to a few of the Master's conclusions, in reaching which we are persuaded that he is in manifest error. But it is our purpose to urge no objection to his report which rests upon a proposition which can be fairly regarded as debatable.

I.

The first paragraph of the decree directed the Master to ascertain and report to the court:

> "1. The amount of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia on the first day of January, 1861, stating specifically how and in what form the same was evidenced, by what authority of law and for what purposes the same was created, and the dates and nature of the bonds or other evidence of said indebtedness."

In the view which we take of this branch of the case and for the principal purposes of our argument it will be only necessary to consider the amount of the public debt of the Commonwealth outstanding on the 31st of December, 1860, in the hands of the general public.

Fortunately there is no controversy as to the amount of that indebtedness then so outstanding.

As ascertained by the Master, the amount of that indebtedness is, as fixed by the records of the Commonwealth, as follows:

Aggregate amount of old Virginia debt in the hands of the general public January 1, 1861:

Amount bearing 6 per cent. interest	$30,842,659.43
Amount bearing 5 per cent. interest	2,077,204.50
Interest on 6 per cent. outstanding debt from July 1st to Dec. 31st, 1860	925,279.78
Interest on 5 per cent. outstanding debt from July 1st to Dec. 31st, 1860	51,930.11
Total outstanding indebtedness	$33,897,073.82

See "Plaintiff's and Defendant's Joint Exhibit A-1," R. 215, and Master's Report, pp. 1, 2 and 29.

The authority of law by which, the purposes for which, that indebtedness was contracted, and the dates and nature of the bonds or evidences thereof, are shown by the references and entries upon "Plaintiff's and Defendant's Joint Exhibit A-1;" by the copies of the bonds and certificates of indebtedness issued for much the greater part thereof—"Plaintiff's Exhibit A-2," R. 219 to 285; by the abstract of the statutes in reference to the State debt and the appropriation of the avails thereof to works of internal improvement—"Plaintiff's General Exhibit I," R. 900 to 988; and by other evidence in the case; none of which are any longer matters of controversy.

The only controverted questions which have arisen under this branch of the case have been in respect to the inclusion or exclusion of the sinking fund and the literary fund from the statement of the debt.

As to the sinking fund, frankness compels us to say that we are convinced that the finding of the Master in reference thereto is right.

As to the literary fund, we are content to rely upon the complainant's first exception to the Master's report.

II.

The second paragraph of the decree required the ascertainment of—

> "2. The extent and assessed valuation of the territory of Virginia and of West Virginia June 20, 1863, and the population thereof, with and without slaves, separately."

The figures as to the area and assessed valuation of the real estate embraced in the territory of the two States, respectively, and as to the population thereof, with and without slaves, having been taken from authentic public records of the United States and of Virginia, incorporated in "Plaintiff's and Defendant's Joint Exhibit B-1," the agreed statement prepared by the expert accountants of the parties,—those figures have been adopted by the Master and made the basis of his findings under this paragraph of the decree.

We are unable to conjecture how these figures, thus authoritatively established and adopted, or the results deducible therefrom, can now be brought in question. R. 366, 367.

The figures furnished for West Virginia in "Supplemental Exhibit 7," and now relied upon by that State would be more advantageous to Virginia than those adopted by the Master, for the reason that the assessed valuation of the real estate embraced in the State of West Virginia, as given by that exhibit, is larger and the assessed valuation of the territory of Virginia is less than that adopted by the Master, taken from the assessments of Virginia. The figures submitted by West Virginia would make her share of the debt, on the basis of assessed valuation of real estate in the two States, $154,166.09 more than she would owe under the master's findings. But we are content to accept the values adopted by the Master, because we are satisfied that they are correct.

The Master's findings under this head are as follows:

The Extent and Assessed Valuation of the Territory of Virginia and of West Virginia June 20th, 1863, and the Population Thereof, with and without Slaves, Separately.

III.

The third account directed by the decree is one ascertaining—

> "3. All expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of the debt was contracted."

This is one of the accounts which is called for under section 9 of the Wheeling Ordinance, which requires that in order to ascertain the proportion of the debt which the new State shall take upon itself, that State shall be charged with "all State expenditures within the limits thereof * * * * * since any part of said debt was contracted."

The divergent contentions of the parties are shown by the tabulated statements embodied in "Plaintiff's and Defendant's Joint Exhibit C-1," pp. 1 to 6, R. 371-377.

The total of said State expenditures in the territory constituting West Virginia, as shown by plaintiff's statements of this account (R. 371) was	$5,639,302.66
As shown by defendants' statements	1,251,288.92
Difference in the two results is	$4,388,013.74

In considering the questions which are presented by the controverted items in the schedules filed under this paragraph, it is important always to bear in mind the precise language of the decree, which, following the terms of the Wheeling Ordinance, directs the ascertainment of:

> "ALL expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia, since any part of the debt was contracted."

It is manifest that that language in explicit and comprehensive terms, embraces, without exception or qualification, all expenditures of whatever character or description, and on whatever account, or for whatever purpose, or in whatever manner made, which were made by the Commonwealth of Virginia in any part of the territory now constituting West Virginia, after March 19, 1823, the agreed time at which any part of the debt in question was contracted.

The only questions to be considered, therefore, in determining whether any particular expenditure made during that period should be charged against West Virginia, are: First. Was it made by the Commonwealth? and, Second, Was the money expended in West Virginia?

Now, governed by these plain requirements of the decree, the accountants engaged on behalf of Virginia have embraced in this account all such items of expenditure, and only such items of expenditure, as were made by the Commonwealth within the territory of the new State during the period stated.

To a number of these items of charge counsel for West Virginia make objection, not on the ground that the expenditures they challenge were not made, or were not made in West Virginia territory, but in some instances because of the manner in which the expenditures were made; in others because of the character of the particular expenditure, or the purpose for which it was made; and in other cases, as for instance the expenditures made in West Virginia on the Covington & Ohio Railroad, and upon the Berryville and Charlestown Turnpike, upon the ground that Virginia has, since these several expenditures were made, in some way, by acts or transactions in reference to these subjects, lost her right to embrace those items of expenditure in this account.

As appears from Joint Exhibit "C-1," R. 371, the charges upon this account allowed by the accountants for plaintiff, and excepted to by the defendant, are classified as follows:

Items of Plaintiff's Charges Excepted to by West Virginia:

Expenditures in W. Va. upon railroads	$1,316,992.42
Expenditures in W. Va. upon turnpikes	430,252.89
Miscellaneous expenditures in W. Va	1,154,000.10
*Expenditures in bridges, river improvements, banks owned by joint stock companies, and loan to Town of Bath	1,486,768.33
	$4,388,013.74

We will consider these in the order in which they are stated in Exhibit "C-1," and are considered by the Master.

1. The expenditures upon railroads which West Virginia questions, are—

Expenditures on the Covington & Ohio R. R.	$1,146,460.42
Expenditures on the Winchester & Pot. R. R.	170,532.00
	$1,316,992.42

(1) The expenditures upon the Covington & Ohio R. R. This item of $1,146,460.42, is allowed by the master.

The Master very clearly shows the propriety of this item of charge, and little if anything need be said in support of his conclusion.

There is no question that those expenditures were made by the Commonwealth "since any part of the debt was created;" nor that they were made "within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia."

But opposing counsel claim that in some way Virginia has lost her right to have those expenditures charged against West Virginia by reason of the public acts and transactions of Virginia and West Virginia in reference to this railroad. This ob-

NOTE:—The charge under this paragraph for amounts invested in Bank Stocks is withdrawn, as those stocks should be accounted for under Paragraph VII. and have been allowed by the Master under that Paragraph.

jection has been stated so vaguely that we are at a loss to know upon what ground it is based.

The Covington & Ohio Railroad was owned and built by the Commonwealth under the Acts of February 15, 1853; March 13, 1856; March 20, 1858, and February 29, 1860. (Appendix 33, 34.) The work was unfinished at the time of the formation of the State of West Virginia, though over $2,787,000.00 had been then spent upon it.

How West Virginia should account for that property and the expenditures which it represented, was distinctly prescribed by section 9 of the Wheeling Ordinance (App. 119, 122), and was prescribed nowhere else.

After June 20, 1863, West Virginia owned the portion of the Covington & Ohio Railroad in that State as completely as Virginia owned the portion of that road within her limits.

As is shown by the subsequent legislation of the two States, both States were very anxious to secure the completion of that railroad from its intersection with what was then known as the Virginia Central Railroad at Covington, Virginia, to a point on the Ohio river, thus giving a through railroad connection from Richmond, Virginia, through the entire State of West Virginia to the Ohio river, at the mouth of the Big Sandy, or at the mouth of the Great Kanawha, with the right to build to both points.

Both States were, as is shown by that legislation, willing to give to the company which should complete that through line of railway, the right of way and property of each State, respectively, in the parts of the unfinished road located in each State, and the benefit of the large expenditures made in its partial construction. Virginia, though very little of the proposed new railway would be within her limits, made still more liberal concessions to the builders of the through road, in reference to the sale to the new company of the Blue Ridge Railroad wholly within Virginia, and to the sale of the stock of Virginia in the Central R. R. Co., and to the settlement of the indebtedness of the Central R. R. Co. to Virginia.

To effectuate the purposes of the two States, concurrent Acts were enacted by their respective Legislatures for the incorporation of the Covington & Ohio Railroad Company, passed by Virginia February 26, 1866, (Appendix 35), and by West Virginia March 1, 1866, (Appendix 37), and to authorize the consolidation of the Covington & Ohio Railroad Company with the Virginia Central Railroad Company and other companies, and the formation of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company for the purpose of completing "a continuous line or lines of railroad from the waters of the Chesapeake to the Ohio river," passed by West Virginia February 26, 1867, (Appendix 40), and by Virginia March 1, 1867, (Appendix 43.)* See also section 9 of Act of Virginia Feb. 26, 1866 (App. 36), and section 9 of Act of West Virginia March 1, 1866 (App. 39.)

It will be seen that the interests which West Virginia had in the building of the proposed railroad were far greater and more vital than those of Virginia.

West Virginia at that time had no railroad within her limits, except the Pennsylvania across the Pan Handle, and the Baltimore & Ohio through the northern portion of that State.

The New river and Kanawha valleys, and the entire southern portion of West Virginia, were without a mile of railroad, and large parts of those sections were inaccessible to the outside world by any practicable line of communication.

The enterprising young State accordingly freely donated all the property rights which she had in the Covington & Ohio Railroad, situated within her limits, to the builders of that railroad, just as the older State, in larger degree, contributed even more generously to the same important object.

The legislation of the two States upon this subject, printed in the Appendix, pp. 35 to 49, will be read in vain to discover any provision which can be so wrested as to be construed to refer in any way to the liability of West Virginia to pay some part of the

*By Act of January 26, 1870, the Legislature of West Virginia amended the charter of the Chesapeake and Ohio R. R. Co., and confirmed the contract made by the commissioners on behalf of the two States with the Virginia Central R. R. Co., under authority already granted by Virginia, by the Act of February 26, 1866 (Appendix p. 35-36) and by West Virginia by Act of March 1, 1866 (App. 37-39 and 46.)

Virginia debt, or to release that State from any part of that liability.

Those concurrent enactments can be construed to do only what they did do, that is, to give the consent of the two States to the establishment of, and by their respective grants to secure, a through line of railway from the waters of the Chesapeake to the banks of the Ohio, and to grant the property rights of each State in and to the portion of the respective railroads situated in each State, to the consolidated company, for that purpose.

The Wheeling Ordinance prescribed the basis on which the proportion of the Virginia debt to be assumed by West Virginia was to be ascertained, and vested in the new State the ownership of the portion of the Covington & Ohio Railroad located in West Virginia, and there is not a line or a syllable of those concurrent Acts of the two States in reference to the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, which can be construed to repeal or to modify the provisions of that Ordinance.

It would require a far-off and capricious flight of the imagination to construe the language of those concurrent Acts so as to make them operate to prevent Virginia, when she comes to have a settlement with West Virginia as to the part of the common debt which West Virginia should pay, from insisting that West Virginia should, according to her own agreement, be charged in making up that account with the amount expended upon the Covington & Ohio Railroad within the limits of the new State, if the Wheeling Ordinance is to control to any extent in that accounting.

There is nothing in any of those concurrent Acts of the two States to suggest that either State was conceding anything to the other. Both were conceding a great deal to the Covington & Ohio and to the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Companies, and for obvious reasons.

The account of this matter, as claimed by the plaintiff and found by the Master, is distinctly responsive to the decree.

That claimed by the defendant would not satisfy the decree, and cannot be set up without going counter to both the decree and the Ordinance.

(2) The expenditures upon the Winchester & Potomac Railroad in West Virginia.....$170,532.00.

The Master rejected this item of charge—15/27th of it because it was a loan by Virginia to the railroad company, and 12/27ths of it because it was, in his view, an investment made by the State in the shares of the capital stock of this Company.—Master's Rep. 47; Joint Exhibit C-1, p. 2; R. 373.

We cannot be unmindful of the fact that there are circumstances connected with Virginia's dealings with the Winchester & Potomac Railroad Company, which sharply differentiate any charge on account of her expenditures in West Virginia upon that railroad from the other expenditures made by the Commonwealth in building works in West Virginia territory, which were built through internal improvement companies.

We are constrained to admit that the circumstance that Virginia commuted all of her claim against, and interest in, that company under the Act of February 24, 1846 (App. 30, 31), gives West Virginia a strong equity to have that charge eliminated from the account, even though it be true that the transaction was not consummated and Virginia was not paid the commuted price, until after the formation of the new State.

We, therefore, beg leave to withdraw our objection to the disallowance by the Master of this item of Virginia's claim.

We do not, however, at all assent to the reasons upon which, in part, the Master bases his rejection of so much of this item as was represented by the shares of stock which Virginia received therefor.

We will consider those grounds under the next head, when we come to discuss the question presented distinctly, as it is there, free from other complications, in connection with the large expenditures made by the Commonwealth through internal improvement companies, in building roads, turnpikes and bridges, etc., upon West Virginia soil.

(3) Expenditures made by Virginia in West Virginia territory in the construction of works of internal improvement located in West Virginia but built through the agency of joint stock companies.

Passing over a number of items under this paragraph of the decree, as to which the findings of the Master, in so far as they are in favor of the contention of the plaintiff, afford no just ground of objection to the defendant, for the reasons clearly shown by the Master, the only items of charge against West Virginia under that paragraph of the decree, to the disallowance of which we deem it our duty to object, are the items specifically stated in complainant's second exception, as follows:

(1) For Bridges: Expenditures made by Virginia upon bridges in West Virginia territory, built by joint stock companies, owned partly by the Commonwealth—Items 57 to 65, inclusive, of Joint Exhibit C-1, p. 4; R. 375; Special Master's Report, p. 85—aggregating ..... $ 78,412.50

(2) Expenditures made by Virginia in the improvement of the navigation of West Virginia rivers by joint stock companies—Items 66 to 69, inclusive, of Joint Exhibit, C-1, p. 4; R. 375; Special Master's Report, p. 85—aggregating ..... $ 210,500.00

(3) Expenditures made by Virginia upon turnpikes wholly in West Virginia territory, built by joint stock companies:

(a) On Charlestown & Berryville turnpike, in West Virginia—Item No. 6 of Joint Exhibit, C-1, p. 2; R. 373; Special Master's Report, pp. 64, 84 ..... $ 11,932.52

(b) On turnpikes and roads mentioned in Items 70 to 147, inclusive, of Joint Exhibit,

C-1, pp. 4, 5 and 6; R. 375, 376 and 377; Special Master's Report, pp. 78, 79 and 85....	803,555.83
Total expenditures made by Virginia, through joint stock companies, on turnpikes and roads in West Virginia territory.....	$815,488.35	815,488.35
Total aggregate of items, the disallowance of which is here excepted to		$1,104,400.85

This exception raises one of the most important questions in the case under the Wheeling Ordinance and the provisions of the first Constitution of West Virginia as it involves $1,104,400.85, principal sum, of the amount of the debt to be assigned to West Virginia.

With the utmost deference for the ability, learning, and fairness of the Master, we are convinced that he erred in his rejection of these items of the account against West Virginia.

We believe that there is no question as to the propriety of their being charged against West Virginia under Paragraph III of the Decree and under the language of the Wheeling Ordinance. If we fail to demonstrate this, it will be because of our inability to fairly present to the minds of the court the facts and considerations which should control in the decision of the question.

The principal grounds upon which this objection to the Master's finding is based are concisely stated in the formal exception taken thereto.—See Complainant's Exceptions, pp. 4 and 5.

The material facts as to all of these expenditures are, for the purpose of this inquiry, substantially the same, and the same principles should control in determining the proper disposition to be made of these items, in the accounting.

The money appropriated by the Commonwealth in each instance was unquestionably expended in West Virginia territory; for all of these improvements were physically located in West Virginia counties.

The chief ground relied on for excluding these item the debit account against West Virginia is, because of the in which the expenditures were made; that is, because the cers or immediate employees, but were made by the Stat rectly through the medium of joint stock companies; th such works of internal improvement as were only partly ow the State.

The works and highways upon which these expenditur made in every instance had their situs in West Virginia, State money appropriated to them was expended in West V

The chief difference between these expenditures an made directly by the State through its own officers and em which are conceded by the defendant to be proper charges this head, was, that in the one case the State received a certif stock in a joint stock company (which stock usually proved less), as the representative of the expenditure, while in th case the State would receive merely a receipt or voucher fr officers as an evidence of the outlay.

In either case the Commonwealth, and West Virginia successor, received the benefit of the bridge, improvement o gation, or turnpike on which the State money had been exp and it is manifest from the history of these public works t benefits which it was hoped that the public would derive fro construction generally constituted the chief inducement a sideration both to the public and to private investors.

There can be no question that any expenditure made b ginia, by her several and independent acts, upon any work ternal improvement, or other object, in West Virginia, dur defined period, is a proper and necessary charge against We ginia under the terms of the 3rd paragraph of the decree, a der the Wheeling Ordinance.

This is conceded by the counsel for West Virginia.

Now, it is equally clear that any such expenditure made by Virginia in association, or in partnership, with other corporations or individuals, would be also a proper and necessary charge against West Virginia under the decree and Ordinance.

Here, in a number of cases, Virginia, instead of going into an ordinary partnership with her associates in the various enterprises in question, chose to form a limited liability company to do the same thing which could have been effected by an ordinary partnership: for a joint stock company is, in law, and in fact, nothing more than a limited liability company.

In the country from which we so largely derive our institutions and our laws, they are termed "limited liability companies."

How can it be even plausibly contended that, because Virginia, for obvious considerations of convenience and public interest, chose to expend her input in these public improvements and other enterprises in West Virginia territory, through the medium or agency of a limited liability company, such expenditure is any less an expenditure by the State than it would have been had it been made through an unlimited liability partnership?

There is no qualification of the expenditures which are to be charged, such as counsel for West Virginia have had to attempt to make, either in the decree or in the Ordinance. The words "direct" and "indirect" are not found in either decree or Ordinance. No such classification is justified by the language of either the decree or the Ordinance.

Opposing counsel are forced by the stress of their case to interpolate the word "direct" both in the decree, and in the Ordinance, an interpolation which, while deemed necessary for the purposes of their argument, is absolutely unwarranted by the decree or by the Ordinance.

But even if that word were in the decree and Ordinance, it would not justify their contention; for an expenditure such as the State made in the improvement of Coal river, or upon the Huntersville and Parkersburg Road, or upon any one of the turnpikes and roads built partly by State aid, was a direct expenditure by the State, though paid, for the purpose of building the road or other internal improvement, to the treasurer of a corporation having its domicile and situs in West Virginia territory.

It is a conclusive answer to all of these objections to these items of expenditure that the account directed by paragraph 3 of the decree is not limited to such expenditures as were made directly by the State; nor to expenditures made upon bridges, locks, dams, and sluices, and upon turnpikes wholly owned by the State; nor to expenditures for which the State received no return, nominal or otherwise, in the shape of shares of stock. That account is required by the decree to include "all expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of the debt was contracted."

The question considered by the Master, and which he has decided in the negative, is, as stated by him:

"Whether the subscribing and paying for stock in an internal improvement company, whose improvements were located within the limits of West Virginia, was 'an expenditure made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia' etc."? (See Master's Report, p. 47.)

With the utmost deference, that is not an accurate statement of the question presented here.

The exact question is:

Whether the expenditures made by Virginia in works of internal improvement physically located in West Virginia lost their character as State expenditures in that territory, because those works were built by joint stock companies formed by Virginia and individuals and corporations for the purpose of building those very turnpikes, roads, bridges, &c., and the Commonwealth received stock of such companies for the money so expended by her through them upon said works?

The history of the internal improvement system, and of the legislation of Virginia in regard thereto, as shown by the records and statutes of the Commonwealth, significant portions of which are referred to by the Master in his discussion of this subject at pages 47 to 55 of his report, will show, beyond controversy, that the paramount and controlling motive of the Commonwealth in all these expenditures of money upon works of internal improvement was, not any direct or pecuniary return for the money expended in the shape of dividends or interest thereon, but was the advancement of the local and general interests of the people by the development of the resources of the Commonwealth, and of the facilities and lines of communication between the different sections of the State and the markets of the country.

It was the "public utility" which would be served by the construction of these works of internal improvement which the General Assembly had in mind, and not the return which might be expected in the shape of dividends upon the stock which was issued for these investments.

This will be apparent from reading the extracts from the public records of the Commonwealth, which show the purpose, policy, and motive of Virginia in expending her money on works of internal improvement, built by internal improvement companies, printed with this Note of Argument as Appendix II.

Noticing further one of the grounds chiefly relied upon for the exclusion of these items of expenditure, namely, that the expenditures were "investments" made by the State with a view to realizing some profit from them, we would say: That, while it was true that the hope of ultimate financial gain, or of some profitable return from the investment, was in some instances at least one of the inducements which led Virginia to make those expenditures in works built through the agency of joint stock companies, that was in no instance the dominant or controlling motive.

But, if the hope of ultimate financial gain constitutes any reason for excluding these public expenditures from the debit account against West Virginia, then there are few, if any, of the expenditures, which were made by Virginia in West Virginia counties which would not, by the same token, be excluded upon the same ground.

There were, and in the nature of things there would necessarily be, very few, if any, expenditures made by the State of the character indicated, which were not, or would not be, made in whole or in part in the hope that they would not prove absolutely unprofitable.

The fact is that nearly the whole of the expenditures admitted by West Virginia to have been properly chargeable under this item, amounting to $1,251,288.92, were expenditures made in part with a view to the direct profits which it was hoped would be realized by the State from them in the shape of tolls or other income from the works thus constructed, as well as the anticipated indirect profits from the development of the territory which those works of internal improvement would serve.

For example, of the expenditures made by Virginia on turnpikes and roads in West Virginia, which are admitted by the defendant, there were expended—

On the Northwestern turnpike	$469,148.53,
And on the Staunton & Parkersburg turnpike	264,043.07,
Or	$733,191.60, of the total admitted items of $859,050.92.—See Plaintiff's and Defendant's "Joint Exhibit C-1, p. 2," R. 373.

Now it will be found that Virginia actually derived in tolls from these two investments the following sums:

From the Northwestern turnpike	$126,339.89
From the Staunton & Parkersburg turnpike	17,080.71
Or a total of	$143,420.60

See Plaintiff's and Defendant's Joint Exhibit F-1, R. 805.

So we see that, of the two grounds of objection to the allowance of these charges against West Virginia:

(1) that the expenditure may be regarded as an investment made by the State, or,

(2) that anticipated profits or income may have been a motive for the expenditure, neither constitutes any just criterion or ground for either the allowance or rejection of such expenditures.

The fact is, undoubtedly, that every dollar expended by Virginia in works of internal improvement was an "investment."

Another pregnant fact is also unquestionably established by the record in this case, that by far the greater part of the money thus expended was expended in the hope of some direct return from the investment; and that every dollar that was expended was expended with the expectation of some indirect, ulterior, or ultimate return through the improvement and development of the territory in which the several works of internal improvement were constructed.

It is also true beyond a doubt that nearly all of these investments made by the Commonwealth in West Virginia territory, whether made in works wholly owned by the State, or made in works owned by the State in conjunction with other stockholders, proved, so far as dividends or direct earnings were concerned absolutely unprofitable and unremunerative; and that some of the investments made by the State in works wholly owned by the State proved more remunerative than the expenditures made through the agency of joint stock companies in the construction of similar works of internal improement.*

It is a significant fact that the view which is here urged as to the expenditures of the Commonwealth in works of internal improvement constructed in West Virginia territory and as to the classification of such of those expenditures as were made through the media, or agency, of joint stock companies is the view heretofore consistently taken by the representatives of West Virginia most familiar with the subject.

The eminent citizens of that State who constituted the Debt Commission appointed by the Governor of West Virginia pursuant to the resolutions adopted by the Legislature of that State

NOTE:—It is an important circumstance in this connection that every expenditure made by the State on internal improvements whether built by the State or by joint stock companies, was, by the terms of the Act of February 5, 1816, and he Acts amendatory thereof, made exclusively for the purpose of building such works. Any earning or profit received from any such investment went into the Internal Improvement Fund, to be there used for building other internal improvements. So that the only hope of gain or profit, which actuated Virginia in making all of these expenditures or investmens, was to provide money to build roads, bridges, turnpikes and railroads to which every dollar thus received was dedicated.

See Appendix II, to this note of argument.

February 15th and 20th, 1871, in the elaborate report made by them on the 7th of August, 1871, reviewing the entire subject of West Virginia's liability for a portion of the Virginia debt, found that the expenditures made by Virginia in the construction of turnpikes and bridges, and in the improvement of rivers, built or improved by joint stock companies, were properly chargeable against West Virginia under the Wheeling Ordinance in like manner as were expenditures on roads constructed wholly on the State account.

Accordingly we find that in their report they charge West Virginia with $3,343,929.29 "for amounts expended and invested in her territory," the items of which they state in detail in Statement "F," exhibited as part of their report, which sum and the items of which it consists include large amounts expended in West Virginia through the medium of joint stock companies, as will be seen by an examination of that exhibit.—See Report of West Virginia's Debt Commission, West Virginia's Compilation of the record of Virginia v. West Virginia, Vol. 1, pages 471, 472, and Statement "F," 479 to 486, filed by the defendant in the clerk's office of this court.

The gentlemen composing that Commission were J. J. Jackson, J. M. Bennett, and A. W. Campbell. Mr. Bennett had been the first auditor of Virginia from 1857 to 1865. Messrs. Campbell and Jackson were active participants in the movement for the formation of the new State of West Virginia. Gen. Jackson was a member of the Wheeling Convention, and Mr. Campbell was one of the leaders throughout the movement for the establishment of the new State. They were doubtless familiar with the inside as well as with the outside of that transaction, and with the true intent and meaning of the Wheeling Ordinance.

There are some very large errors of omission in Statement "F," and patent errors on the face of their report; but still it serves a valuable purpose in showing what was the construction placed upon the Wheeling Ordinance in this regard by these very intelligent representatives of West Virginia in the very earliest stage of this controversy,—at a time when most of the framers of that Ordinance were still alive.

Two years later, in December, 1873, a Committee of the Senate of West Virginia, of which Mr. J. M. Bennett was the chairman, came to again review the question of West Virginia's liability for the debt of Virginia.

In a carefully considered report, dated December 22, 1873, that committee unanimously adopted the figures above given as to the amount expended by Virginia in West Virginia territory and which they conceded to have been "contributed to the development of the territory of West Virginia."

This last mentioned report is printed as Exhibit No. 3 with the Answer of the Defendant, R. 166, 167, 168, 169.

When, years afterwards, West Virginia was urging the payment of her claim against the United States for the refunding of the direct tax, which was being withheld because the United States held certain bonds of the old State for the payment of which it was claimed that West Virginia was liable, Messrs. Alfred Caldwell, formerly attorney general, and E. W. Wilson, former Governor of West Virginia, in their brief filed before the attorney general of the United States again adopted the construction of the Wheeling Ordinance previously approved by the West Virginia Debt Commission, and by the Finance Committee of the Senate of West Virginia.——See quotation from brief of Messrs. Caldwell and Wilson, printed as Appendix No. III to this Note of Argument.

This construction of the Wheeling Ordinance in respect to the expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia through the agency of joint stock companies in the territory of West Virginia adopted by the representatives, public officials and eminent citizens of West Virginia most familiar with the subject remained unchallenged for more than a generation, until after this suit was instituted, when a new and strange light seems to have dawned upon the representatives of that resourceful State, and for the first time in all the long agitation and discussion of this subject a new, and we respectfully submit, a forced and unnatural, construction is attempted to be placed upon the Wheeling Ordinance, so as to limit the amount for which West Virginia is to be charged on account of expenditures made by Virginia in West Virginia territory, so that the account shall not embrace "ALL EXPENDITURES," but so that it shall include only a portion, and much the smaller portion, of those expenditures.

The decree requires the Master to report ALL expenditures—but the Master distinguishes between expenditures, classifying them as "direct" and "indirect," and construes the decree and the Wheeling Ordinance as referring to expenditures made by the State through its officials, which he classifies as "direct" expenditures and as excluding expenditures made by the State through the agency of joint stock companies, which he classifies as "indirect" expenditures; and he states the following reasons for his finding:

> "To hold these subscriptions thus made for investment to be expenditures by the State 'within the territory' it would be necessary to read into the decree the words 'either directly or indirectly' which I do not feel at liberty to do." Master's R. 62.

The language of the decree and of the Ordinance is explicit, and we agree that the Master was not at liberty to read anything into either; but in order to support the conclusion he has reached he has been obliged to read into the decree the word "direct," and by construction to hold that the court and the Wheeling convention when they used the word "All" meant something less than all; that they meant by "all" expenditures only such as the Master has classified as "direct."

We submit that this construction is not warranted, and that there is no authority for the Master under the language of the decree, which requires a report of ALL expenditures, to classify expenditures as "direct" and "indirect" and allow only such as he classifies as "direct." The effect of the Master's construction is to read out of the decree the word "ALL" and substitute for it the word "direct:" and then to give to that substituted word a narrow meaning not justified by the facts and circumstances of the case.

SUMMARY.

The Master has allowed under this paragraph of the decree as proper charges against West Virginia, items amounting to $2,811,559.98

To this we are convinced that there should, beyond peradventure, be added, for expenditures made by Virginia in bridges, improvement of rivers, turnpikes and roads, through the agency of joint stock companies organized by Virginia for that purpose, the items mentioned in the tabulated statement on pages 28 and 29 of this Note of Argument, aggregating..... 1,104,400.85

Giving a total of State expenditures in West Virginia—the aggregate amount chargeable against West Virginia under Paragraph III of the Decree..... $3,915,960.83

See Master's Report, pp. 47 and 83; R. 399, 401, 433, 459, 478, 488 and 512.

The findings of the Master as to the other items passed upon by him in response to the third paragraph of the decree, and not here specifically objected to by counsel for the complainant, are, we think, in the main shown to be correct upon the face of his report, and by the evidence in the cause, and are accepted on behalf of the complainant.

IV.

The fourth paragraph of the decree directs the ascertainment of—

> "4. Such proportion of the ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia since any of said debt was contracted, as was properly assignable to the counties which were created into the State of West Virginia on the basis of the average total population of Virginia, with and without slaves, as shown by the census of the United States."

The differences in the computation of the total ordinary expenses of the State government between March 19, 1823, and January 1, 1861, as stated by the Master, and as claimed by the defendant, arise entirely from the difference in the classification of the several items of State expenditures during the prescribed period.

The defendant has so classified the greater part of these expenditures as to exclude them from this account. The Master has treated most of the State expenditures during that period as being ordinary, and has included them.

This inquiry is manifestly predicated upon the language of the Wheeling Ordinance, which provides that the new State shall be charged with "a just proportion of the ordinary expense of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted."—R. 6.

The decision of the issue thus presented turns upon the meaning which those words carry in that connection; and their correct interpretation is necessary to enable us to determine the items of expenditure which go into this account.

The defendant has construed that language most narrowly, and so as to exclude many items, not only of usual and ordinary public expenditures, but also many that are appropriate and necessary for meeting important and usual, if not essential, wants of the people of the State under the conditions of civilization obtaining in this country for more than a century.

Nor are the ordinary expenses of a State government merely those which are necessary and regular in their occurrence, but quite as largely such as are usual, though not periodical, and such as are appropriate, though not essential, to the needs and aspirations of an enlightened and progressive people, and as are lawful.

In the constrained and narrow meaning ascribed to those words, and the consequent classification of State expenditures, made by the defendant, the contrast has been between some selected usual regularly recurring expenditures of what are claimed to be of a purely governmental character on the one hand, and all other expenditures of the State government, however proper, lawful, appropriate, regular, or indeed necessary in a free American State, on the other hand.

Now we respectfully submit that the contrast implied here is not between the word "ordinary" on the one hand, and the word "regular," or even the word "annual," or any combination of those words, on the other hand.

The contrast is, and was manifestly intended to be, between "ordinary" and "extraordinary,"—all ordinary expenses of the State government not already embraced in the account being intended to be included, and all extraordinary expenses to be excluded from the computation of the expenses, a just proportion of which should be charged against the new State.

Nor is the inquiry limited by its terms to such expenses as may be argued to be purely governmental,—as, for instance, the "civil list," and such as are usually incurred by a government acting in its political capacity. There is no such limitation expressed or suggested by the language of the decree or of the Ordinance.

The account is required to embrace "the ordinary expenses," and therefore all of the ordinary expenses of the State government, during the prescribed period, not embraced in the preceding account, of whatever character, must be included in it, so that it is not necessary for us to enter upon the field of conjecture and speculation, which opposing counsel would have us traverse, in order to determine what expenses were, and what expenses were not, distinctly governmental.

The fact is that under the uniform practice of enlightened States and communities such expenses as are usual, though not regularly periodical, and as are necessary, or appropriate, and are lawful—that is, within the legitimate powers of the State government—are ordinary expenses, and such as are unnecessary, or abnormal, are to be considered as extraordinary expenses of a State government.

In a modern State, and particularly in a State of the American Union, caring for, conserving and promoting the economic and material, as well as the social, sanitary, physical, intellectual and moral welfare of its people, many expenditures which may not be regarded as strictly governmental, and some which may not be absolutely necessary, are proper, lawful, usual and ordinary.

It will be found that the terms "ordinary expenses of government" have been carefully considered by learned, trained, and able experts upon the subject of State revenues, expenditures, and finance, by experienced statisticians and accountants, and by courts of high standing, and that these authorities sanction the reasonable and natural construction and application of those terms which we claim to be their true meaning and intendment.

The following are some of the precedents and authorities bearing directly upon this subject, to which we have had access. They will be found to clearly and absolutely confirm the views above expressed.

We give, first, the classification as adopted by the United States government.

The ordinary expenditures of that government are classified and stated as given below.

For this we take as an example the statements for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, from the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, as follows:

"For Civil Expenses	$ 17,627,115.09
For Foreign Intercourse	1,508,064.27
For Indians	6,692,462.09
For Pensions	29,038,414.66

For Military Establishment, including Fortifications, River and Harbor Improvements and Arsenals	42,313,927.22
For Naval Establishment, Including Vessels and Machinery, and Improvements at Navy Yards	30,932,587.42
For Miscellaneous Civil, Including Public Buildings, Light Houses, and Collecting Revenue	50,506,414.25

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of date December 7, 1874, page iv.

At page v of the same report, Hon. B. H. Bristow, the then Secretary of the Treasury, gives a similar itemized summary and classification of the ordinary expenditures of the National government for the first quarter of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875. And on page vii of same report he gives an estimate of the ordinary expenditures of the government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, amounting to $272,778,000.00, made up of the items as stated and classified in the statements of actual expenditures for the two preceding years.

In this statement there is estimated for,

Interest on the public debt	$98,000,000.00
On the Pacific Railway bonds	3,878,000.00

as part of the ordinary expenses of the government.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1904 (House Documents, 58th Congress, Vol. 31, p. 5) gives the total ordinary expenditures, exclusive of Postal Service:

	For 1903	For 1904
	at $506,099,007.04	at $582,402,321.31
including in these aggregates the following:
For Indian Service..	$ 12,935,668.08	$ 10,438,350.09
For Pensions	138,425,646.07	142,559,266.36
For interest on Public Debt	28,556,348.82	24,646,489.81

The attention of the court is called to the items which make up the above aggregate of expenses for those years which are given on pp. 3, 4 and 5 of that report, which will be found to be very interesting as showing what expenditures of the government were classified as "ordinary."

The annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for year ending June 30, 1908 gives the following statement of the ordinary expenses of the United States government:

"Disbursements:

Civil Establishments	$175,420,408.57
Military	175,840,452.99
Naval	118,037,097.15
Indian Service	14,579,755.75
Pensions	153,892,467.01
Interest on Public Debt	21,426,138.21
	$659,196,319.68
Postal Service	191,478,663.41
Total ordinary disbursements, including Postal	$850,674,983.09"

See also the classification of ordinary expenses of the National government tabulated for the ten years ending June 30, 1890, in the Eleventh Census. House Miscellaneous Documents, 1st Sess. 52d Cong., 1891-92, Vol. 50, Part II., "Wealth, Debt, and Taxation," pp. 418, 419. The more carefully these tables are examined the more confirmatory they will be found of the natural and reasonable construction of the words "ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia," adopted by the accountants for Virginia.

Examples to the same effect, as to the practice of the United States government in the classification of the expenditures which are ordinary expenses of government might be multiplied, but the above will suffice.

As to the expenses of State governments which are regarded and treated as "ordinary," we beg leave to refer to the volume of the 11th Census of the United States, just cited, where at pages 464 to 477 the annual and aggregate ordinary and other expenditures of each of the States of the American Union are stated for each year and for the decade ending with the fiscal year 1890.

It will be seen that in each instance the great mass of the expenditures of the State governments of a public character, including "charities and gratuities" (such as the maintenance of eleemosynary institutions and pensions), and including in every case "interest on State debt," are counted as ordinary expenditures of the State governments.

At pages 516 to 533 of the volume of the 11th Census just cited will be found a tabulated statement of the expenditures of 1,319 counties of the different States reporting in 1890, in which there is a compilation of such county expenses as are to be considered as "ordinary," which gives data very interesting and pertinent to our present inquiry. In every instance the "interest on county debt," as well as a number of other items of public expenditure of a more or less irregular occurrence, and not at all always politico-governmental in their character, such as expenditures coming under the heads of "Buildings, grounds, and improvements," "Roads, ditches, and bridges, charities and gratuities," and "Miscellaneous" are put in the category of ordinary expenses of government.

The same comments will be found to apply with emphasis to the returns and classification of the expenditures of cities having 50,000 or more inhabitants given at pages 556-557; and to the tables giving the same statistics as to municipalities having 4,000 or more, but less than 50,000 inhabitants, at pages 580-590 of the same volume of the 11th Census.

Strongly confirming the reasonable classification for which we contend will be also found the practice of both the States and cities of our country on this subject.

In this connection we would call attention to the Report of the "Bureau of Inspection and Supervision of Public Offices" of the State of Ohio for 1906, which gives comparative statistics of cities of Ohio. This report give us a scientific and accurate classification of all public expenditures.

At pages 72-89 is printed a detailed schedule of ordinary expenditures of the cities of that State, each of which embraces the great mass of the expenditures of those cities for any public purpose, and in every instance counts interest upon the public debt as an "ordinary" expense.

A very valuable contribution to the law and literature upon this subject is the 46th Annual Report of the Comptroller of the City of Chicago, 1902. This particular report is of all the more significance because it is approved by Messrs. Haskins & Sells, Certified Public Accountants, of 30 Broad Street, New York, who were employed by the City of Chicago to supervise the preparation of all portions of the Comptroller's Annual Report relating to the receipt, accounting for, and disbursement of moneys for the year 1902. (See their certificate at page 43.) This is all the more interesting because Mr. Thomas Bird Dixey, the accomplished chief accountant for West Virginia, testified that he was at one time the manager of Messrs. Haskins & Sells. At pages 90 to 97 of this report will be found tabulated statements giving in considerable detail the items of the ordinary expenses of the City of Chicago for the year 1902, and the extraordinary expenses of that city for the year 1902, at page 98.

It will be seen that all interest paid, whether on bonded debt or upon miscellaneous accounts, and all cost of exchanges is charged as an ordinary expense of the city, and so also a vast number of items for salaries, maintenance of charitable and other institutions, maintenance, repair, and renewal of buildings, etc., are treated as ordinary expenses.

Some items are by these skilful accountans for Chicago rather arbitrarily classied as "extraordinary," which are among the usual, appropriate, and necessary expenditures of city governments, such as the purchase of new boilers for fire boat, the extension or the erection of new bridges, and the enlargement of various public works, expenditures which, however expert accounts may regard them, are, according to judicial interpretation, as well as according to the uniform practice of the Federal, State, municipal and county governments, properly to be classed as ordinary expenses of a municipality or other local government.

Still the classification and system of accounting sanctioned by the City of Chicago supports the correctness of more than 95 per cent. in amount of the items which have been embraced by Virginia in the account of ordinary expenses of the State government.

Very many more examples and precedents from the well-considered and enlightened experience and practice of the National, State, county and municipal governments, in America, can doubtless be cited, but it would be merely cumulative authority for propositions which are almost axiomatic, and the precedents and authorities in the support of which are as to all of the items claimed by Virginia overwhelmingly preponderating, and as to more than nineteen twentieths in amount of those items practically unanimous.

We desire now to invite attention to the views of Doctor Bastable, a writer of recognized ability and authority upon any such question.

In his work on "Public Finance," in discussing the subject of "Public Expenditures," that eminent political economist says:

> Sec. 1. "State outlay like that of an individual may be distinguished into normal or 'ordinary,' and abnormal or 'extraordinary.' These terms almost explain themselves, but may be thus contrasted: Normal expenditure is that which recurs at stated periods and in a regular manner; it is accordingly capable of being regularly estimated, and provided for. Extraordinary expenditure has to be made at indefinite times and for uncertain amounts, and it cannot be reckoned for with any approach to accuracy."

But he adds:

> "The distinction is not always applied in the same way, and indeed the boundary line is not sharply drawn." P. 130.

And again on page 132:

> "There is also in modern States a greater facility for foreseeing, and so to say discounting the future. The refined financial mechanism by which public borrowing is carried out enables 'extraordinary' expenditure for a short period to be transformed into 'ordinary' expenditure for a long one."

And again at page 133:

> "Abnormal expenditure also frequently occurs in a somewhat different way, as in the case of durable public works or other improvements. * * * Outlay of this kind is, in mercantile phraseology, 'chargeable to capital, not to revenue,' and is clearly abnormal. The method almost invariably adopted is to meet the abnormal outlay by an abnormal receipt, viz., borrowing, or to put it in another way, to turn the extraordinary expense of a given year into the ordinary one of interest on debt."

This distinguished author wrote with reference to British precedents. In the States of the American Union there are many subjects of public expenditure which are usual, appropriate, and often necessary, though not regularly recurring, which are doubtless unknown in Great Britain, but which are none the less ordinary.

The tendency of expert accountants seems recently to be to assimilate the accounts of expenditures of governments to those of public service and other like corporations; that is, to treat those which are "chargeable to capital" as "extraordinary," and those "chargeable to revenue" as "ordinary."

A little reflection will show that there are many expenditures of a State which are necessary, proper, and usual under the conditions of modern civilization, and which therefore are "ordinary," but which add to the public, though not always to the fiscal, assets of the State.

As will be seen, the rule as sanctioned by judicial decision, and by the great majority of precedents, while affirming the main doctrine as laid down by Doctor Bastable, is in this particular somewhat different from that stated by him, and is in accordance with the reasonable and just contention of the plaintiff.

See also paper prepared by Professor T. S. Adams, of the Department of Economics in the University of Wisconsin, which contains an able, learned and non-partizan discussion of this subject, printed as Appendix IV of this Note or Argument.*

These conclusions are also supported by the decision of the Supreme Court of Alabama in the case of the Intendant and Council of Livingston v. Pippin, 31 Ala. 542, and by the decision in the case of State, ex. rel. Branch v. Leapheart, State Treasurer, 11 South Carolina, 458 and by a number of other authorities, which have been ably reviewed by the Master.—See Master's Report, pp. 87 to 113.

There were some items of expenditure which the Master has deemed it proper to reject on the ground that they were not ordinary expenses of the State government, which we think can and should be classified as ordinary expenses. Such is the item of $258,906.28, on account of constitutional conventions, a usual, regular and ordinary expenditure, though not one of periodical occurrence, in Virginia and other States of the American Union; also

*NOTE.—This very instructive paper was obtained under the following circumstances:

Mr. Anderson, then Attorney General of Virginia, in 1909, wrote to Doctor Richard T. Ely, of the University of Wisconsin, (than whom there is no more learned and eminent master of the science of Economics in this country), for information as to the most trustworthy authorities upon the subject of public finance, particularly in reference to the proper definition and classification of such expenditures as are "the ordinary expenses of a State."

Doctor Ely referred Mr. Anderson's letter to Professor Adams, for whom he vouched, as being better situated to give the desired information.

Professor Adams, thereupon, prepared the able and elaborate paper which is printed as Appendix IV hereunto, a service which was generously rendered by him as a free contribution to the literature of this case.

expenditures for establishing boundary lines of the State, for making maps of its territory, and expenditures for the enlargement and improvement of the buildings and grounds of the deaf, dumb and blind institutions, and other charitable and educational institutions of the State, which we think the Master should have allowed as items of ordinary governmental expenditures, under the precedents and under the conditions of life prevailing in Virginia and the other States of the American Union, and in all other enlightened and civilized countries. If, as we are confident is true, the provisions of the Wheeling Ordinance should, under the circumstances under which it was enacted, be construed more strongly against West Virginia, whose citizens and representatives were its actual framers and enactors, then there can be no question but that all of these items of charge against her, rejected by the Master, should be allowed. We are content, however, to submit to the court the propriety of the Master's action in disallowing these several items, without further prolonging the discussion.

We are convinced that the conclusions reached by the Master under this paragraph of the decree, except as to the cost of constitutional conventions and the expenditures upon the instrumentalities and institutions of the State government rejected by him, are in general and in almost every particular, in substantial accordance with the legal and equitable rights of the parties and with the foregoing principles, and we therefore make no other exception to his findings under this head.

The reasoning of the Master and the authorities cited by him in support of his conclusions leave little, if anything, to be said in support of their correctness.

1. As to the Ordinary Expenses of the State Government.

The master finds the total aggregate ordinary expenditures of the Commonwealth during the agreed period, from March 19, 1823, to December 31, 1860, to have been..... $40,274,896.70

Of this sum the defendant concedes the correctness of items aggregating 18,207,784.29

The defendant contests items aggregating..... $22,067,212.41

The most important of these items of expenditure objected to by the defendant are the payments regularly made by the Commonwealth during all of that period on account of interest on the public debt, aggregating $18,574,747.84.—See Master's Report, pp. 87, 139.

The Master's findings on these different controverted items, and the reasons given by him in support thereof, are so clearly and fully stated by him, and so entirely supported by the record, and by reason and authority, that we are saved the necessity of any very elaborate argument in support of the correctness of those findings.

We will notice only two of the controverted items, the allowance of which by the Master, is objected to by the defendant.

The Master has allowed, as a proper item of ordinary expenditure of the State, the sum of $3,056,239.64 expended out of the State treasury, during that period, upon schools.—Master's Report, 132.

West Virginia certainly cannot justly object to this charge. There cannot be a shadow of a doubt that this sum was expended in the several counties of the Commonwealth during that period, and that they were annual ordinary expenses of the State government for the purpose stated—the most regular and the most ordinary of all the expenditures of the Commonwealth during that period, except the annual disbursements on account of interest.

The complainant had urged before the Master that so much of the expenditures made by the State on account of schools as were actually paid out in West Virginia counties, being distinctly allocated to those counties, should be charged against West Virginia under Paragraph III of the decree, as being "expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of the debt was contracted," "all" of which expenditures were required by the decree and by the Wheeling Ordinance to be charged against West Virginia.—See Exhibit C-1. p. 3, R. 374.

There was no question but that expenditures, amounting to the identical sum of $830,865.37 as shown by that exhibit, had been made out of the State treasury distinctly in West Virginia counties on account of schools between March 19, 1823, and January 1, 1861.

The Master took a different view, his conclusion being that the expenditures made on account of schools should not be treated as distinctly expenditures made in West Virginia territory under Paragraph III of the decree, but as a part of the general, ordinary expenses of the State government; and that, instead of charging West Virginia with the sum of $830,865.37, shown by the record to have been actually spent in the counties of that State out of the treasury of Virginia on account of schools, he would ascertain the total amount expended in the State for schools as a part of the ordinary expenses of the State government, and assign to West Virginia her proportion of those aggregate ordinary expenses.

While we think the actual expenditures should have been charged against West Virginia, and not the computed expenditures, we are disposed to waive that point; particularly if the apportionment is made on the basis of the average population without slaves, which certainly ought to be the basis adopted, inasmuch as the slaves received no portion of that, or of any other items of the ordinary expenditures of the State government, but as a rule all of said expenditures were made on account of the white population; and, so far as expenditures on account of schools were concerned, they were absolutely confined to white schools and to the white population, and were under the law always actually apportioned upon the basis of free white population.—Appendix to Record, pp. 146 and 147.

Apportioning the total school expenditures on the basis of average white population, as the same is ascertained by the Master (Master's Rep., 141), we have 26.6631 per cent. of $3,056,239.84, or $814,793.53, as the amount assignable to West Virginia; or only $16,071.84—say, 2 per cent.—less than $830,865.37, the agreed proved amount which was actually expended by Virginia in West Virginia counties, on that account, between 1823 and 1861.—See Exhibit C-1, p. 3; R. p. 374.

This result is significant in two particulars of great interest in connection with the question of the rule by which ordinary expenses should be apportioned, which will be considered later on under this paragraph of the decree:

First, in strongly supporting the justice of our contention that the true basis for the apportionment of ordinary expenses is the average white population; and

Second, in showing that that average should be ascertained by decades in the manner approved by the Master.

Stronger confirmation of these two contentions could not be well given than this concrete illustration where the aggregate of proved actual expenditures in West Virginia counties is so nearly the same as the same expenditures in those counties ascertained by estimating them on the basis of total average white population computed by the method adopted by the Master.—Master's Rep., 139, 140 and 141.

We are now come to consider the largest item of this account, involving a question which, because of the amount which it involves, is one of the most important which has arisen in the case, and that is—

The interest paid by the Commonwealth upon the public debt between March 19, 1823, and December 31, 1860, amounting to $18,574,747.84.

There were no expenditures of the State government from 1823 to 1861, which were more regular, certain and ordinary than the annual interest on the public debt of the State.

If this was not an ordinary expense of that government, then there was no such expense.

As has been already shown all governments and all authorities, and all expert accountants and statisticians, so far as we have been able to ascertain, agree in classifying the interest on a public debt as among the ordinary expenses of government.

It is to be assumed that the framers of the Wheeling Ordinance intended to do equity. At all events, a court of conscience will not put an unconscionable construction upon that enactment, particularly where a natural and reasonable construction can be given to it, and one which will tend to an equitable result.

Now, if the language of Paragraph IV of the decree, and the language of the Ordinance upon which that paragraph is predicated be so construed as not to require the new State to be charged with its just proportion of the regular and ordinary expenses of the State in the matter of the payment of interest on the common public debt, then West Virginia would be given credit in the account for all of her contributions to the treasury of the Commonwealth on account of said interest charges from 1823 to 1861, and yet she would not be charged with her aliquot just proportion of those same expenditures.

It is not to be presumed that such an unjust provision was intended to be made by the framers of the Wheeling Ordinance; nor will a court of equity give such a strained, unreasonable and unwarranted construction to the language used in that Ordinance, and used also in the decree of reference, as would lead to such inequitable and unconscionable results.

The decree, following the Wheeling Ordinance, requires West Virginia to be charged with a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the government, and this requirement will not be satisfied, if the largest, the most important, and among the most regular, necessary, and ordinary of those items of expenditure are omitted from those accounts.

2. As to the Basis of Apportionment of the Ordinary Expenses of the State Government:

The decree directs that this shall be made on the average total population of Virginia, with and without slaves, as shown by the census of the United States.

In ascertaining the average population of Virginia during the period, the defendant argues that the average for the whole period should be ascertained, and the apportionment made accordingly.

The plaintiff has ascertained that average by decades.—(See Exhibit D-1, p. 2, R. 516).

The Master has adopted the method approved by the plaintiff's accountants.

The purpose of the court in requiring the average population to be struck was doubtless to get as nearly to the true population year by year, and for the very year in which the expenditures were made, as was possible.

It is manifest that this can be more nearly attained by taking the average for each decade, than by taking the average for the entire forty years in lump.

For instance, the average population for the decade from 1830 to 1840 could be fairly ascertained by taking the population as determined by the census year 1830 and in the census year 1840, and dividing the sum by two. so as to give approximately the average for each year from 1830 to 1840; and so as to each of the other decades. And this has been done accordingly in the account as stated and adopted by the Master.

In no other way can an approximation to the truth be reached, and it is the truth which the court, and which we all wish to attain.

Another important question in this connection is—

Whether the average population with slaves, or the average population without slaves, should be taken as the basis upon which to apportion the ordinary expenses of the State government between Virginia and West Virginia.

This is a question which was left open by the court in its decree of reference, which accordingly has not been passed on by the Master, but is necessary to be decided by the court.

We respectfully submit that the white population of the Commonwealth, and particularly of West Virginia, constituted the best and fairest basis for this apportionment. That is, the free population—the citizenship,—and not the total of the free and the slave population.

The care and policing of the slaves cost the State little or nothing. Those matters were regulated by the masters on the plantations.

The debt was contracted solely by the white population or their white representatives. It was expended by them or under laws of their enactment.

The taxes were levied exclusively upon the property of the free population, and the revenues were appropriated and expended as they directed.

The negroes owed no part of the debt, did not constitute a part of the citizenship of the State during any part of the period of time during which it was contracted, or the money realized from it was expended; nor did they constitute any part of the body politic.

As has been seen a large part of the ordinary expenses of the government, as classified by the Master, consisted of school expenditures, which were entirely confined to the white children.

Under these circumstances we would urge as a just criterion for the apportionment of the ordinary expenses of the State government between West Virginia and Virginia, the white population of the territory embraced in West Virginia, and of the territory still remaining to and constituting the present Commonwealth of Virginia at the period when the expenditures to be apportioned were made.

V.

The fifth inquiry directed is, that the special Master will ascertain—

> "5. Such proportion of the ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia since any of said debt was contracted, as was properly assignable to the counties which were created into the State of West Virginia on the basis of the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia."

As stated by the Master, "this paragraph is clearly in the alternative with the last clause of Paragraph IV."

A correct response to this inquiry may have an important bearing upon the equities of the case; but it is difficult to see how the valuation of property, real or personal, in the two States would furnish any just criterion for the apportionment of the ordinary expenses of government.

It will be noted that this paragraph fixes no date as of which the fair estimated value of the real and personal property in the counties constituting what is now Virginia and what is West Virginia shall be ascertained.

The second paragraph of the decree fixed the 20th of June, 1863, the date when the formation of the new State was consummated, as the date for ascertaining the assessed valuation of the lands embraced in the two States, and that date was presumably the one contemplated in the fifth paragraph.

It will be recognized as true that the accurate ascertainment of the value of the real and personal property in a State is an exceedingly difficult problem, at any time.

Because of the conditions of disaster, confusion, loss and destruction of values occasioned by the ravages of the then pending war, the difficulty of the solution of this problem is here greatly enhanced. And yet an approximation to a result fair and just under all the circumstances can, we trust, be reached as nearly as is practicable, by proceeding along the lines of investigation and testimony which have been pursued on behalf of the plaintiff, and as to the real estate by the Master also. The only difference between the method adopted by the Master in this regard, and that pursued by the plaintiff is that the Master has applied that just method to the ascertainment of the value of the real estate in the two States, while the plaintiff has applied it to the ascertainment of the values of both personal and real property.

The land assessments afforded, if not a fair criterion, the only now accessible standard of value of the lands in the counties of undivided Virginia in 1860.

But those valuations were made in 1856, seven years before June, 1863, at which latter date at least four-fifths of the present territory of Virginia and one-fifth of the present territory of West Virginia had been ravaged and desolated by war, so that that valuation of 1856 afforded no just measure of values in 1863. It would suffice, however, to furnish a basis by which the depreciation occasioned by the war could be approximately determined.

The lands were assessed as of their cash specie value in 1856.

The personal property in Virginia counties was assessed annually, on the 1st of February of each year, as of its then cash value, in the currency which then constituted the medium of exchange and the standard of value.

After the war became flagrant, and particularly in February, 1863, that medium of exchange and standard of value, which was the only currency of the people, and the currency with reference to which as a standard of value all their transactions were conducted, was the depreciated currency of the Confederate States.

This was uniformly true in all the regions dominated by the Richmond governments.

There can be no question that the market values of all personal property, and indeed of all property, real and personal, in Confederate Virginia was, throughout 1863, fictitiously enhanced by reason of the depreciation of the currency in circulation in those regions, in which currency alone those values were measured.

This was true also as to West Virginia counties within the Confederate lines. where the assessments were made by officials under the Richmond government.

The personal property in West Virginia counties, outside the Confederate lines, where assessments were made by officers under the Wheeling government, was valued with reference to United States treasury notes (green backs) as a measure of value. The true value of this assesssed personal property in these West Virginia counties could be ascertained approximately, therefore, by applying the scale of gold to the assessment in each case.

It was impossible to get the assessed value of the personal property in a number of Virginia counties because they were so ravaged and so harried by war in 1863 that no assessments were made in them of the very small quantity of personal property which was then left there.

As to real estate, it was by no means an easy matter to get at its true value in 1863, and yet a way has been found by which, taking the assessed valuations of 1860 or 1861 as a basis, this has been reached as nearly as is now possible.

A number of witnesses of unusual intelligence, of the highest character, and most of whom had the best opportunities of ascertaining the facts as to the matters in respect to which they testified, were called on behalf of Virginia. Their testimony will be found at pages 739 to 786 of the record. By them the great destruction and deterioration in value of property, real and personal, in Virginia in June, 1863, is satisfactorily proved, and the fact that the lands had been diminished in value at least one-half, as compared with their value in 1860 or 1861, is established.

This general testimony is powerfully confirmed by the proof of a large number of facts and transactions, proof of actual sales of land in 1863 in Confederate money, and of the valuation by sworn and intelligent commissioners or appraisers of houses and lots in the city of Richmond in the spring, or in June, 1863.

For instance, Capt. Gordon McCabe testified (R. 784) that Westover, an historic estate on James river, for which the owner, to his personal knowledge, had refused $75,000 in 1859, was sold in 1863 by the owner for $60,000 in Confederate money,—then worth not more than $15,000 or $20,000 in specie; and Major Wellford (R. 762) testified that he was offered the Moss Neck estate on the Rappahannock river, an estate worth at least $40,000 before the war, in the fall of 1863 for $100,000 in Confederate money, then worth about $7,000 in good money; and by Mr. John B. Lightfoot, Jr., a number of most informing and significant facts were proved, which are set forth in the tabulated statements at pages 653 to 664 of the record, which furnish the proof of a number of contemporary sales of lands in Richmond city, Henrico, Hanover and Chesterfield counties, in 1863, at prices showing a depreciation exceeding 50 per cent., as compared with the antebellum assessed values of the same properties.

These were not selected transactions, but Mr. Lightfoot took all of the transactions of the character indicated, which took place about that time, of which the records of those counties and of Richmond City furnished any evidence as to the lands then sold or valued in Confederate money, the assessed value of which in 1860 or 1861 could be ascertained.

The evidence of these concrete facts, taken together with the testimony of the eight witnesses, and the known facts of the history of those times, fully support the contention of the plaintiff that the real estate in Virginia, and in the ten or eleven counties of West Virginia which were usually dominated by the Confederate forces and were generally within the jurisdiction of the Richmond governments, had depreciated at least one-half, as compared with the assessed valuations of the same lands in 1860 or 1861.

The Master has accordingly adopted this valuation as to real estate, and in this he was clearly justified by the proofs, as well as by the history of those times, known and accepted of all men.

To our surprise, however, the Master did not apply the same rules of depreciation to the personal property in the two States.

While he properly finds that the value of the real estate in Virginia had been cut in half and reduced from $296,085,460.30 to $148,042,730.15, he finds that the fair estimated value of the personal property, including slaves, in Virginia counties had increased, notwithstanding the destruction of war, from $264,512,799 in 1861, to $403,696,228.59 in June, 1863. (See figures given in the Master's report, at pages 167 and 168).

In this finding of the Master he estimated the value of the personal property, other than slaves, in Virginia in June 1863, at $152,844,637.59, as compared with the estimated value of the same kind of property, as stated by him, in 1861, of $102,114,863,—finding that, notwithstanding the depreciation and destruction caused by the war, the personal property in Confederate Virginia was actually worth, in June, 1863, $50,729,774.59, (or nearly fifty per cent.), more than its fair estimated value in 1861.

An examination of the figures adopted by the Master, given on pages 167 to 169 of his report, will show that he gives, as the fair estimated valuation of all personal property, including slaves, in Virginia counties in June 1863.....$403,696,228.59;

Of all personal property, without slaves, in the same counties..... 152,844,637.59;

And that accordingly he computes the fair estimated value of the slaves in Virginia counties, in June, 1863 to have been.....$250,851,591.00;

While he finds that the fair estimated value of slaves in the same counties in 1861 was....$162,537,936.00, the agreed valuation of slaves in those counties in that year.

The master's findings, therefore, give us the astounding result, that a considerably smaller number of slaves in Virginia counties in June, 1863, (nearly six months after Mr. Lincoln's emancipation Proclamation had taken effect, by its terms, and had become actually effective in large portions of the territory embraced in those Virginia counties), were actually worth, in good money, $87,329,635 more than a considerably larger number of slaves were worth in 1861, prior to the beginning of the war, and when they had a specie market value.

These results are not only in conflict with the overwhelming proofs in the case, but they are contradicted by the recognized facts of the history of those times.

The slaves in Virginia counties, as well as in West Virginia counties, were all of them then more than three-fourths, if not more than nine-tenths free. As soon as any of that territory came within the Federal lines (and at least one-third of Virginia was at that time within those lines, or dominated by the guns of Federal gunboats), or as soon as the slaves went within the Federal lines, they became actually and absolutely free.

It is simply impossible that it can be true that the personal property, other than slaves, in Confederate Virginia, was worth anything like as much in June, 1863, as that personal property was worth in 1860 or 1861, before it had been subjected to the disastrous and destructive effects of the war which was then prevailing.

It is especially impossible that it can be true that the smaller number of slaves in Virginia in June, 1863, (395, 105. See Joint Exhibit, E-1, p. 7, R. 645), after Mr. Lincoln's Proclamation, were worth as much as, and still less that they could be worth more than the larger number of slaves (472,494, as per U. S. Census of 1860, and Report of First Auditor of Va., 1860-61, p. 75, and Exhibit West Va. 2, R. 823 and 824), in those counties prior to the beginning of the war, when the title of the master and the status of the slave were unquestioned.

The proof shows that slaves were such a precarious property at that time as to possess very little value. As an instance of this, Col. Branch testifies (R. 756), that he purchased a slave in July, 1863, for the equivalent of $225 in gold—"a servant who would certainly have brought $1,200 in 1860, previous to the election."

But no proof ought to be required to show that the slaves in Virginia counties were, in June, 1863, worth very much less than the slaves in the same counties were worth, in good money, in January, 1861, prior to the beginning of the war.

It will be remembered that Virginia at that time was the theatre of the war.

In 1861 large armies had encamped upon her soil.

In 1862 and 1863 armies numbering in the aggregate from 250,000 to 350,000 men had occupied her territory, and largely subsisted upon what they could take from the limited resources of her people.

The Federal troops, in 1863, occupied the greater part of her tidewater counties and large portions of northern Virginia; and all of her coasts along the Atlantic ocean and Chesapeake bay, and the navigable waters of the Potomac, the Rappahannock, the York and the James were dominated by the gunboats of the United States, where not actually occupied by their troops. In all of these sections there were large numbers of slaves.

The uncontradicted evidence in the case shows that the depreciation in value extended not only to slaves but to all personal property, and was at least fifty per cent. as a minimum. There had been enormous consumption and destruction of every kind of personal property, and what remained had greatly depreciated in value.

Now, it may be that the Master is correct in holding that the plaintiff has failed to show definitely that the depreciation in value of personal property in Virginia counties was, in 1863, 75 per cent. of its value as compared with 1861.

But there can be no question, that the evidence in the cause (found at pages 739 to 786 of the record), corroborated as it is by the known and unquestioned and unquestionable facts of history, abundantly justifies the conclusion that that depreciation amounted to at least fifty per cent. in June, 1863, as compared with January, 1861.

We recognize that a similar depreciation existed in ten or eleven West Virginia counties which were generally held by the Confederate forces and controlled by the Richmond governments, during that period.

The chief importance of the question here discussed is in its bearing upon the question of an equitable proportion of the debt to be borne by West Virginia, and it is because of its bearing upon that aspect of the case that we have taken so much of the time of the court in its discussion.

VI.

By Paragraph VI of the decree the Master is directed to take an account ascertaining—

> "6. All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during the period prior to the admission of the latter State into the Union."

The Master finds (see his report, pp. 174-179) that the total payments made into the treasury of Virginia from the counties of West Virginia, for which the latter State is entitled to a credit in the accounting under this paragraph of the decree, amounted to $6,105,884.75.

The plaintiff is satisfied that the findings of the Master under this paragraph do substantial justice between the parties, and therefore waives any objection thereto.

The defendant objects to the Master's findings under this head because he fails to give West Virginia credit for items aggregating $807,646.89.

These items are as follows:

Item 7.—Dividends from banks in West Virginia counties	$786,666.98
Item 8.—Dividends and interest from Turnpike Companies in West Virginia counties	13,595.48
Item 9.—Dividends from Bridge Companies in West Virginia	6,028.51
Item 10.—Dividends from Interstate Turnpike Companies (proportion)	1,355.92

See Joint Exhibit, F., p. 1, R. 805; Master's Report, pp. 176, 180.

The Master's finding upon these items is evidently justified by the facts, and is consistent with the language of the decree and of the Wheeling Ordinance.

The amounts received by Virginia upon the accounts and items objected to by the defendant, particularly the dividends upon bank stock, were in no sense money paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included in the State of West Virginia.

They were the profits earned by Virginia's own money which she had invested in fiscal institutions; or the returns made to Virginia upon the investments mentioned, and not moneys paid to Virginia from West Virginia counties, within the meaning or within the reason of the sixth paragraph of the decree and of the ninth section of the Wheeling Ordinance, on which that paragraph of the decree is based.

None of them could be regarded as contributions from West Virginia counties, but they were the legitimate earnings from the State's own money invested in the banking business, and in the properties created by its companies.

As to the banks, while they had their principal places of business in West Virginia, their assets were transitory and of a movable character, having their situs not at all necessarily in West Virginia.

It will be seen that the Master had already held, under Paragraph III, that West Virginia was not properly chargeable under that paragraph with the money paid out by the Commonwealth on account of stock subscriptions to banks, located in West Virginia, and had excluded that item from the debit account against West Virginia under that paragraph.

We are convinced that the Master's ruling upon this point was correct, and by analogous reasoning the conclusions reached by the Master under the sixth paragraph, that these dividends were not in any sense public payments, or payments from West Virginia counties, was inevitable.

VII.

The seventh paragraph of the decree directs an account ascertaining—

> "7. The amount and value of all money, property, stocks and credits which West Virginia received from the Commonwealth of Virginia, not embraced in any of the preceding items, and not including any property, stocks or credits which were obtained or acquired by the Commonwealth after the date of the organization of the restored government of Virginia, together with the nature and description thereof."

This direction of the decree was doubtless given in response to the provisions of sections 1, 2 and 5 of the act of the Wheeling Legislature passed February 3rd, 1863.—Appendix to the Record, pp. 128, 129, 130.

There was a large amount of property, chiefly unappropriated or abandoned, and delinquent or forfeited lands, to which the Commonwealth had title, which passed to the new State by the said act of the Wheeling Legislature, and with the value of which property West Virginia was chargeable by the terms of that act upon such settlement as should be made between the two States.

After the decree of reference was entered it was ascertained by the accountants and counsel for Virginia that West Virginia had recognized the land warrants issued by Virginia prior to June, 1863, and had allowed them to be used, without additional payment to that State, in the acquisition of vacant and unappropriated lands within its limits to the extent of many thousands of acres, and that the new State received nothing for those lands. This was done although the entries were made and the warrants located upon those entries since the formation of the new State.

Under these circumstances, as the new State recognized the warrants of the undivided State, it was considered by counsel for Virginia that it would be inequitable to make any charge against West Virginia on account of those transactions.

It was also found to be impracticable, if not impossible, to find any satisfactory records of the disposition which had been made by the new State of large quantities of lands, delinquent and forfeited to the Commonwealth prior to June, 1863, for the non-payment of taxes, or for failure to enter the same upon the land books for taxation, and that inquiry, therefore, has not been pressed.

So that the only charges made by Virginia under the seventh paragraph of the decree are for money and bank stocks actually received by West Virginia from Virginia after the formation of the new State in 1863 and in 1864.

The fact as to the receipt by West Virginia from the Commonwealth of amounts aggregating $170,771.46, stated in plaintiff's exhibit G-1, R. 819, is assented to and certified by the accountants for both parties, and is reported by the Master at page 181 of his report.

The requirement of Paragraph VII of the decree was that the master should ascertain and report "the amount * * * * * of all money * * * * * which West Virginia received from the Commonwealth of Virginia" * * * * *.

Under these circumstances it is difficult to understand upon what ground the Master excluded these items, amounting to $170,-771.46, as to which the facts are unquestionable.

These sums of money were undoubtedly received by the new from the old State. At that time the officials of the restored government of Virginia consisted of West Virginians. That government was dominated by West Virginians, and the new State could appropriate and take out of the treasury of the State of Virginia, at Wheeling, whatever it chose; and it did undoubtedly receive from the "restored" government of Virginia $170,771.46, for which sum, we think, it is fairly chargeable.

It is proper here, however, to call attention to the fact that the Special Master has included in the charges against West Virginia, under Paragraph VII, the value of the stock which represented the amounts expended by the Commonwealth on turnpikes and bridges built by the following companies:

Sweet & Salt Sulphur Springs Co.	$ 7,578.00
White & Salt Sulphur Springs Co.	4,000.00
Fairmount & Palatine Bridge Co.	12,000.00
Making a total of	$23,578.00

The complainant has insisted, and still urges, that, under the terms of Paragraph III, of the decree, and under the language of the Wheeling Ordinance fairly construed, the expenditures made by the Commonwealth in the construction of these internal improvements should be charged against West Virginia under the third paragraph of the decree; and by her second exception she has objected to the Master's report for not charging West Virginia with items 60, 136 and 145, Joint Exhibit C-1, R. 375, 377,—which items cover the expenditures made by Virginia on said Sweet & Salt Sulphur and White & Salt Sulphur Turnpikes, and on said Fairmount & Palantine Bridge.

If the complainant's second exception is sustained as to those items, the corresponding items charged by the Master under Paragraph VII, of the decree, aggregating $23,578, covering the values of the expenditures in those works which were transferred to West Virginia, should be deducted from the aggregate charged against West Virginia under said seventh paragraph.

We submit herewith a statement showing the amount chargeable against West Virginia under this paragraph of the decree in accordance with the facts here stated, which are entirely sustained by the record.

Statement of Money, Property, and Stocks received by West Virginia from Virginia on and after June 20, 1863,—Paragraph VII:

(a) As found by the master (Master's Rep. 193).	$500,828.00
(b) Add for cash received by West Virginia from Virginia (Master's Rep. 181 and 193).....	170,771.46
Making a total of	671,599.46
Deduct for value of stock in the Sweet & Salt Sulphur Springs, and White & Salt Sulphur Springs Turnpike Companies, and the Fairmount & Palatine Bridge Company, the expenditures upon which are included in the total of $1,104,400.85 which complainant claims should be charged under Paragraph III (see Plaintiff's Exceptions, p. 12, and Joint Exhibit C-1, pp. 4, 5 and 6, R. 375, 376 and 377, and Master's Rep. 193).....	23,578.00
Balance chargeable to West Virginia.....	$648,021.46

VIII.

What is West Virginia's Share of the Debt?

Our rapid review of the master's report, brings us to the application of its findings—modified in the particulars covered by the few, but important exceptions, which we have taken to those findings—to the solution of the main question in the cause, namely:

> What, upon the data thus ascertained, is the proportion of the Virginia debt for which West Virginia is liable?

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that it is the just and equitable liability of the new State which is to be determined: for the Wheeling Ordinance imposed a just proportion of the debt upon her, and by the compact created by the provisions of section 8 of Article VIII of the West Virginia Constitution and the Acts of Virginia and of Congress, by which she was granted statehood, it was stipulated that an equitable proportion of that debt should be assumed by the new State.

Upon elementary principles there can be no question but that these provisions of the first Constitution of West Virginia constituted an essential stipulation and condition upon which the consent of the Legislature of Virginia to the creation of the new State was predicated. We have a right to assume that the consent of Virginia to her dismemberment would never have been given but for the fair and reasonable stipulation clearly expressed in that Constitution, that the new State should assume an equitable proportion of the common debt, and would provide for the payment of the accruing interest of the principal in thirty-four years.

It is equally, though no more, certain that the United States Congress would never have given its consent to the partition of Virginia and the erection of the new State out of her domain, but for the fact that the new State had undertaken to assume an equitable proportion of the then existing public debt of the Commonwealth, and to pay the same with the interest thereon. No evidence is needed to establish this; but if it were required it would be furnished by the records of Congress, and by the statements of honorable and distinguished actors in that momentous transaction.

On the 31st of December, 1862, the Act providing for the formation of the State of West Virginia was passed by Congress.

When the bill giving the consent of Congress to the erection of the new State was under consideration in the House of Representatives, the following discussion took place:

> Mr. Olin: * * * * "I desire to ask what will become of the bonds, and other obligations which Virginia has issued or incurred, by the recognition of a new State?" * * * *
>
> Congressional Globe, Pt. I, 3rd Session, 37th Congress, p. 45.

> Mr. Hutchins: "I will answer my friend from New York. Here is the provision of the Constitution of West Virginia in reference to that matter: 'An equitable proportion of the debt of Virginia prior to January the first, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as practicable.'" * * * *

And again, while the bill was still under discussion in the House, the following colloquy occurred:

> Mr. Crittenden: "Mr. Speaker, there is another question to which I invite your attention. The old State of Virginia, when she embraced east and west, owed a large debt. She owes it to this day. Who is to be bound for that debt? Is the new State? How is this debt to be divided?" * * * *
>
> "Mr. Blair, of Virginia: "In regard to the public debt, the Constitution framed by the convention of the people of the proposed new State of West Virginia, binds the new State to pay its just proportion of whatever public debt the State of Virginia owed prior to the Ordinance of Secession." * * * *
> Mr. Crittenden: "I only knew, Mr. Speaker, that in this bill there was no provision made for a division of the State debt. The gentleman tells us there is provision made for it in the Constitution, and I am satisfied with that. That was only a question of mere expediency which I wished to suggest; but although a matter of expediency it was also a matter of justice. If it has been attended to, I have no more to say about it." * * * *

Idem, page 47.

Years afterwards when the subject of the Virginia debt was again under discussion in the United States Senate, statements of great significance and importance upon the very fact we are now considering, were given out by Senator John Sherman, and ex-Senator Waitman T. Willey. Senator Willey was one of the senators from (Restored) Virginia, was one of the makers of the new State, a member of the Wheeling convention, and was an active participant in all of the transactions which led to the formation of West Virginia, had been for years a very active, intelligent, leading and useful member of the Legislature of Virginia, and was as well acquainted with the facts as to the origin and history of the Virginia debt, and with West Virginia's relations to it as any citizen of either State. Under his leadership, and upon the views which he earnestly urged, the United States Senate passed the bill giving the consent of Congress to the creation of West Virginia. Even with his able advocacy of that measure it was only passed by a majority of six votes. Besides his intimate acquaintance with the essential facts upon which West Virginia's obligation for the payment of an equitable proportion of the debt rests, Senator Willey was a man of very high character.

Senator Sherman had been a member of Congress when the bill for the creation of West Virginia was passed. Being from Ohio, an adjoining State, he had taken a deep interest in its enactment and had actively supported it. No two men in the world knew more about the history of that transaction than those two eminent men.

We state here now upon the authority of these honorable senators that the bill admitting West Virginia would never have been passed but for West Virginia's assumption of an equitable proportion of the debt of Virginia.

During the discussion of the subject in the 47th Congress, Senator Sherman read the following extract from a letter which he had received from Senator Willey:

> "I have a pretty distinct recollection that while the application for admission was pending before the United States Senate, you suggested to me this very matter, and that when I pointed out to you the clause in the Constitution which I have above quoted, you expressed your satisfaction and stated to me that it removed one of the difficulties which had been embarrassing you; and I say to you now, what I have said to the people of West Virginia, that but for that clause in her Constitution, the State would never have been admitted. I SAY FURTHER, THAT IN MY OPINION, NO HONEST MAN, OR HONEST PARTY, IN WEST VIRGINIA, OR OUT OF IT, WILL DENY THE OBLIGATION OF WEST VIRGINIA TO PAY AN EQUITABLE PART OF THE PUBLIC DEBT OF VIRGINIA." (Capitals ours.)

After quoting this extract, and after reading the 8th clause of Article VIII of West Virginia's Constitution, Senator Sherman said:

> "But for this stipulation in the Constitution of West Virginia, which was submitted to the Senate at the time of the passage of the bill to admit that State, it never would have been a State of this Union."—Congressional Record, Vol. 12, 47th Congress, p. 450.

No one can doubt, therefore, that West Virginia owes her existence to her promise to assume an equitable proportion of the debt of the old State, and to provide for the payment of the accruing interest thereon and of the principal of the same.

It is the corner-stone of her existence as a State.

The methods adopted for the purpose of ascertaining what West Virginia's share of the debt is, are merely means for reaching that end, and can be sanctioned only in so far as, fairly pursued, they shall lead to an equitable result.

It becomes important therefore to determine, what, independently of any conventional arrangement, would, under the circumstances which confront us here, be the equitable share of that debt to be borne by West Virginia?

The case presented is a peculiar one. It is sui generis.

History furnishes no counterpart, no precise parallel or precedent to guide us, by a clearly blazed path, to a correct conclusion.

Kingdoms, empires, and republics have been divided and subdivided, but never has a State been dismembered just as was Virginia in 1863.

And yet there are certain established rules of right and principles of equity which will enable us to reach a conclusion which will do substantial justice between these parties.

According to the authorities upon public, or international law, copious quotation from which will be found in the Appendix No. 1 to the reply brief for Virginia upon the motion to refer the cause to the master, printed in Vol. II of West Virginia's Compilation, pp. 163 to 167, the accepted doctrine seems to be, as the same is stated by Mr. John Bassett Moore in his Digest of International Law, as follows:

> "In the event of a State being divided into two or more independent sovereignties, the obligations which had accrued to the whole before the division are ratably binding on the different parts; for as Story says, 'the division of an empire creates no forfeiture of previous vested rights of property.'"
> 1 Moore's Digest Int. L., p. 334, citing > Abdy's Kent, p. 96, and
> Lawrence's Wheaton, 52 (m) 20.

The debt should, therefore, be apportioned "ratably" between the old and the new State.

For reasons already abundantly appearing in this case it is exceedingly difficult, to determine accurately the true taxable values of the property in Virginia as at present constituted and in West Virginia, on the 20th of June, 1863. There is less difficulty in determining the relative values as to the real estate in the two States, respectively, than as to the personal property in the two States.

The destructive and exhausting effects of the war then flagrant, the depreciation of the currency in general use in Confederate Virginia, were much more disastrous in their operation in what is now Virginia than they were in the greater portion of what is now West Virginia. The destruction of personal property was far more final and complete than of real property. When horses or cattle were carried off, or wagons or farming implements were worn out or destroyed, that was an end of them as property to their owners.

The lands might be, and were, greatly impaired in value by the destruction of fences and buildings, and by neglect, but these ravages of war could be, and in fact, in the forty-five years of peace, have been in great part remedied.

Moreover, land existed as property, and as a subject of taxation much more uniformly throughout the territory embraced in both States than did any other species of property.

It constituted therefore a more uniform, as well as a more permanent and stable measure of the wealth and taxable resources of the two States, at any time, and particularly at the date of the formation of West Virginia.

The court must have been influenced by these considerations in framing the second paragraph of the decree of reference, in directing the ascertainment of the "assessed valuation of the territory of Virginia and of West Virginia June 20, 1863," and in excluding from that account the value of the personal property therein.

Now taking up the Master's findings and applying them seriatim, as they should be applied, we will endeavor to ascertain what the result is, or should be, as to the part of the debt to be paid by West Virginia:

There need be no farther discussion under the first paragraph, by which the amount of the debt is ascertained.

(2)

Under the second paragraph it is ascertained that West Virginia had 36.1843 per cent. of the total area of the undivided State.

Apportioning the admitted $33,897,073.82 of the common debt on that basis would assign to West Virginia $12,265,418.88, of which $11,911,822.32 would be principal, and $353,596.56 would be interest.

West Virginia had 33.5231 per cent. of the total population, excluding slaves. On that basis West Virginia would owe $11,363,349.95, of which $11,035,758.90 would be principal, and $327,591.05 interest.

West Virginia had 24.5145 per cent. of the total population, including slaves. On that basis she would owe $8,309,698.16, of which $8,070,140.04 would be principal, and $239,558.12 interest.

West Virginia had 21.7812 per cent. of the total values of real estate upon the basis of the assessed valuation of 1863. Upon this basis she would be charged with $7,383,189.44, of which $7,170,341.40 would be principal, and $212,848.04 would be interest.

What part of the debt does West Virginia owe?

While taxable property seems, as a rule, to be the measure accepted by writers on public law for dividing a common debt between two states formed by the division of a State into two states, it may not be inequitable to bring population into the account here along with property; for population, such as that of these two States certainly constitutes an important factor of productive wealth.

Bringing the total population and the assessed valuation of the real estate into the account as factors, and combining the two and taking the average, we have $7,846,443.80 as West Virginia's portion of the debt, of which $7,620,240.73 would be principal, and $226,203.07 interest.

If, discarding the method defined in the Wheeling Ordinance, the apportionment should be made according to the fair value of the taxable property in the two States in June 1863, taking for those values the figures arrived at in our consideration of the Master's findings and the evidence under paragraph V, we will have the following results:

Fair estimated value of the taxable property in Virginia and West Virginia Counties, June 20, 1863:

Fair estimated value of real estate in Virginia counties, as ascertained by the Master and accepted by the Plaintiff (Master's Report, p. 168)	$148,042,730 15
Fair estimated value of personal property, other than slaves, in Virginia counties—not exceeding one-half of $152,844,637.59, its Confederate inflated assessed valuation in 1863,	76,422,318.79
Fair esstimated valuation of slaves in Virginia counties, not exceeding in good money as a possible maximum, one-half of $162,537,936, the agreed value on January 1, 1861, of the slaves in Virginia*	81,268,968 00
Fair estimated value of all property, real and personal, in Virginia counties	$305,734,016 94

*Note.—(Explanatory of the item of $81,268,968.00).—Upon the hearing before the Master on the first of January, 1910, the following agreement was made between the counsel for the parties, and made a part of the record:

"It is agreed, between the counsel for Virginia and West Virginia that there were 490,865 slaves in the Commonwealth of Virginia on the 31st of December, 1860, and that the fair estimated valuation of such slaves was $344 apiece; that of them, 472,494 were within the territory of the present Commonwealth of Virginia, and that their fair estimated valuation at that time was $162,537,936; and that there were 18,371 of such slaves on the same date in the counties that now constitute the State of West Virginia, and that the fair estimated valuation of such slaves was at that time in the aggregate $6,319,624.

"(Upon request the foregoing agreement was read aloud by the stenographer, and there was no objection to it by counsel for either party).

"Mr. Anderson: The Commonwealth of Virginia does not admit that the facts here conceded to be true are either relevant, material, or responsive to any issue in this case or any direction of the decree. Counsel for Virginia further object to the consideration of these facts by the Master in this case for the reason that both parties have down to the present day construed Section 5 of the decree as referring to the fair estimated value

Fair estimated value of real estate in West Virginia counties as per Master's Report p. 168	$ 67,676,127 44
Fair estimated value of personal property, excluding slaves, in same counties (Master's Report, 168, 169)	24,739,894 21
Fair estimated value of slaves in West Virginia counties, as conceded by Defendant, (Master's Report 169-170)	6,319,624 00
Total fair estimated value of all property, real and personal, in West Virginia	$ 98,735,645 65
Fair estimated value of all taxable property in Virginia and West Virginia as of June 20, 1863,	$404,469,662 59
Of which there was in Virginia	$305,734,016 94

or 24.4111 per cent. in the latter State.

Upon the basis of the fair estimated value of all property in the two States in June, 1863, according to the Plaintiff's statement of those values. West Virginia's share of the debt would be 24,4111 of the real and personal property in Virginia as of the 20th day of June, 1863, and have taken their testimony, prepared their schedules and exhibits, and until to-day argued the case upon that basis; and they object to the introduction of this new issue into the case at this stage of the litigation."

"The Special Master: Have you any objection to adding this to the agreement?

"It is further agreed, inasmuch as Paragraph 5 requires a report of the real and personal property by counties, it is agreed that the aggregate number of slaves stipulated for in the foregoing agreement was taken from the United States Census of 1860, and that in apportioning the number of slaves and the valuation thereof to the various counties, the same census, showing the slaves in the various counties as the basis for making that distribution, shall be used.

"Mr. Anderson: There is no objection to that. Let it be stated in the record that this agreement was made at the close of the argument, on the 1st day of January, 1910."

per cent. of $33,897,073.82, or $8,274,648,58; of which $8,036.100.90 would be principal and $238,547.68 accrued interest.

These estimates are more than liberal to West Virginia, for they include the slaves, both those still nominally in bondage, and those who were actually free, at a valuation equivalent to more than half what those slaves were individually or collectively worth in January, 1861.

We most earnestly and confidently insist that the slaves in Virginia and West Virginia in June, 1863, as a mass constituted no such description of property as to be any just basis upon which to rest any State indebtedness.

The tenure by which they were held was so precarious, both by reason of Mr. Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, and because of the facility with which they could secure actual freedom by escaping into the lines of Federal occupation, where they were not already within those lines, as very many of them were, that they constituted no fair basis for the ascertainment of the share of the common debt with which either State should be charged.

The above conservative figures seem clearly to demonstrate that, ascertaining West Virginia's share of the common debt, independently of the Wheeling Ordinance, her equitable share of that liability, computing it upon any basis which would be fair or just, would be $7,383,189.44, with interest on $7,170,339.47 from January 1, 1861,—as a minimum, if it be ascertained on the assessed values of real estate in the two States June 20, 1863; and that it would be $8,274,648.58, with interest on $8,036,100.90 from January 1, 1861, if the apportionment be made on the basis of fair estimated value of both real and personal property (including slaves) in the two States June 20, 1863, and estimating the slaves at a very large value considering all of the facts of the case.

These figures will be found not to vary very radically from the results which will be reached by applying the terms,—(and using the method prescribed by the Wheeling Ordinance, which West Virginia in her answer insists, determined the nature and extent of her liability), to the ascertainment of West Virginia's share of the debt, construing that Ordinance fairly with reference to the established facts and circumstances of the case.

West Virginia's Just Share of the Debt Computed under the terms of the Wheeling Ordinance.

We ask the attention of the Court to the question of the amount of West Virginia's liability ascertained in accordance with the findings of the Master's report under paragraphs III, IV, VI and VII of the decree.

We beg leave to file at this point as part of this argument alternative statements prepared by Mr. A. G. Potter, the accomplished expert accountant under whose immediate direction the accounts for the plaintiff were made up in this case, showing the amounts due by West Virginia applying the figures as ascertained by the Master, under each of the paragraphs of the decree. (Appendix V to this Note of Argument).

Mr. Potter has also, at our request, prepared a statement showing what would be the result under the alternative directions of Paragraphs III, IV, V, VII and VI of the decree, if the Wheeling Ordinance is construed and applied in accordance with the contentions of West Virginia, which statement is filed as Appendix VI to this printed argument.

Examination of this statement will show that, if West Virginia's attempt, by construction, to defeat the expressed purpose of the Ordinance, and to repudiate the compact which was the condition of her statehood, should be successful, then, instead of West Virginia owing anything, the balance on the accounting would be in her favor, to the extent of from $769,073.57, as a minimum, to $3,123,618.76!!!

These astounding results are reached by ignoring or distorting the unmistakable requirements of the Wheeling Ordinance:

(1) By charging West Virginia with only some and a comparatively small part of the actual expenditures made by Virginia in West Virginia territory during the debt period, when the decree and the Ordinance requires the new State to be charged with ALL of those expenditures.

(2) By omitting to charge West Virginia with any share whatsoever of the largest items of the "ordinary expenses," and failing to charge her with a just proportion of such expenses as West Virginia concedes to have been "ordinary."

(3) By taking credit for large sums as having been paid into the treasury of Virginia from West Virginia counties, which were never in fact paid into the Virginia treasury, from those counties; and

(4) By omitting to charge West Virginia with money and the fair value of bank stocks which she received from Virginia on and after June 20, 1863.

These results are so unconscionable as to absolutely discredit the data upon which, and the methods by which they are reached.

We will submit alternative statements, showing the amount of West Virginia's liability upon the basis of the Master's report under paragraphs III, IV, VII and VI of the decree, modified as we consider it should be in respect to the so-called "indirect" expenditures made by Virginia in building roads, turnpikes, bridges, &c., in West Virginia territory, and by the addition of the money received by West Virginia from Virginia in 1863 and 1864.

These paragraphs, following the Wheeling Ordinance, direct West Virginia to be charged with three classes of debits:

(1) With all State expenditures in West Virginia counties;

(2) With a fair proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State Government during the specified period; and

(3) In addition to these items under the Ordinance, West Virginia is chargeable with the value of certain bank stocks and with the money which the new State received from Virginia on and after June 20, 1863.

West Virginia is to be credited under the Ordinance and Paragraph VI of the decree with all payments made into the treasury of Virginia from West Virginia counties during the same period.

As we have already seen, the chief points of difference arise in the determination of

(1) What expenditures were made by Virginia in West Virginia territory;

(2) What were the ordinary expenses of the State;

(3) What was West Virginia's fair proportion of those ordinary expenses; and

(4) What payments were made into the State Treasury from West Virginia counties?

These questions have been, already, fully discussed in a general way.

The points of divergence between opposing views will be clearly presented by the following concise tabulated statements, showing the results in dollars and cents:

STATEMENT I.

Stating West Virginia's liability, apportioning ordinary expenses on basis of total population, including slaves:

Debit Charges: ....

Paragraph III.—Actual expenditures made by Virginia in West Virginia counties:
(a) Amount allowed by the Master ....$	2,811,559 98
(b) Add amount actually expended by Virginia in West Virginia territory through public improvemnet companies	1,104,400 85	$3,915,960 83
Paragraph IV.—Proportion of ordinary expenses, on basis of total population including slaves, ascertained under this paragraph of the decree by the Master (Master's Report, p. 140)		8,147,455 92
Paragraph VII.—Money, property and stock received by West Virginia from Virginia:
(a) As found by the Master..... (Master's Report p. 193)	$500,828 00
(b) Add for cash received by West Virginia from Virginia (Master's Report, p. 181)	170,771 46
	$671,599 46
Deduct for value of stock, as charged by Master under Paragraph VII, of the Sweet & Salt Sulphur Springs and White & Salt Sulphur Springs Turnpike Companies, and the Fairmount & Palatine Bridge Co., the expenditures upon which are included in the above total of $1,104,400.85 (para. III)—See p. 12 Complainant's Exceptions, and Joint Exhibit C-1, pp. 4, 5, 6, R. 375, 376, 377	23,578 00	648.021 46

		$12,711,438 21
Credit West Virginia:
Paragraph VI.—By receipts from West Virginia counties (Master's Report, p. 179)		6,105,884 75
On this basis West Virginia's share of the debt, as of January 1, 1861, would be....		$ 6,605,553 46

STATEMENT II.

Stating West Virginia's liability, apportioning ordinary expenses on basis of population, excluding slaves:

Debit Charges:
Para: III.—Expenditures made by Virginia in West Virginia counties, as shown in Statement I	$ 3,915,960 83
Para: IV.—Proportion of ordinary expenses, on basis of population without slaves (Master's Rep. 140)	11,452,862 66
Para: VII.—Money and stocks received by West Virginia from Virginia on and after June 20, 1863,—as shown in Statement I	648,021 46
	$16,016,844 95
Credit West Virginia:
Para: VI.—By receipts from West Virginia counties (Master's Report, p. 179).....	6,105,884 75
On this basis West Virginia's share of the debt, as of January 1, 1861, would be	$ 9,910,960 20

For reasons already shown to the Court, we consider this a fair, just and equitable basis of adjustment—far fairer than it would be to include the slave population as a factor in making this apportionment. It is the amount assignable to West Virginia under the Wheeling Ordinance, reasonably, and fairly construed and applied.

But, following a suggestion made by Mr. Justice Harlan during one of the former hearings of the case (See West Virginia's Compilation, Vol. II, p. 227), we have had an alternative statement prepared, apportioning the ordinary expenses of the State Government on the Federal basis, by which three-fifths of the slaves would be counted, as follows:

STATEMENT III.

.. Ascertaining West Virginia's liability, apportioning ordinary expenses on the basis of total white and three-fifths of the slave population:

Debit Charges

Para: III.—Expenditures made by Virginia in West Virginia counties, as shown in our Statement I, supra		$ 3,915,960 83
Para: IV.—West Virginia's share of ordinary expenses, averaged by decades, on basis of total white and three-fifths of slave population, as follows:
Mar. 19, 1823 to Sept. 30, 1830..	$ 584,731 27
Oct. 1, 1830 to Sept. 30 1840..	1,087,063 53
Oct. 1, 1840 to Sept. 30, 1850..	2,017,673 93
Oct. 1, 1850 to Dec. 31, 1860.	5,472,521 32	9,161,990 05
		$13,725,972 34

Credit West Virginia

Para: VI.—By receipts from West Virginia counties (Master's Report, p. 179)	6,105,884 75
On this basis West Virginia's share of the debt, as of January 1, 1861, would be	$7,620,087 59

It is a significant circumstance that the amount which West Virginia would have to pay upon this basis is so nearly the same as the sum which would be assigned to her, if, discarding the Wheeling Ordinance, the apportionment were made on the basis of the assessed value of the real estate in the two States as of June 20, 1863 which gives West Virginia's share of the debt as being $7,383,189.44, the difference being only $236,898.15, or only about 3 per cent.

Following the Master's report, we will now submit statements of the amount of West Virginia's liability, under the directions of paragraphs III, V, VII and VI of the decree:

STATEMENT IV.

Giving West Virginia's liability, apportioning the ordinary expenses of the State on fair estimated value June 20, 1863 of real and personal property, with slaves—estimated values of personal property and slaves being those adopted by the Master but excepted to by Plaintiff:

Debit Charges
Para: III.—Expenditures by Virginia in West Virginia territory, as shown in our Statement I, above	$ 3,915,960 83
Para: V.—Proportion of ordinary expenses of State Government on basis of estimated value of real and personal property, including slaves, counted at the figures reported by the Master for said personal property and slaves on June 20, 1863,—excesssive as we believe, and as we think we have shown those valuations to be (Master's report, p. 172)	6,078,367 96
Para: VII.—Bank stocks and money received by West Virginia from Virginia, on and after June 20, 1863, as shown by Statement I, above	648,021 46
	$10,642,350 25
Credit West Virginia:
Para: VI.—By receipts from West Virginia counties (Master's report, p. 179)	6,105,884 75
On this basis West Virginia's share of the debt as of January 1, 1861, would be	$ 4,536,465 50

STATEMENT V.

showing West Virginia's share of the debt on same basis as No. IV, except that the slaves are excluded from the computation of estimated values of real and personal property in June, 1863:

Debit Charges:
Para: III.—Expenditures in West Virginia territory, as shown in our Statement I, above....	$ 3,915,960 83
Para: V.—Proportion of ordinary expenses, apportioned according to fair estimated value of real and personal property, without slaves, (Master's Report 172)	9,463,553 58
Para: VII.—Value of stocks and money received by West Virginia from Virginia on and after June 20, 1863, as shown in our Statement 1 (Master's Rep. 193)....	648,021 46
	$14,027,535 87
Credit West Virginia:
Para: VI.—By receipts from West Virginia counties (Master's Report, p. 179)	6,105,884 75
On this basis West Virginia's share of the debt as of January 1, 1861, would be	7,921,651 12

These Statements IV and V are given, not because we consider that property values constitute the fairest or a fair criterion for the apportionment of the ordinary expenses of a State, or because we consider the Master's large estimates of the value of the personal property and slaves in Virginia in June 1863, as at all justified by the proofs, but merely to indicate that even upon those excessive valuations the indebtedness of West Virginia would be $4,362,964.50, on January 1, 1861, if personal property and slaves be counted as being worth in Virginia in June 1863, very much more than they were in January, 1861, and would be $7,921,651.12, if slaves is excluded from the calculations, as they ought to be as a matter of fair dealing, in apportioning the ordinary expenses of the State.

STATEMENT VI.

Showing West Virginia's share of the debt, apportioning ordinary expenses on basis of property values, as of January 1, 1861:

Debit Charges:

Para: III.—Expenditures made by Virginia in West Virginia territory, as shown in our Statement I, above	$ 3,915,960 83
Para: V.—Proportion of ordinary expenses on basis of fair estimated property values, including slaves, on January 1, 1861. (Master's Rep 173)	6,805,289 57
Para: VII.—Value of money and Bank stocks received by West Virginia from Virginia on and and after June 20, 1863, as shown in Statement I, above	648,021 46
	$11,369,271 86

Credit West Virginia:

Para: VI.—By receipts from West Virginia counties (Master's Report, p. 179)	6,105,884 75
On this basis West Virginia's share of the debt, as of January 1, 1861, would be	$ 5,263,387 11

STATEMENT VII.

Showing West Virgina's share of the debt, apportioning ordinary expenses on basis of property values, excluding slaves, as of January 1, 1861:

Debit Charges:
Para: III.—Expenditures made by Virginia in West Virginia territory, as shown in Statement I, above	$ 3,915,960 83
Para: V|—Proportion of ordinary expenses on basis of fair estimated valuation of property, excluding slaves, as of January 1, 1861, (Master's Report 173)	8,586,648 25
Para: VII.—Value of stockss and money received by West Virginia from Virginia on and after June 20, 1863, as shown in our Statement I, above,	648,021 46
	$13,150,630 54
Credit West Virginia:
Para: VI.—By receipts from West Virginia counties (Master's Report, p. 179)	6,105,884 75
On this basis West Virginia's share of the debt, as of January 1, 1861, would be	$ 7,044.745 79

These last two tables are given not because we consider the principle on which they are stated a correct one, but merely to show that even upon the inaccurate basis upon which they rest, West Virginia will owe a very large sum.

The more we consider the problems presented in this case the stronger our conviction is that the amount of West Virginia's liability, ascertained under the terms of the Wheeling Ordinance—if that ordinance be sensibly, reasonably, and fairly construed—is justly and equitably ascertained in Statement II, hereinabove submitted by us. That statement, which is supported by strong considerations of reason and justice, ascertains that indebtedness to be $9,910,960,20, as of January 1, 1861.

In any case and upon any amount for which West Virginia shall be decreed to be liable, we most respectfully and most earnestly insist that interest should be decreed against her according to her moral and legal obligation under the terms of her contract.

With entire deference for the sincerity of the divergent views of our honorable opponents upon these questions, we are persuaded that less than this would not do justice to the complainant, and to the common creditors of the complainant and the defendant here.

The Liability of West Virginia for Interest.

Is West Virginia justly, legally, equitably, and contractually chargeable with interest?

In this connection, we must remember that the contract which we are considering was a Virginia contract.

Under the law of Virginia as repeatedly adjudicated by her highest court, the interest is incident to the obligation, and whenever a debt is due, the debtor is bound to pay interest unless relieved from this obligation by agreement. This is, and has been the law of the Commonwealth for more than one hundred years.

In Jones v. Williams, 2 Call, 106, decided in 1799, Edmund Pendleton, who was one of the great Judges of our country, delivering the opinion of the court said:

> "Interest is allowed because it is natural justice that he who has the use of another's money should pay interest for it."

Cited with approval in Baker v. Morris, 10 Leigh 284, McVeigh v. Howard, 87 Va., 599, and Stuart v. Hurt, 88 Va., 343.

In Hatcher v. Lewis, 4 Randolph 152, 157, the court laid down the rule in the following expressive language:

> "The interest follows the principal as the shadow does the substance."

In Chapman v. Shepherd, the court said:

> "In contracts for the payment of money, interest is not given as damages at the discretion of the court, or jury, but as an incident to the debt, which the court has no discretion to refuse."

Chapman v. Shepherd, 24 Grott, 377, 384
Roberts v. Cocke, 28 Gratt, 207.
Tidball v. Shenandoah National Bank, 100 Va. 741.

"Interest is favored both by the legislative and judicial bodies of the State."

Tazewell v. Saunders, 13 Gratt. 354, 370.

In McVeigh v. Howard, 87 Va. 599, the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia said:

> "It is the settled rule that when no day is named in the bond or note given for the payment of a precedent debt, it is due and payable on the day of its date, and bears interest from that date, though no interest be reserved. Such an instrument like a bond or note payable, in Virginia, on demand, is payable presently, and bears interest from date. This doctrine is founded in good conscience and correct morals." * * *

Citing Jones v. Williams and Hatcher v. Lewis, quoted above.

Such is the law of Virginia as to interest.
The law of West Virginia in regard thereto is the same.

In Shipman v. Bailey, 20 W. Va. 140, 146, Judge Snyder, announcing the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of Appeals of that State, after citing a number of authorities upon the question, stated the rule as follows:

> "Other authorities of the same character might be cited, but, we think, we have given sufficient to establish the rule which seems to be, that in contracts for the payment of money interest on the principal sum is a legal incident of the debt and a part of the contract, and wherever there is a contract for the payment of a specified legal rate of interest, whether such rate is fixed by the contract itself or by the law of the place where the contract is made, the obligation of the contract extends to the payment of such interest as fully as it does to the principal sum, and courts have no more power to change the rate of interest thus fixed, than they have to dispense with the enforcement of the contract either in whole or in part."

That decision reaffirms another proposition, applicable to this case, already a part of the jurisprudence of West Virginia, by the adjudications of the Supreme Court of Virginia rendered before the birth of the new State, namely, that the lex loci contractus controls in the matter of the interest chargeable against a debtor.

In Pickins v. McCoy, 24 West Va. 344-352, the court affirms Shipman v. Bailey, and adopts the language just quoted from that decision.

Independently of these West Virginia decisions, such parts of the common law and of the laws of the State of Virginia as were in force on the 20th of June, 1863, when the first Constitution of West Virginia went into operation, and as are not repugnant to said Constitution, were continued and declared to be the law of West Virginia. Section 8 of Article XI, of the first West Virginia Constitution. And see present West Virginia Constitution.

The effect of this provision was to adopt for the new State the body of the common and statute laws of the Commonwealth, so far as the same were in force within the boundaries of the new State on the 20th of June, 1863.

As a part of this body of laws, the law of Virginia as to interest became, and has continued to be, a part of the laws of West Virginia.

Such, then, was the law of Virginia before, at the time of and since the formation of West Virginia, as to the legal and equitable liability of a debtor or contractor to pay interest. Such has been the law of West Virginia since the hour of her birth. And such was, and is, the law of the contract evidenced by the public Acts of Virginia and West Virginia set forth in complainant's Bill.

This is the rule in Virginia as to debts due by the Commonwealth.

The question was presented in the celebrated case of Higginbotham's Executrix v. Commonwealth, 25 Gratt. 627.

That was a suit against the Commonwealth to recover the amount due Higginbotham's Executrix on certain past due dividends on stocks which had been guaranteed and assumed by Virginia by the Acts cited in the opinion of the Court.—26 Gratt. 630, 631.

There was no express contract by the State to pay interest upon said dividends. The petitioner's claim was for the amount of the dividends "with its accruing interest."

The unanimous decision of the Supreme Court of Virginia was that "judgment should be entered for the petitioner for the amount of her demand with interest."—Idem, p. 641.

The framers of the Wheeling Ordinance must be presumed to have drawn that instrument with reference to the principle of equity and justice which had then and long before that time been embodied in the laws of Virginia by the repeated decisions of her highest court.

To Virginia and West Virginia lawyers of that day, as since that time, Judge Coalter's apt formula that, "the interest follows the principal as the shadow does the substance," was as familiar as any other accepted rule of equity or of law.

Under the law of Virginia in force at the time of these transactions, interest upon the portion of the debt which West Virginia was to take upon herself, was an esssential incident of the debt, and its payment as much a part of the obligation as was the payment of the principal.

But, even if the lex loci contractus had not brought us to this conclusion, the language of the ordinance itself, fairly construed, leads to the same result.

That language is that:

> "The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861," etc.

Now, that debt was an interest bearing debt. It was represented by obligations of the undivided State, some of them payable at a future day, some of them at a future day and thereafter at the pleasure of the Commonwealth, but all of them interest bearing obligations, obligations in which the payment of the stipulated interest was made as much a part of the debt as was the payment of the principal.

The interest was an integral part of the debt, and as many of the bonds were payable thirty-four years after date, and over $10,000,000 of them at the pleasure of Virginia, with interest from date, the interest as to much of the debt constituted much the greater part of it.

It was the manifest intention of the enactors of that ordinance, unless we are to ascribe to them the sinister purpose of perpetrating flagrant wrong and injustice, that the new State should take upon itself, and relieve what remained of the old State of a part of the burden of debt which rested upon both States. They knew that that burden consisted as well of interest, as principal, and as much, of interest as of principal.

It was not proposed that the new State should, as soon as she became a State, pay in cash a sum to be ascertained in the manner indicated in the Ordinance. The framers of the ordinance understood too well that under the conditions then existing, it would be impossible for the new State to raise and pay any considerable sum in cash.

Why the new State was dependent upon the old State for the money necessary to enable her to begin business and she did not have and in the nature of things could not command a sufficient amount in cash to pay off one-tenth or even one-twentieth of the then Virginia debt.

The stipulation was not that the new State should pay a sum in cash on account of its share of a common indebtedness; but that it should take upon itself a just proportion of that debt, to be ascertained as in the Ordinance prescribed.

Are we to understand that a court of conscience is to be asked to construe that stipulation to mean that the new State shall take upon itself only a proportion of a part of that debt? That it shall assume a share of the principal only of the debt, but shall be exonerated from any part of the interest which was, and is, as integral a part of the Virginia debt, and of the obligations which represent it, as the branches are a part of the tree from whose trunk they spring?

In their elaborate arguments in this case, opposing counsel have heretofore devoted very little attention to this important question, although it was plainly in their minds when they prepared their draft of decree, and although their attention was challenged to it by the argument for Virginia. In so far as they have discussed it, they have ignored the facts and principles upon which West Virginia's legal, "equitable," and "just" obligation to assume and pay the interest as well as the principal of her share of the debt, rests.

But West Virginia's equitable and legal liability to pay interest upon her share of the debt of Virginia does not at all depend alone upon the Wheeling Ordinance, or upon the law of Virginia and West Virginia, which makes the interest an essential part of the debt; but it rests still more and beyond the possibility of question upon the express terms of the Constitution under which West Virginia became a State.

The fact, the character and the legal effect of the compact created by that important transaction have already been fully discussed.

West Virginia's solemn covenant in regard to the equitable proportion of that debt which she assumed was that her Legislature should "provide for the liquidation thereof by a Sinking Fund, sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

This was precisely in accordance with the plan which had long theretofore been adopted by the Commonwealth for the payment of her debt.

This plan was embodied not only in the statutes but also in the Constitution of Virginia, in force when West Virginia became a State.

It was embodied in that Constitution in the following terms:

> "29. There shall be set apart annually, from the accruing revenues, a sum equal to seven per cent. of the State debt existing on the first day of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two. The fund thus set apart shall be called the sinking fund, and shall be applied to the payment of the interest of the State debt, and the principal of such part as may be redeemable. If no part be redeemable, then the residue of the sinking fund, after the payment of such interest, shall be invested in the bonds or certificates of debt of this Commonwealth, or of the United States, or of some of the States of this Union, and applied to the payment of the State debt as it shall become redeemable. Whenever, after the first day of January, a debt shall be contracted by the Commonwealth, there shall be set apart in like manner, annually, for thirty-four years, a sum exceeding by one per cent. the aggregate amount of the annual interest agreed to be paid thereon at the time of its contraction; which sum shall be part of the sinking fund, and shall be applied in the manner before directed. The General Assembly shall not otherwise appropriate any part of the sinking fund or its accruing interest, except in time of war, insurrection or invasion."

Section 29 of the Constitution of Virginia, in force from January 1, 1852, Code of Virginia for 1860, p. 47; Appendix to the Record, p. 200.

It was expressed and given further effect by the second section of the following Act passed by the General Assembly of Virginia:

"Chap. 17. An act establishing a sinking fund and providing for the payment of the semi-annual interest on and redemption of the public debt.
Passed March 26, 1853.

"2. Whenever after the said first day of January, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, a debt shall be contracted by the Commonwealth, there shall be set apart, in like manner, annually for thirty-four years, a sum exceeding by one per cent. the aggregate amount of the annual interest agreed to be paid thereon at the time of its contraction, which sum shall be part of the sinking fund, and shall be applied in the manner hereinbefore directed."

Acts of General Assembly of Virginia, session of 1852-3, p. 29; Appendix to the Record, pp. 200, 201.

Its effect was, therefore, well understood to be to conform the undertaking of West Virginia in regard to the time and manner of the payment of her share of the debt to the plan and scheme of payment which had been adopted by the Commonwealth, and which experience had approved.

That scheme was, the creation from the annual revenues of the State, of a fund equivalent to seven per centum of the principal of the debt. Of this, six per centum went to pay the annually accruing interest, and one per centum was invested and set apart to retire the principal sum due, within thirty-four years, and this arrangement was defined as a sinking fund.

It was found, and if the calculation is made it will be shown to be true, that one per centum of any sum invested and compounded at six per centum interest per annum, will in thirty-four years produce an amount equal to such sum.

This was the theory and the plan which Virginia had adopted for the liquidation of her debt.

It was a plan with which Messrs. Willey, Van Winkle, Hall, Brown, Haymond, and other members of the first West Virginia Convention, who had been previously members and some of them able members of the General Assembly of Virginia, were doubtless entirely familiar: And it is the same plan which we find incorporated in the scheme of settlement which constitutes a part of the foundation upon which West Virginia's existence as a State rests.

By this clause of West Virginia's Constitution, therefore, it was required, not that the new State should pay a lump sum in cash, to be ascertained in the manner prescribed, but that she should assume "an equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth" existing on the 31st of December, 1860, and should "provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

The framers of the West Virginia Constitution thus manifestly adopted, and engrafted upon that instrument, the plan which for nine years or more had been a part of the organic and statutory law of Virginia for the extinguishment of her public debt, and the Legislature of Virginia accepted and approved that plan.

That plan included, (as the West Virginia Constitution also expressly included), an undertaking on the part of the State to pay the accruing interest, and to liquidate or redeem the principal of each bond representing the debt, within thirty-four years.

In simple language, the stipulation of West Virginia expressed in her Constitution, and accepted and acted upon by Virginia, was, that West Virginia would pay the accruing interest on her share of the debt, as it should accrue, and the princippal thereof within thirty-four years.

That such was her express undertaking, appears from the language of her first Constitution, interpreted according to the reasonable and natural meaning of that language.

That such was the purpose, meaning, and effect of that language, is conclusively shown when we read it in the light of the plan established by the Constitution and statute of Virginia, then in force, for the establishment of a sinking fund for the liquidation of her public debt which plan was adopted by the new State as to its share of that debt.

And so, we find that both by the express terms of the Wheeling Ordinance fairly construed, and by the express terms of the Constitution under which Virginia and the National Congress consented that West Virginia should become a State, this new State has become expressly obligated to pay interest upon the share of the principal of the common public debt for which she is liable.

These positions are not at all in conflict with the general rule of American and of public law, as clearly defined by this court in United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S., 211, as the law governing that case, that,

1. "Interest, when not stipulated by contract or authorized by statute, is allowed by the courts as damages for the detention of money or property;"

2. "Interest is not to be awarded against a sovereign unless its consent has been manifested by an act of its legislature, or by a lawful contract between executive officers;"

3. "By decisions in North Carolina that State, unless by or pursuant to an explicit statute is not liable for interest, even on a sum certain which is over due and unpaid."

See also South Dakota v. North Carolina, 192 U. S., 286.

The question presented in the case at bar is taken out of the reason and the decision of this court in the North Carolina cases by the following circumstances:

(1) The obligation to pay interest is determined by the lex loci contractus, and under the settled law of Virginia which was the law of the contract between West Virginia and Virginia, and under the law of West Virginia also, interest is not and never has been allowed as damages for the detention of money, but in those jurisdictions interest is allowed as an essential incident of a contract, whether express or implied, for the payment of money, and as a matter of right and justice.

This court, in its opinion in United States v. North Carolina, expressly rested that decision upon the fact that under the law of North Carolina no interest was payable on such a contract.

(2) The payment of interest is here an obligation imposed by statute—first by the Wheeling Ordinance, and second by the Constitution under which West Virginia became a State.

(3) The express contract of West Virginia upon which her existence as a State was conditioned requires her to pay interest on the part of the debt which she assumd.

This is a very much stronger case for a decree for interest than United States v. State of New York, 160 U. S. 600,, righteous as was the allowance of interest there.

Paraphrasing the language of this court in that case, p. 621, "It would be a reflection upon the" honorable motives of the members of the Conventions which framed the Wheeling Ordinance and the West Virginia Constitution "if we did not place a liberal interpretation upon those acts and give effect to what, we are not permitted to doubt, was intended by their passage."

Another question which arises in connection with the consideration of this subject, is, from what time is West Virginia justly and equitably bound to pay that interest?

Answer to this is furnished by the Wheeling Ordinance and by the section of the first West Virginia Constitution above quoted.

The settlement by the terms of both instruments was to be made as of the arbitrary date of January 1, 1861, or to be precisely accurate, as of December 31, 1860. That, accordingly, is the date from which fairly equitably, and legally, (because it accords with the express terms of both the ordinance and the Constitution), the interest should be computed.

As already shown, the debt, a proportion of which as of that date, West Virginia was to assume and pay, was an interest bearing debt, and the interest was as integral a part of it as was the principal.

A farther kindred inquiry to the last is: To what time should West Virginia be required to pay such interest?

Our response to this is, that she is justly, equitably and legally bound to pay this interest,

(1) By the terms of the Wheeling Ordinance; certainly, for the period during which the debt of the Commonwealth existing on the 31st of December, 1860, would continue to be an interest bearing debt: And we have seen that that was not only until the obligations representing the debt became due, but under the just rule of the law of Virginia as to interest, in force during the whole period of the creation of the debt, until that principal should be fully paid.

(2) By the terms of the section of her Constitution above quoted, accepted by Virginia and by the Congress, West Virginia undertook to pay all the accruing interest on, and the principal of, her share of that debt in thirty-four years.

She has failed and refused to pay that share, or any part of it.

The interest accruing thereon from December 31, 1860, has continued to accrue, as to her, until it now amounts to vastly more than the principal. It was that interest which West Virginia agreed to pay, and it was that principal for the payment of which West Virginia's Legislature was to make provision, so that the same should be paid within thirty-four years.

We are unwilling to anticipate that the learned counsel for the defendant will argue that West Virginia, by the language of that provision of her Constitution, is only bound to pay interest for thirty-four years from December 31, 1860, or from June 20, 1863, because we are unwilling to assume that our distinguished opponents would contend that a State, any more than an individual, should be allowed to take advantage of her own wrong, or profit by her own procrastination, and neglect of duty.

Here, West Virginia has not only not paid a just, or any other proportion of the common public debt, nor provided for the payment of the accruing interest thereon, and for the payment of the principal, but she has persistently failed and refused to do either of these things, and has by the votes of her Legislature, again and again repudiated any and all liability whatever for any part of that indebtedness.

With all deference for the distinguished counsel for the defendant, we venture to believe that a court of equity will not allow any defendant, and particularly a State, which should be an exemplar of fair and honorable dealing in all of its transactions, to make gain out of its own palpable dereliction of duty.

And so, our response to such contention, if it shall be urged, is, that equity will not suffer any party to take advantage of his own wrong.

Conclusion

It is, true that the amount which West Virginia is thus equitably bound to pay, including the interest fairly and justly due thereon, will, as of this date, aggregates a very large sum; but that constitutes no argument for her exoneration from the payment of the same.

Fortunately for West Virginia this indebtedness, even if the very largest sum which under any of the alternative statements in the case could by possibility be found to be due by her, should be decreed against her, would, in the affluence which the record shows she now enjoys, wealth largely resulting from the construction of the very improvements upon which the expenditures made by Virginia in roads, turnpikes, railroads and bridges, and in the improvements of the navigation of her rivers were made,—impose upon her a burden easy to be borne, and light, as compared with what Virginia, during the period of her greatest impoverishment, has assumed and borne.

Virginia not only assumed two-thirds of the original debt and two-thirds of the accumulated interest upon it down to January 1st, 1871, and in addition thereto the accumulated interest upon over $8,000,000 of bonds issued by her on account of unpaid and accumulated interest prior to January 1st, 1871, but she paid off in full large amounts of interest accruing after December 31st, 1860, and before January 1st, 1871; and she has paid off, also, in full very large amounts of the principal of the original debt; and has, also, paid off large amounts of the principal of the two-thirds of the debt assumed by her in 1871.

In addition to this Virginia has paid, as of this date, over $38,000,000 of interest.

It must be remembered that these payments, made by Virginia, have been distributed through a period of more than forty-five years.

Large portions of these payments were made by the people of Virginia out of limited resources, in the period of their greatest poverty and distress.

If interest were to be computed upon the payments thus made by Virginia during the last forty-eight years on account of this common debt,—which would have to be done in order to equalize West Virginia with Virginia in regard to these transactions,—the average period upon which interest should be so computed upon the payments so made by Virginia in order to thus equalize her with West Virginia, would be considerably more than twenty years; and the amount assumed and paid by Virginia, including the upwards of $25,000,000 of her recognized and regularly met obligations still outstanding, and including the payments she has heretofore made on the whole debt, and on the two-thirds she has specifically assumed, would aggregate considerably over $100,000,000, as of this date.

Large portions of West Virginia would to-day be a wilderness, but for the building of the works of internal improvement whose construction was secured by the expenditures above referred to, and the building of other works of internal improvement which have resulted from the construction of the great lines upon which Virginia expended so many millions of dollars of her substance.

The people of West Virginia are to-day enjoying the fruits of the enterprise and liberality of the Commonwealth in those expenditures,—not only those expended within the limits of West Virginia, but also in the expenditure of millions of dollars on works outside of the territorial limits of West Virginia, but which were built in large part for the purpose of developing the resources of the territory now constituting that State.

Too much emphasis cannot be laid upon these facts and considerations.

Nor can it be forgotten that almost the entire indebtedness which is the subject matter of this investigation was created by the votes of the representatives of West Virginia, and that very little of it ever would have been created but for the support they gave to the Acts by which this large indebtedness was imposed upon the Commonwealth,

The complainant desires and asks only that a decree which is in accordance with the legal and equitable rights and obligations of the parties shall be entered.

Such a decree, she is satisfied, will impose upon the new State the duty of paying a very large sum on account of this long ignored obligation, but a sum, every dollar of which West Virginia justly owes and the complainant is righteously entitled to recover.

Her earnest plea is that West Virginia is bound both by the terms of the Wheeling Ordinance, and of her first Constitution to pay a just and equitable part of this debt with interest until the same shall be fully paid, and that she shall not be suffered to repudiate either obligation.

She respectfully asks that a decree may be entered for such sum as is thus equitably due, with interest thereon from the 1st day of January, 1861, until the obligation shall be fully discharged.

containing extracts from the public records and statutes of the Commonwealth showing the nature, motive, and object of her expenditures through joint stock internal improvement companies:

Report of the Committee on Roads and Internal Navigation to the General Assembly, submitted December, 1815 (Board of Public Works Reports, Vol. 1, p. 43):

"Whatever difference of opinion may have at any time existed as to the expediency of controlling the voluntary direction of the wealth and the labor of individuals by the application of legal constraint, there never has existed a doubt but that it is the duty as well as the interest of every good government to facilitate the necessary communication between its citizens.

"Next to the enjoyment of civil liberty itself, it may be questioned whether the best organized government can assure to those for whose happiness all governments are instituted, a greater blessing than an open, free and easy intercourse with one another by good roads, navigable rivers, and canals. Their tendency, by extending commerce to promote the agriculture and manufacture of a nation and thereby to augment its wealth and population, is too obvious to require much illustration.

"The planter and farmer realize their share of this benefit, in the augmented value of their lands; the manufacturer and the merchant, in the increased and diversified demands for their industry and capital. Nor are the higher interests of society less indebted for their advancement to the multiplication and improvement of these channels of useful intercourse. They afford the means of exploring the natural resources of a country and invite the genius of speculation to fit them for the uses of man. Lands too remote from markets to tempt cultivation; forests, hitherto regarded as inaccessible; beds of minerals and fossils unknown or neglected, are brought within the reach of ordinary enterprise and rendered subservient to the convenient comfort of the citizen or to the defense and safety of the State. They confer on an extended empire the promptitude and energy of action, which are considered peculiarly characteristic of one of narrow dimensions; since without contracting the limits of its territory they reduce the distance and expedite the communication between the seat of its government and its remotest extremities.

"Whether the public force is to be spread out for defence or combined for attack, they alike contribute to the rapidity and vigor of its operations.

"In a republic, especially, where public opinion exerts a controlling influence, and public virtue should be the spring of all public action, they may be considered an important auxiliary, if not a necessary ingredient of public liberty. They tend to difuse more equally the knowledge which experience acquires and the leisure which wealth alone can purchase; they strengthen the cords of social union and the quick and generous feeling of patriotism, which is ever ready to exclaim at the contemplation of an extended scene of public improvement. 'I love my country because she is worthy of my affection.'

"The duty, which is obligatory upon all governments, is peculiarly incumbent upon one, whose territory like that of Virginia, nature has done so much both to unite and separate—to whom she has presented so many advantages to improve and so many obstacles to overcome.

"No State of the Union is intersected by so many navigable rivers or divided by so many chains of lofty mountains; none perhaps abound with such happy varieties of climate and soil, so many resources for internal commerce. In her coal, iron, lead, tin and salt, she is unrivalled. Her tobacco and grain command the highest prices abroad. The fertile banks of her rivers and the moist valleys of her mountains yield abundant crops of flax and hemp. Her lowlands would supply her with cotton for her own consumption, and the fleeces of the flocks which pasture on her hills are not surpassed in quality.

"Notwithstanding these advantages, the principal part of her commerce and almost the whole of her navigation, pass out of her hands to enrich the coffers of her neighbors. There is scarcely a village to the west of the Blue Ridge and very few above tidewater, from the Roanoke to the Potomac, which derive any part of their supply of manufactured commodities, either foreign or domestic, from the seaports of Virginia.

"While many other States have been advancing in wealth and numbers with a rapidity which has astonished themselves, the ancient Dominion and elder sister of the Union has remained stationary.

"A very large proportion of her western territory is yet unimproved, while a considerable part of her eastern has receded from its former opulence.

"How many sad spectacles do her lowlands of wasted and deserted fields present? Of dwellings abandoned by their proprietors. of churches in ruins? The genius of her ancient hospitality benumbed by the cold touch of penury, spreads his scanty board in naked halls, or seeks a coarser but more plenteous repast in the lonely cabins of the West. The fathers of the land are gone, where the outlet to the ocean turns their thoughts from the place of their nativity and the affections from the haunts of their youth. Beyond the Alleghanies an unexpected revolution threatens the Atlantic States in general, the accomplishment of which will create new interests and views in that flourishing and important section of America, and probably, for them, the hope of reuniting it by commercial ties to the markets of the East.

"If it be true, as your committee confidently believe, that in a connection between the Roanoke, the James, and the Potomac, with the waters of the Kanawha or Ohio, this Commonwealth possesses the best means of arresting the progress of this revolution, it is a duty which she owes not only to her self, but to the Atlantic States and to the Union at large to call those means into action

"Your committee are far from intimating that the General Assembly of Virginia has been totally unmindful of those natural advantages or wholly regardless of their improvement.

"The Commonwealth required time to recover from pecuniary losses which she sustained during the War of the Revolution. It found her citizens laboring under very heavy private debts, and left her government encumbered with a public debt of much greater magnitude. .. .. ..

"Yet in circumstances so inauspicious the statesmen of that day and especially the illustrious man to whom, under heaven this nation was indebted for the establishment of its freedom, did not disdain to enquire into the humblest means of giving to that freedom value. From his zealous exertions sprung the Potomac and James River canal companies. To the first of these the Commonwealth is indebted for a water communication 338 miles: and upon it and the contemplated works of the Shenandoah she relies for the further improvement of a navigation of 390 miles. She has shared with a sister State the benefits of the labor already performed on this river; in that which remains to be accomplished on the south branch of the Potomac and Cacapehon and the Shenandoah, she has an extensive interest.

"The James River Company have opened a navigation of 300 miles.

"The Appomattox and Dismal Swamp canal naturally followed into existence those which were indebted for their origin to the patriotism of General Washington. The former opened a navigation of 100 miles. The latter was designed merely to connect waters already navigable, but in its present use and remote consequences is not inferior in importance to any public work in the Commonwealth.

"The expense of the first of the preceding work does not exceed $1,500 per mile upon the navigation already opened; that of the second is about $1,200; the average expense will be annually diminished in the history of future improvements on the branches of those rivers as the principal obstructions to their navigation were removed before their waters could be brought into partial use.

"The actual cost of those public works does not exceed one-third of the expense usually attendant upon the structure of turnpike roads; which in the absence of navigation are the only substitute for them. It is due to the latter, however, to remark that the addition recently made to them of parallel lines of rails, immovably set in the earth at proper intervals for the wheels of wagons, has more than equalized the advantages of such roads with the best ascending navigation which the resources of Virginia afford above their principal falls; and that the additional cost which this improvement gives to the structure of the turnpike, although great in itself, is inconsiderable when compared with its effect in reducing the expense of loads carried. The turnpike roads of the Commonwealth except a few short pieces of particularly mountainous, and a road recently begun from Fredericksburg towards the Blue Ridge, are confined principally to the county of Loudoun, the adjacent counties of Fairfax, Fauquier, Frederick, and to the vicinity of the seat of Government,

"There is but one to which the funds of the Commonwealth have contributed any aid.

"All of these public works are alike in one respect. They purpose to defray the expense of their first cost and of their subsequent repairs, out of the tolls collected upon them; and these are equitably levied upon those who use them in sums proportionate to the benefit which they respectively derive from such use. Where it is absolutely certain that such works can subsist upon this basis alone, the revenue of the Commonwealth, although it may expedite their progress, is not indispensably necessary to their creation."

"Private wealth will of itself take the direction which personal interest prompts. But there are many such works essential to the prosperity of the Commonwealth, the persons immediately interested in which have not capitals sufficient to commence their foundation, and there are many others of like utility which if completed would require the lapse of many years to make them profitable to the individual subscribers to their stock. The population and commerce which infallibly follow their direction, spread out upon their borders and swell their tolls, cannot be expected to precede their existence.

"Although almost all the turnpike roads within the Commonwealth of Virginia have been made without any other legislative aid than their respective acts of incorporation, yet it is probab that neither the Potomac nor James River would have been re dered navigable above tidewater with such assistance alone. Mar land and Virginia subscribed more than one-half of the capit stock of the former, and Virginia alone more than one-third the latter. The tolls hitherto collected on the one would not ha justified a subscription to its stock with a view to mere profit; a though those of the latter have for some time realized the mo sanguine expectations of its friends and its stock is 80 per cen above par, yet the revenue of the company apart from the appreci tion of its stock, would not net to its members 6 per cent. per annu upon the sums which they have actually expended upon that riv from the commencement of their labors to the present period.

"Your committee, however, confidently believe there is not individual within the Commonwealth alive to a sense of her tr interests who would have desired for the sake of a higher pro to the treasury upon the stock of the public in either of these work to withdraw the funds which were required for their completi and permit this noble resource to return to a state of nature.

"Those who reside near to their banks directly participate in the benefits thus afforded them of a cheaper mode of transpor
ing the productions of their labor to market; and those even wh accidentally possessed the superior advantages of tidewater, or wh were compelled by their distance from both to resort to the com mon highways in order to reach the same markets, have great profited by those improvements of navigation which augment th extent and value of that market, could not fail proportionately enhance the price for their produce. So true it is that wha ever contributes to increase the population and wealth of the tow must contribute to the growth and improvement of the countr
And this effect is wrought not solely on the vicinity of those town it is seen not merely in the wealth which collects in their suburb but is discovered in the augmentation of their means of consump tion and the enlargement of their commercial capitals.

"In this necessary and reciprocal relation of commerce an agriculture, the country below tidewater in Virginia has an immed iate and even local interest in the progress and perfection of all those public works exclusive of its general interest in whatever advances the growth and prosperity of the Commonwealth. The inhabitants of the lowlands will therefore partake of the benefit of every application of public revenue to the improvement of the connection between their market towns and the country above them. It should be peculiarly their policy to turn the commerce to the west from its northern direction into the bosom of their own territory. In the efforts which are contemplated to improve the roads passing immediately through their own country they have an interest more sensible to the eye but less so to the understanding.

"Although much has been done for the improvement of the interior of Virginia, more yet remains to be accomplished."

"If nature has divided the territory of the Commonwealth by numerous chains of lofty mountains it is only to incite the genius of mankind to climb them, and the period is not unthinkable—nay, it rests with the legislature to determine whether it be remote, when the roads which cross those natural and formidable barriers shall not be surpassed by those which run along their base * * *

"Should the General Assembly determine to patronize by the application of the public revenue all such works as are likely to be of great public utility, it becomes important to decide whether an improvement may not be made in the mode heretofore pursued of extending to them patronage.

"Your committee are fully satisfied that much loss has been sustained by all the canal companies which have been incorporated hitherto for want of skill in their conduct. Their directors have served, it is true, without compensation. They have generally been public spirited private gentlemen, but neither professional engineers nor capable from experience and observation of guarding against the errors and frauds of agents who pretended to be so.

"No single company could afford to purchase or could fully employ in a country where a few public works were begun, the services of a distinguished engineer; and yet without the previous surveys, plans and estimates of such an officer, no very arduous public work could be confidently begun or successfully conducted. To supply the defect of such an officer would be the obvious interest of the Commonwealth, and if he were not sufficiently compensated by the general utility of his labors, he might demand of each company such an interest in its stock as would be equivalent to the value of the service rendered to the company by such officer.

"Whatever funds the legislature may be inclined to appropriate for internal improvements, a difficulty must occur in settling the relative importance of its principal objects; and if the appropriation were also required to designate some particular object it would be often impracticable from the variety of opinion—always existing in an Assembly representing many local interests—to procure an union in the choice of any one.

"The first of these difficulties may be obviated by organizing a proper body to collect and prepare for the General Assembly the facts and information necessary to cast upon every application for a portion of the fund light enough to guide the sound discretion of the Legislature in the selection of subjects."

"And these facts will be entitled to the higher confidence if reported under the sanction of official responsibility."

"To allay such local jealousies as might obstruct an agreement in favor of any single object of internal improvement, a fund may be previously segregated and set apart for the accomplishment of all by one appropriation. If the term by future application to any, be at the same time prescribed, a like participation in the benefit of the fund would be assured to every interest which it is calculated to promote; and the speedy enjoyment of that benefit will be secured to each by apportioning the magnitude of the fund so set apart to the number and importance of the objects for which it is designed to provide.

"It may be sound policy for the Commonwealth, in order to accomplish some great commercial or political purpose, to throw open to general use, without the charge of toll, a particular canal or road; but it can never be to its interest, for many reasons, to become the sole proprietor of all the public works within its territory.

"Experience testifies that they will be more economically improved and better repaired if their management be left to the individuals who subscribe to their stock, with a view to private gain, than if confined to public officers or agents.

"The Commonwealth should subscribe so much to their stock and on such terms as will suffice to elicit individual wealth for public improvement—and the control which she retains over the conduct of the individual subscribers should extend no further than to prevent or correct such abuses upon the community at large, as might be apprehended from the too eager incentive of gain.

"By yielding to the individual subscribers the profit of the State on its shares of the stock of any company where required to secure such individuals against temporary loss, a much smaller subscription of the public money will suffice to draw forth private enterprise.

"The Commonwealth can never be a loser if a public work judiciously begun be finally perfected—and the public security against such loss will be found in the discretion which the legislature retains over the choice of the object for which its patronage is sought.

"As the market rate of interest decreases in every commercial country with the growth of its capital, the maximum profit of the stock of each company may be reduced after the lapse of a limited period of time.

"The principles laid down in the preceding part of this report the committee has embodied in the resolutions which are subjoined to it; but they would not have performed their duty to the House if before they recommended the application to objects of internal improvement of all the public stock of the Commonwealth as well as the premium which may be hereafter received from the incorporation of new, the extension of the capitals or the duration of the charters of the existing banks, they had not enquired into the actual state of the debts and of the annual revenue and expenditure of the Commonwealth."—

"That inquiry resolves itself into the establishment of the following propositions:

"1st. That for fifteen years prior to the commencement of the late war, the ordinary revenue of the Commonwealth has not only been adequate to meet the ordinary expenditures charged upon it, but to enable the Commonwealth to arm from time to time a large part of her militia—to lay the foundation of her literary fund, to erect several very costly public edifices, and to complete the purchase of the stock subscribed by the Commonwealth to the Bank of Virginia; objects which occasioned a disbursement from the ordinary revenue of a sum exceeding one million of dollars.

2ndly. That since the commencement of that war the revenue of the Commonwealth more than doubled by additional taxes and farther augmented by considerable loans from the bank, has not only sufficed for the ordinary possible expenditure, but enabled the legislature to assume the State's quota of the direct tax of 1814 and to apply to the defense of the United States a sum exceeding eighteen hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of the interest paid upon those loans.

"3rdly. That the Commonwealth has at present a claim upon the United States of unquestionable justice for more than seventeen hundred thousand dollars of the above amount, together with the interest on such portions of it at least as were obtained on loans, which claim when satisfied will furnish a sum competent to discharge all the debts of the Commonwealth, to provide for the expenditures of the current fiscal year and to leave at the end of that year a balance in the treasury of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars to be applied to any other object of internal interest.

"4thly. That the present taxes may be reduced to the amount levied before the late war, provided the United States shall reimburse the sums advanced for the defense of the Commonwealth; and even should the payment of those sums be withheld, which a just confidence in the good faith of the General Government forbids your committee to expect, a repeal may yet be effected of such proportions of the war taxes as are not absolutely pledged for the payment of the interest, and the redemption of the principal of the public debt.

"From all of which it evidently appears that the fund which it is proposed to apply to the purposes of internal improvement may be spared from the revenue of the Commonwealth without any embarrassment of her finances, any violation of her engagements or pressure upon her citizens.

"Should the appropriation recommended by the committee receive the sanction of the legislature, the fund for internal improvement will consist of the following stock:

"5,547 shares of stock of the Bank of Virginia on which a dividend is now received, which computed at par is worth five hundred and fifty-four thousand, seven hundred dollars	$554,700.00
"2,400 shares of the stock of the Bank of Virginia whereupon no dividend will accrue until after the first day of May, 1818.	240,000.00
"3,344 shares of the stock of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia	333,400.00
"250 shares of the stock of the James River Company, also estimated at par	50,000.00
"125 shares of the stock of the Appomattox Company	12,500.00
"70 shares of the stock of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company	17,500.00
"70 shares of the stock of the Potomac Company.	31,111.11-1-9
"100 shares of the stock of the Little River Turnpike Company	10,000.00
"Making a total of	$1,249,211.11-1-9

"Of which, the sum of $938,100 is now productive of an annual revenue exceeding $98,000; and $240,000 will become alike productive after the first day of May, 1818.

"In the present state of the fund the progress of the public works to which it may be expected to give rise will be until the first day of May, 1818, at the rate of $245,000 per annum. After that period it will be further augmented by the addition of $60,000.

"So that the total value of the internal improvements of ten years will be $2,777,500, and this calculation is grounded on a supposition that a portion of the stock which is now unproductive will continue to be so; and that no augmentation of the fund will have been made by the creation of new banks. * * * * *

"Be it therefore resolved"

* * * * * *

"8. That the president and directors of the Board of Public Works be authorized to subscribe in behalf of the Commonwealth to such public works as the General Assembly may from time to time agree to patronize such portions of the revenue from the fund for internal improvement as may be directed by law; but that no part of the fund shall be subscribed towards the stock of any canal or turnpike company until three-fifths at least of the whole stock necessary to complete such canal or turnpike shall have been otherwise subscribed; nor until of the stock so subscribed one-fifth shall have been paid in by the respective subscribers or the payment thereof effectually secured." (B. P. W. Reps., Vol. I, p. 55 and 59(11) .)

APPENDIX NO. II.

1st Annual Report Board of Public Works, for year 1816, Vol. 1, pt. 1 p. 81.

* * * * * * * * *

"The appeal which the board has thus made to the public spirit of the country has not been in vain. Great efforts have been made to fill the subscriptions for opening the navigation of the Roanoke."

* * * "There are several objects within the scope of the system devised by the General Assembly for the improvement of the interior of Virginia which in the present state of her wealth and population it is beyond the reach of her unassisted ability to accomplish; but which being equally interesting to her sister States and the Government of the United States, it may not be impossible to further by their co-operation."

"The failure of the stock of those companies which have already been incorporated to yield an immediate income to the subscribers is to be imputable to their tardy progress in building the works which they had begun; and delay which arose from their having commenced their labors with inadequate funds; and which discouraged new adventurers from uniting with them or hazarding their fortunes in similar enterprises.

"The foundation which the General Assembly have now laid for future works of this desscription is calculated to remove this impediment to their progress, and to assure to the Commonwealth a speedy return for such sums as the General Assembly may authorize the Board of Public Works to subscribe out of the funds for internal improvement.

"It is not in the power of the Board in the infancy of their institution to include in this report a detail of the report and condition of any public work commenced under the auspices of the act of their incorporation. With a view, however, of early arousing the enterprise and patriotism of their fellow citizens in general to embark their private fortunes in the career of internal improvement opened to them by the liberality of the General Assembly, the Board of Public Works adopted at their extraordinary session the accompanying resolution:

> " 'In a country so diversified as the territory of Virginia by rivers and mountains, possessing such a variety of staples and so many markets for their exploitation, the board could be expected to recommend to the General Assembly but a very small number of those public works which the future policy of Virginia may be inclined to patronize, and the fund for public internal improvements hereafter competent to aid:
> " 'To open the navigation of those rivers, penetrate deeply into the interior of the country; to unite by commercial and political ties the widely extended territory of the Commonwealth, are in the estimation of the board objects of the first magnitude in the scale of improvements contemplated by the General Assembly.'"

"That the making of an artificial road from Staunton to some point on the Ohio River in the county of Wood or Tyler is an object of great importance to the interests of this Commonwealth."

"That the making of an artificial road from some point on Jackson's River to some other point on the navigable waters of the Kanawha River and the extension of the navigation of those rivers as high up the same as practicable, are objects of great importance to the interests of this Commonwealth."

"Resolved, That the making of an artificial road from Salem in the county of Botetourt, to Winchester, is an object of great importance to the interests of this Commonwealth."

"Resolved, That the improvement of the navigation of the Monongalia River is an object of great importance to the interests of this Commonwealth."

"Resolved, That the making of an artificial road from Winchester to a point near the eastern base of the Alleghany Mountain, on the road which the Government of the United States is extending from Fort Cumberland to Wheeling, is an object of great importance to the interest of this Commonwealth."

"The report made pursuant to this instruction is now respectfully submitted marked 'N' and will enable the legislature to decide between the different modes of forming the connection;"—

"Much of the richest territory of the State is on the Kanawha and Ohio Rivers, a great proportion of which was granted in large tracts to individuals for military service, many of which tracts have been kept entire, and the greatest part of them remain unsettled to this day; this circumstance, combined with the sparse population of the counties through which the improvement was to be made, induces the belief that the usual contributions from individuals cannot be expected in that quarter of the country. It is therefore respectfully suggested that the salutary restriction that requires three-fifths of the stock to be taken by individuals be dispensed with or modified in this instance, or that the co-operation of capitalists may be drawn to the aid of this work by combining a more immediate and profitable employment of capital with its execution."

3rd Annual Report Board of Public Works, Vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 13, 1818.

"The president and directors of the Board of Public Works beg leave to submit to the legislature whether it is not expedient to appropriate such a portion of the income of the fund for internal improvement not exceeding one-fourth of the annual income, to the aid of turnpike companies, as that, while it shall produce an immediate advantage to many considerable districts of country which cannot otherwise receive any direct benefit from the fund, shall not obstruct the execution of other more important and extensive works. This policy seems to be recommended by the consideration that extensive districts cannot otherwise participate directly in the benefits of the fund, and that all the advantages arising from works on a small scale will be speedily realized.

"If the legislature should adopt this policy, then the board recommends to the patronage of the legislature"—

"The latter of these companies" (referring to the Leesburg Turnpike Company) "has also completed a considerable portion of the road, and a subscription by the Board of Public Works of $33,600, payable in four annual instalments, equal to two-fifths of the stock of the company, of which three-fifths are already taken by individuals, would enable them to complete the road. A statement of the situation of this company is subjoined."

"That experience has too fully and universally evidenced the great advantages resulting from good roads, for the transportation to market of the surplus products of a country, to render it necessary for them to enforce it by any remarks on their part, especially when addressing a body whose very name and the object of whose creation must satisfactorily indicate the growth and diffusion of liberal and enlarged views upon the propriety of internal improvement and the extinction of those prejudices which have but too long retarded a measure deeply involving the best interests of the Commonwealth. * * * *

"It is further resolved that it be made known to the said president and directors that upwards of one-fifth part of said road is now completed, and that this board are of the opinion that unless the said president and directors of the Board of Public Works shall aid in the completion of said road by subscribing two-fifths of the stock aforesaid, every exertion to produce the desired object must prove abortive, and the public be deprived of a great and important internal improvement."

* * * * * * * * *

"In reviewing the progress and condition of the various improvements now in process of execution under the patronage of the legislature, the Board of Public Works are inspired with a just confidence that the valuable and highly important objects for the attainment of which the fund for internal improvement was created, will be fully attained by a patient perseverance in the application of the daily increasing capital of the fund to those objects."

Supplement to same, idem p. 4, Statement of Thos. W. Randolph, pres. B. P. W.

* * * * * * * * *

"The subject is now mature for the decision of the legislature; and upon that depends what Virginia shall be twenty years hence; whether as now, or with a great and flourishing commerce, populous and wealthy cities, reoccupied plains on the east, and peopled mountains on the west, a connection founded on mutual interests with the great population of the Western States for the most part driven originally by want of profitable employment from her own territory; and the mighty influence such advantages cannot fail to create for the preservation of order, free principles and union in the confederacy."

5th Annual Rep. Board of Public Works, Vol. 2, pt. 5, p. 13, 1820.

"A review of the state of the fund and of the report of the principal engineer, together with the other reports accompanying this, affords gratifying proof that whilst the territory of the Commonwealth abounds with objects of valuable internal improvement in every district, the fund appropriated for that purpose is adequate, upon the principles upon which it is founded, to give effectual aid to such improvements to the full extent of the demands which can probably be made upon it; and that several public works of great importance to extensive districts of the State are under the patronage of the legislature rapidly advancing to completion which, without such patronage, might have languished for years, and perhaps have been wholly abandoned."

9th Annual Rep. Board Public Works Vol. 4, p. 168, 1824. (In re improvements on Kanawha River).

"Your committee cannot close this report without calling the attention of the legislature to the growing importance of the salt trade upon the Kanawha River. At a very early period of this great undertaking, this subject engaged the attention of the legislature; and whilst the magnitude of those manufacturies, yielding at this time about one million bushels of salt per annum, promised a large revenue to the Commonwealth, a reciprocal advantage was expected to accrue to them in the increased facilities of their carriage to their markets upon the Ohio River.

"We cannot, if we would, disguise it from ourselves that Virginia, if not deteriorating, is certainly not advancing with the same rapidity as many of her sister States of this Union. Her population is passing to the West, contributing by their wealth and industry to raise up new and as yet unknown interests in that important part of the United States. It is in this point of view, as your committee conceive, that this subject becomes most deeply interesting, and regarding this great chain of improvement as a social link uniting the East and West, it deserves the highest consideration of Virginia."

"But few of the stocks of the canal and turnpike companies acquired by the application of the income of the fund, under the acts of the General Assembly and the resolutions of the board, as yet pay any dividend, and the revenue derived from that source is at present very inconsiderable. The appropriations made to companies with which this board has thus become connected, though unproductive of revenue, have not failed in producing a good effect."

" A spirit of improvement, it is believed, has been excited in some sections of our State where none existed before; and the assistance afforded in several instances has led to the undertaking of improvements which otherwise would not have been commenced and could not have been accomplished. The board, however, entertains the expectation that in addition to the benefit thus conferred, a revenue will in time be derived which will enable it to extend the sphere of its utility."

"Although it was not the original purpose of the legislature in creating the fund for internal improvement that the aid to be extended to joint stock companies should be afforded upon the principle of mere money making, yet its productiveness cannot fail to be gratifying not only as yielding income, and thus enlarging the capability of the fund for extended usefulness, but particularly as affording conclusive proof of the beneficial application of its income in the execution of important work."

"There are other companies with whom the fund for internal improvement stands connected whose prospects, though not so bright, are nevertheless encouraging. There are yet some others whose reports scarcely justify the faint expectations of even deferred income from the capital expended, but whose work nevertheless affords important facilities to the trade of extensive and fertile districts of the State, and thus contributes to the general weal.

"This view of the condition and prospects of the companies who have been arduously engaged in making extensive and valuable improvements in our country, and to whom the aid of this fund is extended, is presented not only to excite attention to the certain and contingent advantages of such improvements, but also to repress, as fas as practicable, that spirit of impatience which so frequently manifests itself throughout the country by murmurs at the tardiness and the expense with which the works are prosecuted, and that the unprofitableness of the public investments. These murmurs seemed to indicate the idle expectation that these great public works ought to be conducted as rapidly as the ordinary operations of a farm, and a belief that the public investments are made upon the principles of common stock jobbing."

"This spirit of impatience opposes all its energies to that public spirit which should animate every community in its march to high prosperity. The latter ought to be cherished as being of inestimable value, while the former ought to be suppressed as tending to desolation only. Although it is far from being desirable that the stocks subscribed by the Board of Public Works, under the direction of the General Assembly, should be unproductive of income, yet if the enhancement of real and other property in the country be equal in amount to the investment made, the community has surely lost nothing, and if the enhancement be indefinitely greater, so also is the common benefit. That such enhancement does occur in every commmunity where the improvements of the country are vigorously prosecuted, is abundantly and irrefragibly demonstrated by the experience of Pennsylvania, New York, and New England, where lands naturally less valuable command a price from four to ten times greater than they do in Virginia; and although their public stocks should yield them no income, yet the communities are otherwise benefited by them in a ratio of arithmetical progression. Public spirit and due perception of common and mutual interest is the great desideratum in Virginia. Were it to awaken, it would readily find subjects of improvement munificently spread before them. Surely, no country possesses greater capabilities than Virginia."

"This prosperous state of the fund, combined with the increased solicitude of the public on the subject of internal improvements, a solicitude created by the real necessities that exist for the construction of various improvements throughout the State, and which has been heightened by the example of some of the neighboring States who have been guided by an enlightened and liberal policy on this subject, has urged on the Board of Public Works an inquiry into the capacity of the fund of internal improvement to complete the works already commenced and to construct such others as the interests of the public may render necessary. In administering the fund to the wants of so extensive a country, presenting great varieties of situation, soil, and products, with a population in some instances separated by mountains and forests, any uniform rule founded upon the principles of justice and equality seems to be impracticable.

"If the principle of only applying the funds in combination with individuals in the form of stock companies, according to the provisions of the eleventh section of the act creating the fund, should be adopted and adhered to, the consequence would be that the energies of the fund will be exhausted upon local objects of partial benefit and extent, to be found most generally in such parts of the State where the population has already acquired sufficient surplus wealth to enable them to embark in such enterprises, and where the end to be gained is the advancement of individual interest rather than the public good. On the other hand, if only the income that arises upon the capital stock or investments of the fund is to be applied as it annually accrues, the amount is totally insufficient to effect any extended scheme of improvement commensurate with the great interests of the State.

"The act creating the fund contemplated the 'rendering navigable and uniting by canals of the principal rivers, and of more intimately connecting, by public highways, different parts of the Commonwealth.' The objects embraced by it are so extensive and important in their nature as to be excluded from the reach of individual enterprise and capital; besides it may happen that improvements are required essential to the best interests of the country, but from which no direct income will be realized, although the State would be abundantly remunerated by the stimulous it would give to industry by the development of new sources of wealth, by enhancing the value of lands, and by the increase of population, thereby adding to the moral and physical ability of the State to sustain itself in time of war and peace."

"In connection with the subject of railroads, the board respectfully begs leave to submit the following remarks:

"It is well known that the capital of all our railroad companies proved to be entirely insufficient to complete the formation of the roadbeds and superstructure and to provide depots, work-shops, engines and all other necessary appendages for carrying on the business of the roads. It is equally well known that much of the capital was wasted in consequence of the necessarily imperfect knowledge of the subject which was possessed by engineers at the time of the introduction of railroads into the United States; and partly owing to neglect and want of economy, method and proper supervision in the transaction and management of their affairs at the outset and for some time after.

"The result has generally been that the companies have found the aid so liberally extended to them in the shape of loans very inadequate to their real necessity. They are mostly still involved in heavy debts, exclusive of those to the State, and the urgent demands upon them for the payment of principal and interest which they are compelled to meet promptly in order to keep their works in operation, absorb their profits to such an extent as to deprive them, in a great measure, of the ability to keep the roadbeds and the motive power, and so forth, upon them in the perfect order they should be to insure regularity, safety and expedition.

"It must be remembered that these improvements were not fostered by the legislature through contributions in subscription and loans merely as investments of so much money in profitable stocks, but that they were actuated by a higher consideration, that of promoting the prosperity of the State at large by contracting to build up the local prosperity of its different sections." (Italics not in original.)

"That the most beneficial results have been experienced by every railroad that has been established is not a matter of conjecture. Industry has received from them a new impetus. The cultivation of the soil in every part of the country within the range of their influence has been greatly extended; arts, trades, and commerce flourish to a greater extent, and a greater reduction has been effected in the expense of transporting the produce of the farmer and the goods of the merchant to market, and a speedy and cheap transportation between the citizens of our own State with each other and with the citizens of other States has been established. * * * * *

EXTRACTS FROM ACTS OF ASSEMBLY OF VIRGINIA WITH REFERENCE TO EXPENDITURES FOR INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT, THROUGH JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.

CHAP. XVII.

An Act to create a fund for Internal Improvement.

[Passed February 5th, 1816.]

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That a fund shall be, and the same is hereby created, to be denominated "The Fund for Internal Improvement," and to be applied, exclusively, to the purpose of rendering navigable, and uniting by canals, the principal rivers and of more intimately connecting by the public highways, the different parts of this Commonwealth.

* * * * * * * * *

3. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of preserving and improving this fund, and of disbursing such portions of it as the General Assembly may, from time to time, direct, to be applied to any object of internal improvement, it shall be and the same is hereby vested in a corporate body, to be styled, "The President and Directors of the Board of Public Works" in which name they shall have a common seal, and perpetual succession, subject to the limitation hereinafter provided, shall be capable of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded, and shall have and enjoy all the rights and privileges of a corporation.

4. And be it further enacted, That the Governor of the Commonwealth shall be ex-officio President of the Board of Public Works; that the directors a majority of whom shall constitute a Board for the transaction of any business devolving on the corporation, shall consist of the Treasurer and the Attorney General of the Commonwealth, for the time being, and of ten citizens thereof; of whom three shall reside westward of the Alleghany mountain; two between the Alleghany and the Blue Ridge; three between the Blue Ridge and the great post road, which, passing through the territory of the Commonwealth, crosses the principal rivers thereof at, or about the head of tidewater, and the residue between that road and the sea coast.

8. And be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works shall hold an annual meeting in the City of Richmond, or at such other place as may be designated by law, to begin on the first Monday in November of every year, and to continue until the business of the board is transacted—But, that the President of the Board may, at his own pleasure, or shall, at the request of any three Directors thereof, convene an extra meeting of the Board, for the transaction of any extraordinary business which may devolve on the corporation.

* * * * * * * *

10. And be it further enacted, That the fund for internal improvement, subject to the order of the President and Directors of the board, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the Commonwealth and kept distinct and apart from all other public money: It shall be paid out or delivered by the Treasurer of the Commonwealth to the order of the board, certified and subscribed by the Secretary, and countersigned by the President; that the Treasurer shall keep a fair and regular account of all such disbursements, and carefully preserve the certificates upon which the same shall have been made, and shall render an account thereof, to the General Assembly, at the same time at which he renders his annual account of the disbursements of the ordinary revenue; that once in every year the Board of Public Works shall depute a committee of their body to examine the accounts of all disbursements made by order of the board, during the year next preceding the annual meeting of the board, and to compare these accounts with the Treasurer's books, and the certificates giving authority for the payment of the several sums of money, or stock, entered therein; that their reports shall certify to the board, that the same have been fully accounted for, or otherwise, as the case may be.

11. And be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works, shall be, and they are hereby authorized to subscribe in behalf of the Commonwealth, to such Public Works as the General Assembly may, from time to time, agree to patronize, such portions of the revenue of the fund for internal improvement, as may be directed by law but that no part of the said fund shall be subscribed towards the stock of any canal, turnpike, or other Company, until three-fifths at least of the whole stock, necessary to complete such canal, turnpike, or other public work, of such company, shall have been otherwise subscribed; nor until, of the stock subscribed, one-fifth thereof shall have been actually paid in by the respective subscribers, or the payment thereof effectually secured by bond with approved security, or a deed of trust upon the real estate of such subscriber, of twice the value of such fifth part; such bond to be taken payable to the President, Directors and Company authorized to complete such public work, and to be recoverable against the obligor or his securities, on motion ofter ten day's notice, in any court of record within the Commonwealth having jurisdiction thereof; and such deed of trust to be proceeded upon whenever the trustee therein named shall be required to do so by such President, Directors and Company

13. And be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works shall vest in some productive fund the unappropriated dividends accruing upon any of the stock committed to their charge, until the same shall be specially applied by law to some object of internal improvement; and shall have power subject to the control of the General Assembly, to sell, from time to time, as may be ordained by law, the whole or any part of the shares held by the Commonwealth, in the stock of any canal, turnpike or other company subscribed for under the provisions of this Act, for the purpose of investing the proceeds of sale in the stock of some other similar company, subject to the like conditions as have been before expressed in this Act.

14. Be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works shall have power to appoint, in behalf of the Commonwealth, so many directors of every Public Work, as shall bear to the whole number of the directors of such work the proportion of the Commonwealth's shares of stock in such work, which may be subscribed in pursuance of this Act, to the whole number of shares subscribed thereto; provided, however, that whenever it shall be found expedient by the Legislature to authorize the subscription of any part of the fund hereby created to any company already incorporated, the provisions of this section shall not be construed as applying to such company unless it be otherwise directed by the Act authorizing the subscription.

15. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President and Directors of the Board of Public Works, to keep a fair and accurate record of all their proceedings, which shall be at all times open to the inspection of the members of the General Assembly, and of the President, Directors and other officers of any company interested therein; that they shall report to the General Assembly, at or near the commencement of every annual session thereof, the exact state of the fund for internal improvement; the progress and condition, noting especially the net income, of all the public works within the Commonwealth; the surveys, plans and estimated expense of such new works as they may recommend to the patronage of the General Assembly, together with such other important information as they may have it in their power to collect, in relation to the objects committed to their trust.

16. And be it further enacted, That the public faith shall be and the same is hereby solemnly pledged to fulfill the appropriation made by this Act; and that the said appropriation shall continue in force until the first day of January, of the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, except at such times as the United States of America may be involved in war, or the safety of this Commonwealth may, in the opinion of the General Assembly require; when the General Assembly may withdraw (during the period of actual hostilities, or of such imminent danger), the whole or any part of the said fund for the purpose of defense; provided such withdrawal can be made without a violation of any engagement entered into under this Act.

17. This Act shall commence and be in force from and after the passage thereof.

APPENDIX III.

Extract from brief filed on behalf of West Virginia, with the Attorney General of the United States, by Hon. Alfred Caldwell, former Attorney General, and Hon. E. W. Wilson, former Governor of West Virginia, upon the question of the right of the United States to set off any claim against West Virginia on bonds of the Commonwealth of Virginia acquired by the United States before the formation of West Virginia, against the claim of West Virginia against the United States for a refund of the Direct War Tax.

* * * * * *

"Upon the adoption of the ordinance of secession, by the Virginia Convention, in April, 1861, the Wheeling Convention which, June 11, 1861, had assembled for the reorganization of the government of Virginia after adopting an ordinance for such reorganization, proceeded to, and did, August 20, 1861, adopt 'An ordinance to provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State.'

Section 3 of said ordinance provided for changing the boundaries of the proposed new State, so as to include other counties therein named, among which were Jefferson and Berkeley, upon a favorable majority vote by the people of said counties, respectively.

Section 9 of said ordinance is as follows:

'The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period.'

From this proposition West Virginia has never receded. She proposed to be, was taken, received and admitted as a State of the Union, by the Congress of the United States, with this provision as of the basis of settlement with the State of Virginia. The government of the United States is the creator of the new State, and is therefore precluded absolutely, and under any possible contingency from avoiding the provisions of this ordinance, in order to retain West Virginia's money. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided this ordinance to be binding as between Virginia, West Virginia and the United States. Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall, 39.

* * * * * * * * *

The public debt of Virginia, January 1, 1861, was incurred almost exclusively in works of public improvement, railroads, turnpikes, canals, bridges, etc., and amounted to $31,779,067.32.

Of this sum there was incurred for public improvements in West Virginia, $2,784,329.29; for all other expenditures in West Virginia $559,600.00, making a total of $3,343,929.29.

The commission, summarizing from the various tabulated statements, strike the following account between the two States.

West Virginia to the State of Virginia,		Dr.

Under the resolutions creating and defining the duties of this commission, its report was made subject to the approval and ratification of the Legislatures of West Virginia and Virginia.

Under resolutions introduced into the Senate of West Virginia, the finance committee thereof made further examination of the matter, in 1873, and reported to the Senate the result of its labors. Hon. J. M. Bennett, a member of the commission heretofore mentioned, was Chairman of this Senate Committee. Its report appears in the appendix. We quote the following:

> 'The report of the debt commissioners hereinbefore referred to, shows that all State expenditures within this State, prior to January, 1861, amounted to $3,366,929.29, and although it is apparent that bonds for quite a large amount of this sum were never issued, nevertheless the expenditures would seem to import an obligation upon our people to return every dollar which has been so contributed to the development of the territory of our State.
> 'The committee have not entered into the tedious process of calculating the interest, for the obvious reason that there would be as much interest on our contributions, as upon the receipts from Virginia.
>
> 'The committee have therefore assumed the foregoing sum of $3,366,929.29 as importing a debt upon West Virginia to be gathered and itemized from the report of the debt commissioners aforesaid.
>
> 'From the amount of the foregoing expenditures must be deducted the moneys paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth of Virginia from the counties included in this State during the same period." * * * * * *

(Extracted from pamphlet presenting West Virginia's claim for the refund of the U. S. Direct War Tax, pp. 5 and 6.)

NOTE.—There were palpable errors in the ex parte statement of the account between the two States, contained in the reports referred to and approved in the above brief, in crediting West Virginia with items for which she could claim no credit under the Wheeling Ordinance under which those statements of that account were attempted to be made, and in failing to charge West Virginia with its "just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government" and other items of charge expressly required to be made by that Ordinance.

With these corrections made, the account would show as large a balance due from West Virginia as Virginia has now shown in this suit to be due by the new State.

DEPARTMENT OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.

T. S. ADAMS. Nov. 5, 1909.

Honorable Wm. A. Anderson,
Attorney General of Virginia,
Richmond, Virginia.

My dear Sir:

Some time ago Dr. Ely referred to me a letter from yourself concerning the question of ordinary and extraordinary expenditures. While I of course had some general knowledge of the distinction between these two terms, as used in the budget of various countries, my knowledge on the subject was not of that specific and certain character which your problem demands. It was necessary for me to do some reading and make some examinations of authorities before I could make the reply which I herewith enclose. It is very imperfect and I particularly regret that I have not had time to go through the material in our library containing the public accounts of the various States and cities of this country. I am doubtful also whether what I have written will be of any material assistance to you, but I enclose it, hoping that it may contain a suggestion or two.

Our collection of public documents in the University Library is particularly good; and if you can wait a month or so and will express the desire to have it, I will endeavor to get some student to run through this material with a view to collecting as large a number as possible of illustrations bearing upon the use of the terms 'ordinary' and 'extraordinary' in American public accounting.

Very truly yours,

TSA/EB (Signed) T. S. ADAMS.

ORDINARY AND EXTRAORDINARY EXPENDITURES.

Ordinary expenditures are usual expenditures. What is usual in one country is not usual in another, and what is usual in a given country at one time may be unusual at another time. We should therefore except to find, and, as a matter of fact, we do find, all sorts of expenditures included in the extraordinary budgets of various countries. Precedent can be found for almost anything. In France, for example, since 1833, the substance of the extraordinary budget has consisted of expenditures for the establishment of great public works, but prior to 1789 the costs of establishing and improving public works were carried in the ordinary budget.

The best treatment of this general subject is found in Wagner's 'Finanzwissenschaft,' Vol. 1, p. 135-142. Great authority is to be accorded to this treatment, inasmuch as Wagner bases what he has to say not only upon economic theory and study of the law, but upon the experience of the greater European nations. According to Wagner, there is a three-fold distinction between ordinary and extraordinary expenditures:

1. The first distinction turns upon the time at which the expenditure becomes necessary. Extraordinary expenditures from this viewpoint arise out of unexpected demands. Wagner notes, however, that in a great state the great number of trivial or small items of expense which are unforseen assume, in the aggregate, a certain regularity which makes it possible to provide for them by a contingent or reserve fund. Although Wagner refers to these items as 'diese kleinen Posten ausserordenlicher Ausgeben,' he really suggests that they should, in the aggregate, be regarded as regular of ordinary expenses; while the individual items are not foreseeable, their aggregate is.

II. The second and most important distinction turns upon the durability or permanence of service for which the expenditure is made and rests upon a contract similar to that made in private economics between circulating and fixed capital.

Under ordinary expenses here, Wagner mentions interest on the public debt and his language suggests that payments on the principal of the public debt when made periodically or annually in accordance with the terms of the loan should also be included among the ordinary expenses (although he protests that there is no general economic principle which requires the regular payment of a public debt).

(It will be noted that under the first distinction which turns upon the certainty or accuracy with which an expense may be anticipated, interest payments are even more clearly and logically included among the ordinary expenses, because no expense is more certain or more specifically fixed with respect to time than that of interest payment).

The extraordinary expenditures under this head are those regular or intermittent expenditures for things whose use or service extends over far more than one fiscal year or period. Wagner distinguishes three special groups here:

1. Capital outlays giving rise to a lasting use, either for—

(a) quasi-private industries and undertakings capable of yielding profit to the State (e. g., forests, railroads, mines, postal and telegraph systems;

(b) or for the establishment and betterment of what may be called the 'immaterial capital of the state' (e. g., expenditures for the introduction and execution of great public reforms such as the land cadastre, reconstruction of judicial system, enfranchisement of serfs, etc.)

2. Irregular productive and remedial expenditures to correct conditions which threaten the life or property of the State, (e. g., war, famine, floods, insurrection, etc.)

"The fact that Wagner nowhere mentions expenditures for hospitals, insane asylums, prisons, etc., is significant and indicates a belief on his part that they are 'ordinary' expenses."

III. The third distinction is the purely legal one and corresponds for the most part to the well-known difference between standing and annual appropriations.

Wagner mentions here as the most characteristic items of ordinary or standing expenses, payments of interest on the public debt and the payments of such parts of the principal as are regularly retired in accordance with the terms of the loan. Legislative expenses (i. e., those necessary for the assembling and functioning of the legislature) furnish another characteristic item.

(It seems difficult to imagine how any claim can be made for the inclusion of interest payments among the extraordinary expenditures. Borrowing, with its necessary corrolary of regular interest payments, is the specific device by which irregular things are made regular, unbearably heavy burdens divided into those which may be borne with ease; and as surely as the principal of the loan is to be classed among extraordinary receipts, so surely must the interest payments be classed among the ordinary expenditures. Interest is the instrument by which extraordinary difficulties are converted into ordinary problems. (øSee foot note.)

øThe last point is well brought out in the article entitled Budget sur Resources Extraordinaires in Say's Dictionnaire des Finances, Vol. I, p. 723:

'Ce n'est que de notre temps qu'il a été institué une théorie pour la défense des Budgets Extraordinaires systématiques. Les budgets ordinaires sont, dit-on, les budgets de la vie normale et annuelle du pays, son compte industriel d'exploitation, et ont l'impôt et les revenus des biens de l'Etat pour fonds d'entretien; les budgets extraordinaires répondent à leur compte industriel de premier establissement, indefiniment continué comme se continue indefiniment l'expansion de l'activité d'un peuple qui vit de siécles et non d'annéss et son fonds de service est l'emprunt, dont le budget ordinaire ne se ressent que par l'obligation ou il est d'en payer les intérêts pour la part de jouissance qui lui en revient.'

The country which has, perhaps, made the widest use of the extraordinary budget is France. The experience of France is discussed in a most illuminating way in Chapters 9 and 10 of René Stourm's 'Le Budget.' We find here a number of definitions of an official character. One of these definitions, made in 1862 and often quoted in French law and financial debate, is as follows:

'The credits of the ordinary budget ought to provide for the obligatory and permanent services of the State, assuring the payment of the debt, the execution of the laws, the administration of justice, collection of revenues, and the public defense,' p. 176.

The public debt included in the ordinary budget covers the consolidated, perpetual bonds and annuities, all kinds of terminable bonds and annuities, and 'la debt viagere' (Pensions, life annuities, etc.)'

The definition of 'extraordinary' expenditures made by the same author in 1862 is as follows:

(The extraordinary expenditures comprehend those for great public works, new constructions, abnormal military demands required for the protection of our exterior or foreign interests; in a word, all those expenditures corresponding to monetary needs and destined to disappear ought not to figure among the permanent charges.) Stourm, p. 196.

See foot note.ø

øThe comment of the then Minister of Finance, M. Magne, upon this definition is exceedingly illuminating, p. 196, Stourm.

'En général, on ne prend pas assez garde aux différents rôles de L'Etat. En même temps qu'il est tenu de solder, avec ses ressources ordinaires, ses dépenses courantes . . . . en même temps, il est propriétaire, il a un actif immobilier et mobilier, qu'il est tenu, non seulement d'entretenir, mais de perfectionner, dans l'intérét de tous et de chacun. Lorsque L'Etat se procure une ressource, par voie extraordinaire, par voie d'emprunts, et que cette ressource, est appliqée à cette nature de dépenses, il ne fait qu'un placement, qu'une transformation de valeur, il augments la fortune immobiliére et mobiliére de chacun. Ainsi donc, on a raison de ne pas confondre ces deux natures de dépenses, les unes, qui sont fongibles, qui disparaissent, le laissent à l'avenir ni charges, ni résultats; celles, au contraire, qui se consolident, qui s'incorporent au sol, qui augmentent la fortune de l'Etat . . . .' Corps legislatif, 6 avril 1869.

Finally it may be interesting to summarize the great French minister de Freycinet's discussion of this subject.

M. de Freycinet's divided extraordinary expenditures into three classes, Necessary, Optional, and Illegitimate.

A. "The necessary expenses are those which result from events which it is not within the power of nations to prevent or at least the financial consequences of which it is impossible to avoid, as, for example, the war of 1870 and the enormous fiscal burdens which it has entailed upon the country."

B. "The optional expenses represent essentially expenses for public works. I characterize these expenses as optional because they do not inevitably impose themselves upon a country. The government is never forced absolutely to assume these expenses and especially is never obliged to assume them at any particular time."

C. "I call all those expenses illegitimate which ought to find no place at all in the extraordinary budget. When the extraordinary budget comes to be but a covert means of increasing the ordinary budget, I consider that the expenditure is badly placed and that the extraordinary budget ought to be abolished. The extraordinary budget should not serve as a revenue for those expenses that one does not wish or dare to classify in the ordinary budget but which by their nature belong there." Stourm, p. 204.

There have, for instance, been included in the extraordinary budget at times expenditures for books for the library, gratuities to the employees of the central administration, relief to widows, expenditures for the celebration of July 14th, and for carpenter's work, subscriptions to telephone companies, provision of oil for light houses, etc.

The preceding paragraph merely emphasizes my opening statement to the effect that precedent may be found for almost anything in this connection. But, while this is true, the great weight of usage favors the inclusion among the extraordinary expenditures, of the costs of war and public calamity (which, because of their size, have to be defrayed by public loans) and also the costs of introducing or establishing great public works of an industrial character. Capital outlays for hospitals, asylums, prisons, educational institutions, and the like, are exceedingly doubtful. But it may be said with certainty that according to the prevailing usage, only such (i. e., for hospitals, asylums and the like) capital outlays as necessitate public loans can be placed among extraordinary expenditures. Interest payments on the public debt, regular payments on the principal prescribed in advance either by law or contract, and pensions, belong, by the overwhelming mass of precedent, among ordinary expenditures.

I append a few scattering illustrations which may be of interest.

(1) The budget of the German Empire is regularly divided into ordinary and extraordinary receipts and expenditures. The ordinary expenditures are divided into permanent and temporary. The regular expenditures for industrial undertakings, (post, telegraph, railroads, government printing offices, etc.) as well as most of the expenditures for the public debt and for pensions, appear under the permanent ordinary expenditures.

(2) The budget of Algeria regularly contains the following caption: Depenses extraordinaires, subdivided into the two following heads: (a) Emploi des fonds d'empreunt, (b) Emploi de L'excédent des fonds de reserve. Among the other and presumably the "ordinary" heads, we find debt, public works, agriculture, colonization, and diverse works of benevolence and public utility (poor relief, etc.)

(3) The budgets of Austria and Hungary regularly contain the item extraordinary expenditures. Just what this covers I do not know, but it has been reduced to very small compass in recent years, particularly in Austria. Expenditure for public debt, however, including regular payments on the principal of the debt, is included in the ordinary budget.

(4) Payments of interest and the regular payments on the principal of the public debt are classified in the ordinary expenditures in Belgium.

(5) In Egypt, according to a brief resume of the budget given in Fenn "On the Funds," edition of 1898, p. 323, the following expenditures appear in ordinary budget: Pensions, tribute, debt payment, expenses of the army of occupation, expenditures for the "suppression of the corvee," and "unforseen expenditures."

(6) According to the same authority, the Russian budget includes under ordinary expenditures, payments on the State debt—interest and capital—payments on the railway debt—interest and capital—and also "unforseen expenditures."

(7) Professor F. R. Clow, an exceedingly able and careful writer in the Quarterly Journal of Economics, Vol. 10, pages 461-4, cites as instances of extraordinary expenditures payments for the purchase of land, for the construction of permanent works, and the redemption of public debt. Under the ordinary expenditures, he includes interest payments on the public debt. According to Professor Clow, the accounts of the City of Cleveland, at the time he was writing, included under ordinary expenditures everything except repayment of loans, refunds, investments, and similar items."

BRIEF ON BEHALF OF THE BONDHOLDING CREDITORS OF VIRGINIA TO REPLY TO PART III OF BRIEF FOR DEFENDANT.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

OCTOBER TERM, 1910.

Original, No. 3.

vs.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

BRIEF ON BEHALF OF THE BONDHOLDING CREDITORS OF VIRGINIA TO REPLY TO PART III OF BRIEF FOR DEFENDANT.

Part III of defendant's brief was not filed until after the close of the argument at the bar, and leave was allowed to reply thereto.

For brevity sake I will refer to it hereafter as Senator Spooner's brief.

Taking up his points in the order in which they are presented in his brief the first one is:

> "This court has never decided that it is a settled rule of public law that where a State is divided into two or more States, in the adjustment of liabilities between each other, the debts of the parent State should be ratably apportioned among them."

It is not altogether apparent whether the Senator intends to lay stress on the word "decided," and thereby imply that the declaration made by Justice Field, in Hartman vs. Greenhow, was merely obiter dictum, or whether he means to assert that the rule as stated by Justice Field is not in accordance with the statement of the rule as usually made by writers on public or international law and by other accepted authorities.

If he means that the declaration of Justice Field was not pertinent and material to the judgment of the court, whose opinion and judgment he was announcing, a brief reference to the case will determine that.

In Hartman vs. Greenhow, 102 U. S., on page 674, it is said:

> "The principal question for determination, as thus seen, is the validity of the statute of the State requiring the tax levied upon its bonds to be deducted from the coupons for interest, originally attached to them, when the coupons are presented for payment, so far as it applies to coupons separated from the bonds and held by different persons.
>
> "To fully understand this question, it will be necessary to make a brief reference to the legislation of the State upon her indebtedness."

And then, after discussing a question of jurisdiction that lay in the way, the opinion proceeds (on page 676):

> "We proceed, therefore, to consider the legislation of the State upon her indebtedness. A brief sketch of it will perhaps enable us better than in any other way to exhibit the question for our determination, and indicate the solution it should receive."

So it is manifest that a consideration of all the legislation of the State upon her indebtedness was recognized as essential to a proper determination of the matter in hand.

The holder of the coupon for interest presented it to the tax collector in payment of taxes due by him, and the tax collector declined to receive it.

If the holder had a right to insist that his coupon should be received in payment of his taxes, that right accrued to him only under the act of March 30, 1871, known as the "Funding Act."

By that act the State had undertaken to apportion her public debt into two parts. One part, amounting to two-thirds of the entire debt, was estimated to be the proper share to be borne by Virginia, and for this amount Virginia gave to the original bondholder her new bond with six per cent interest, evidenced by the coupons attached to the new bond, and provided that these coupons should be received by the State in payment of any taxes or dues to the State, and this was written on the face of the coupon.

The other part of the debt, amounting to the remaining one-third, was estimated to be the proper share to be borne by West Virginia as her just or equitable share of the public debt, and for this amount the bondholder received from the State a certificate setting forth the amount of the bond not funded, with interest thereon, and that payment thereof would be provided for in accordance with such settlement as might be subsequently had between the two States, and that Virginia would hold the bond so surrendered, so far as it was not funded, in trust for the holder or his assignees.

Suppose this court in its consideration of all the statutes and the history of the case had found that in 1861 the two States had by a solemn, valid compact, made between them, agreed that West Virginia's share of this public debt should be ascertained in accordance with the plan prescribed in the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance. It must then have held that the act of 1871, which had estimated West Virginia's share to be one-third of the whole debt, and had proceeded to make a settlement on that basis, was in violation of the obligation of the contract made between the two States in 1861, and that said act was, for that reason, void and of no effect, and instead of reversing the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Virginia it would have affirmed it, although not on the grounds stated by the lower court.

It did, however, reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, and it did so for the reasons stated by Justice Field. These reasons embraced the plan of ascertainment of West Virginia's share, in accordance with the doctrines of public or international law, as stated in the opinion of the court, and without the statement of that doctrine the decision would have been meaningless and pointless.

Hence we conclude the statement of that doctrine, in the opinion of the court, was not obiter, but relevant, material and essential to the decision announced.

II.

Senator Spooner's second point is thus stated:

> "It can hardly be accurately said that it is a settled rule of international law, that where a State is divided into one or more States, the debt of the parent State, retaining its personality with diminished territory and resources, is, in the absence of special agreement, to be ratably apportioned between them."

To this version of the rule we readily assent, and we do not remember to have seen the rule so stated by any writer. Indeed, one obvious objection to the rule as stated and oppugned by the Senator, is the serious difficulty that lies in the premise of "dividing a State into one State," and this difficulty is not removed by the alternative of "or more States." But, assuming that what is meant is "dividing a State into 'two or more States,'" and that Justice Fields' statement of the rule, in this form, is challenged, we are prepared to vindicate Justice Fields' accuracy, and to maintain that in this form his statement of the rule is supported by reason and authority.

Whether or not a rule of law exists, and what is its exact form of expression, can be ascertained only by resort to those sources of information that are usually relied on as authoritative and controlling.

Senator Spooner appears to rely on Captain Edwin F. Glenn, U. S. A., as one of such sources, who, in his "Handbook of International Law," does indeed state, as his view, that > "Treaties of alliance, of guaranty, or of commerce, are not binding upon the new State, nor is it liable for the general debt of the parent State."

This statement, so far as it embraces treaties of alliance, of guaranty, or of commerce, is to be found in all the writers; the additon, "Nor is it liable for the general debt of the parent State," is Captain Glenn's own original discovery. He cites as his authority Hall's Int. Law, 96-97, and he also cites Kent Comm., 25, where this addition does not appear; but he accounts for its non-appearance by the comment on Chancellor Kent's version of the rule that "this is true in the one case of the State so splitting up into parts as to completely lose its identity," which, he intimates, was overlooked by Chancellor Kent.

With Captain Hall's work, as the result of the lucubrations of a young army officer emulous of the fame of General Halleck, we are disposed to be liberal; but, for all practical purposes, we are inclined to prefer as our guide that "Digest of International Law of the United States, Taken from Documents Issued by Presidents, and Secretaries of State, and from Decisions of Federal Courts, and Opinions of Attorneys General, Edited by Francis Wharton, in Three Volumes, Washington, Government Printing Office, 1886," where, in volume 1, page 19, the rule is thus stated:

> "In the event of a State being divided into two or more independent sovereignties, the obligations which had accrued to the whole before the division > are ratably binding on the different parts; for, as Story says, 'The division of an empire creates no forfeiture of previously vested rights of property.' And so, eo converso, where several separate States are incorporated into one sovereignty, the rights and obligations that belonged to each before the union are binding upon the new State; but, as General Halleck points out, of course the rule must be modified to suit the nature of the union formed and the characters of the act of incorporation in each particular case."

And again quoting from authorities it is said:

> "In the separation and rearrangement of nations in Europe, special provisions are usually made for the payment of public debts; and the principle seems admitted that, in case of a division of a State, each new State is bound for the whole debt contracted by the former; and in case of a union of States, it seems equally clear that as the whole must defend the part in war, which is the international process of attachment it must practically pay the debt, although the foreign power may look only to the people and land of the State which made the contract. The formation of the new States so alters the nature of all securities the creditor looked to, that the new State has a general obligation to see that he does not suffer by the change."
> Ibid., p. 22.

We may be excused from following with acute nicety the views of Mr. Hall and the other English and Continental writers so profusely quoted by Senator Spooner when we find those of Wheaton, Kent, Halleck, and other American writers adopted by the Secretary of State, the Attorneys-General of the United States, and the Federal courts, so admirably compiled, arranged and digested by Dr. Francis Wharton, and found to be so entirely in accord.

A clever review of this work of Dr. Wharton appeared in the Edinburgh Review, and was reprinted in the Littell's Living Age for August 27, 1887. The reviewer said:

> "So that whilst the book contains definite propositions of international law and conduct, as laid down by American judges and statesmen, and, in this sense is essentially a digest of international law, it is at the same time, a collection of public documents and extracts of the highest historical value. But at present we are wholly without such a work as that before us, and the student of international law in this country, has only the ponderous and comprehensive work of Sir Robert Phillimore, or the more concise and elementary work by Mr. Hall, together with other works of a similar character, or monographs on some special subject."

From which we may infer that Dr. Wharton's digest is regarded even in Great Britain as the best work on the subject of international law.

Mr. Hannis Taylor is referred to by Senator Spooner as an author "quoted in the brief of counsel for the bondholding creditors." It is hardly noteworthy, but it would have been perhaps more accurate to have said "quoted in the brief of counsel for West Virginia, and commented on in the brief of counsel for the bondholding creditors," because the only ground that counsel for the creditors had for referring to Mr. Taylor was to show that he appeared to have been misapprehended by the counsel for West Virginia (Vide my brief, page 21).

It is apparent from the copious quotations from Mr. Hall's work, to be found in the brief of Senator Spooner, that we may do Captain Glenn an injustice in imputing to him the "discovery" of the view by which the text of Chancellor Kent is sought to be amended, for we find on page 14 of the Senator's brief the exact language used by Captain Glenn employed by Mr. Hall.

And it is but just to Mr. Hall to point out that he does concede all that is said by Kent, Wharton, and the other writers in the paragraph quoted on page 15 of the Senator's brief, as follows:

> "No doubt the debt of a State from which another separates itself ought, generally to be divided between the two proportionately to their respective resources, as a matter of justice to the creditors, because it is seldom that the value of their security is not affected by the diminution of the State indebted to them. But the obligation is a moral, not a legal one."

We may not linger long over the distinction between the "moral" and the legal sanctions of international law. Captain Glenn's definition will suffice us for the present:

> "Public international law consists in certain rules of conduct which modern civilized nations regard as binding on them in their relations with one another and enforceable by appropriate means in case of infringement."

III.

Senator Spooner's third point is that the public debt of Virginia as of January 1, 1861, was "inherently a special, and not a general debt."

He insists on page 32 of his brief:

> "And this distinction between a general and a special or local debt is a substantial one. It rests upon sound principles, and is essentially just. Obviously, there is no such distinction when we consider the relation of a State and its creditor. There the purpose for which the loan was effected is immaterial; but in respect of the apportionment of the debt of a State between itself and a new State erected out of its territory, the distinction is not only apparent but important."

He further defines:

> of the State, the expeditures of which are not susceptible of localization, and which cannot be said to benefit one section more than another, or one class of citizens more than another.
> "Such a debt is not, in its nature, apportionable except by special agreement or ratably upon some basis recognized by international law."

We might rest our case upon the exception here stated on the ground that the public debt of Virginia is apportionable between Virginia and West Virginia on "some basis recognized by international law," and that basis is the one stated by Justice Field in Hartman vs. Greenhow.

But can it be contended that the public debt of Virginia, as it existed on the first of January, 1861, was a special or local debt, as distinguished from a general debt?

We have seen that this debt originated from the report of a commission, of which Chief Justice Marshall was the chairman and made the report. That it originated in the execution of a broad, general, comprehensive plan of public internal improvements, designed to benefit the entire State as a unit in interest, and embraced a system of works, such as railroads, canals, turnpikes, bridges, &c., &c., extending throughout the State from the east toward the west. That these works usually began in their construction in the eastern parts of the State for the manifest reason that the material to be used in their construction could be supplied only from the eastern parts—from tide water and through the navigable rivers emptying into the ocean.

Some of these works had been completely constructed at the outbreak of the war, conspicuously the great Northwestern turnpike, extending from Winchester, in the Shenandoah Valley, to the Ohio River, and the turnpike extending from Staunton to the Ohio River. These were the two great lines of trade and travel extending through the present State of West Virginia and connecting with the lines of railway to the coast.

Surely these great works of internal improvement were in no sense "local" or "special." They were as general in their usefulness and their advantage to the entire State and to its population as the atmosphere that covered them.

In Æsop's fable of the Belly and the Members it was objected by all the other organs that the belly was the sole receptable of all the food procured by the efforts of the other members—that in modern phrase the belly was the recipient of "local" and "special" favors—but the reply of the belly was conclusive, and has been accepted in all the ages as adequate and complete.

It has been argued here that inasmuch as the proceeds of the bonds that constitute and evidence the public debt of Virginia were expended in the eastern parts that those parts alone should be required to pay them.

The fact as stated is not true, as appears from the schedules annexed to paragraph 1 of page 30 of the master's report. But suppose the fact was as is stated, would it justify the conclusion claimed?

Suppose these works had been begun on the Ohio River and extended eastwardly through the Alleghanies toward tide water and their construction had been arrested by the war, and that country was disfigured as is eastern Virginia by the unfinished remains of these arrested works, would the claim be tolerated for a moment that West Virginia should now be required to pay the entire debt because all the money had been expended within her limits?

As well might it be claimed that the receiving end of a pipe line, extending through hundreds of miles, should alone be charged with the cost of all the oil and gas placed in it, although that oil and gas was thus distributed through a thousand square miles, bringing light and warmth to thousands of homes.

If a State, in the exercise of its lawful powers, expends a sum of money in one county, and for the benefit of that county and its inhabitants alone, that may be said to be a local or special debt, and, in case of a partition of the State, that county, or at most that part of the State within which, on the partition, that county falls, should alone be required to pay that debt, but where a State expenditure, although made in one locality only, enures to the benefit of the whole State, or was intended to do so, such expenditure, if it forms part of the public debt, should be borne by the entire State, and not by the part in which it was made.

On page 33 of his brief Senator Spooner supposes the case of the expenditure of $10,000,000 within the limits of the present State of West Virginia for the benefit of its people, and that thereafter the State of West Virginia was formed and admitted into the Union with no provision as to the apportionment of this debt, and he asks, "Can there be any doubt, upon principles of international law and of common justice, that the new State should take that entire debt upon its shoulders?" We reply that there can be none. But note, that is because the expenditure was made, not for the benefit of the whole State of Virginia, but only for the benefit of the people of the proposed new State of West Virginia.

But let the supposition be made more in accordance with the facts of this case as charged in the bill and admitted in the answer.

Here all the people of the old State of Virginia were represented in the legislature by their delegates and senators. Those from the western parts urge the creation of a public debt, the proceeds of which shall be applied to the construction of works of internal improvement, whereby a closer and more profitable union between the eastern and the western parts may be effected.

The eastern delegates and senators oppose this, but the western combine with the Piedmont and Valley delegates and senators and carry it through the legislature. The public debt is contracted, and the internal improvements are begun. The war arrests their further construction by the old

State. West Virginia is erected into a new and independent State, and then these works are, by private enterprise, completed in accordance with the original plan. Who now shall bear the burden of the debt contracted? It was contracted for the benefit of the whole people and State, but was constructed only within the territory of the old State. It is charged in the bill, and is not denied—indeed is admitted in the answer—that the western delegates and senators, by their votes, had effected the creation of the debt. Can there be any diversity of opinion as to what equity, good conscience and the principles of public law would dictate? The James River and Kanawha Canal would have proved of great value to the territory now forming West Virginia, but today it is useless and abandoned.

Senator Spooner, on page 35 of his brief, refers to four companies, and even states the fact that they were projected at an early date, 1816. But he fails to note that this was nearly eight years before any part of the public debt of Virginia was created.

Senator Spooner's fourth and last point which we shall notice is that the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance and the eighth section of the eighth article of the West Virginia Constitution, taken together, form a compact, a special agreement between the two States.

IV.

I have endeavored to show in my former brief, filed in October last, that this alleged contract had no existence in fact, because—

1. The ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance formed no valid feature or term in an ordinance the sole object of which was to provide for the creation of a new State out of part of the territory of Virginia. The convention that framed that ordinance had no power to prescribe to the new

State the plan or method by which she should ascertain the amount of her share of the old public debt of Virginia.

That was altogether a matter of internal and domestic concern, which fell within the exclusive power and control of the new State.

2. The constitution framed by the people of West Virginia made another and different provision for ascertaining that amount, and this constitution altogether superseded and supplanted the provision of the ordinance, just as the constitution of Kentucky superseded the provision of the northwest ordinance of 1787 as to slavery.

Strader vs. Graham, 10 Howard, 82.

Scott vs. Sanford, 19 Howard, 393.

3. The ninth section of the ordinance was never recognized by any subsequent convention or legislature of either State, and was ignored by the convention that framed the constitution of the State.

4. It was not recognized by Congress in the debates or proceedings had on the admission of the State into the Union, and when enquiry was made in both the Senate and the House of Representatives as to the provision made for the payment of West Virginia's share of the public debt the reply was uniformally made that adequate provision was made in the constitution under which the State was seeking admission.

5. When Virginia, by the act of her legislature, consented to the creation of the new State she did so in express and significant terms, only under the provisions of her constitution.

6. The only ground on which in the proceedings had in this case such alleged compact or agreement was sought to be maintained was that the State of Virginia had offered the ninth section of the ordinance as a proposition to West Virginia, and that West Virginia had accepted that proposition when she framed her constitution. But, as we have shown, the acceptance was a wide departure, both in form and substance, from the proposition, and hence was a rejection of it.

On page 61 of his brief Senator Spooner says: "The question is, What was intended by the framers of the ordinance?"

What the framers of the ordinance intended is immaterial. What was intended by those to whom the ninth section of the ordinance was offered as a proposition for their acceptance? What was intended by the Congress that admitted West Virginia into the Union under her constitution? What was intended by Virginia in her legislative consent to the erection of this new State within her territory?

On page 49 of his brief the Senator insists that the ninth section of the ordinance was claimed in the bill, in paragraph 18, to be one of the grounds on which Virginia asked relief in this case. An examination of that paragraph will refute this notion. That paragraph charged several instances in which West Virginia had fully recognized and admitted her liability for a proportion of the public debt. One of these was in this ninth section, where "a just proportion of the public debt shall be taken upon herself" and another, and immediately following, is the provision in her constitution where she says the new State shall assume an equitable proportion of the public lebt. Nowhere is the plan of ascertainment proposed by the ninth section recognized by Virginia except in the identification of the section as the one that proposed that plan.

Original, No. 3. October Term, 1910.

vs.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

FINAL REPLY BRIEF FOR THE COMPLAINANT.

In view of the elaborate discussion of the case in the Master's Report, in the briefs heretofore filed, and in the recent exhaustive oral arguments of the cause, a succinct reply to some of the points presented in the two latest briefs for the defendant will suffice.

I.

POINTS NOW RELIED ON FOR THE DEFENDANT WHICH DO NOT GO TO THE MERITS.

The contention of counsel for the defendant in this branch of their argument is,

That Virginia has no right to maintain this suit—

1. Because she has no such interest in the subject matter of the litigation as gives her a standing to maintain it, denying that she has any equity either for exoneration, or for contribution.

2. Because she sustains a dual relation to the controversy in that she asserts, as is alleged, several independent causes of action, and sues in a dual capacity, namely, both in her own right, and as trustee for the depositing creditors—that therefore her bill is multifarious.

3. Because any duty or liability of West Virginia to make a settlement or to pay anything is not to Virginia, but to the creditors of the undivided State.

4. Because Virginia has been guilty of "laches."

A brief response will dispose of each of these points:

(1)

The statement that Virginia has no interest in this suit in her own right is founded in a singular misapprehension of the facts.

(a) VIRGINIA'S EQUITY FOR EXONERATION.

If a liability rests upon the Commonwealth to pay any part of the common public debt of the undivided State, that circumstance plainly entitles her to have West Virginia contribute to the payment of that common indebtedness to the extent of West Virginia's equitable liability therefor, in exoneration of Virginia.

The view of opposing counsel that no such liability rests upon Virginia is based upon a misapprehension of the meaning and effect of the Funding Act of March 30, 1871, under which over three-fourths of the common debt was funded. Virginia's liability under that Act is defined in the third section thereof.—I West Va's Compilation, pp. 14-15; R. pp. 17-19.

That the contention of counsel for West Virginia, that Virginia was released from all liability for the one-third of the $38,110,355.37 (including accrued interest capitalized and funded), of her old bonds, funded under that Act, by reason of the issue by her of the $12,703,451.79 of "Deferred Certificates" under the terms of the third section of that Act, is conclusively refuted by the decision of the Supreme Court of Virginia in the case of Greenhow v. Vashon, 81 Va. 342-343. In that case Judge Richardson, delivering the opinion of the court and quoting with approval the dictum of Judge Staples in Antoni v. Wright, 22 Gratt. 864-5, says:

"It is said that the creditor has released one-third of his debt. I do not so understand it, and I will hazard the assertion, the creditor does not so construe the law. If this was the intention of the framers of the act they have adopted an obscure and equivocal mode of expressing a plain and simple agreement. The creditor surrenders his bond and obtains a new one for two-thirds of his debt, and coupons for the interest. For the remaining one-third the bond is held in trust by the State, and a certificate is given him stating that payment will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as may be made with West Virginia. If that State is faithful to the obligations resting upon her, the creditor will receive the other third also. On the other hand, if she repudiates these obligations there is no agreement or understanding absolving the State from the payment of the whole debt as before the passage of the funding bill."

The following are the terms of the certificates issued under the Act of 1871:

"Copy of Certificate under Act of March 30, 1871.

"Commonwealth of Virginia.

"No. ———.

"Treasurer's Office, Richmond, Va.

"This is to certify that there is due unto ———— heirs, executors, administrators or assigns $———, being one-third of bond surrendered under the provisions of an Act approved March 30th, 1871, entitled, 'An Act to provide for the funding and payment of the public debt,' namely, Bond No. ——, with interest, amounting to $———. . Payment of said one-third with interest thereon at the rate of six per cent. per annum will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the State of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia existing at the time of its dismemberment, and the State of Virginia holds said bonds so far as unfunded in trust for the holder hereof or his assigns."

"In testimony whereof this certificate has been signed by the Treasurer and countersigned by the Second Auditor, as provided by law.

"————————,

"Treasurer of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

"————————,

"Second Auditor of Virginia."

(R. 56-57; I West Va. Compilation 49).

Nor is it true, as gravely contended by West Virginia's counsel, that the subsequent, more or less abortive and ineffectual Funding Acts of March 28, 1879 (R. 21-26; and I West Va. Compilation 17-22), and of February 14, 1882 (R. 26-38; and I West Va. Compilation 22-40), released Virginia from any obligation or liability resting upon her under the Act of 1871 in reference to the third of the antecedent debt of the Commonwealth represented by the bonds deposited with her under that Act and expressed in the third section of the Act of 1871, and in the certificates issued thereunder.

Nor did the Act of February 20, 1892 (R. 38-47; 1 West Va. Compilation 32-40), under which a final adjustment of the two-thirds of the debt distinctly assumed by Virginia has been effected, release Virginia from any duty or obligations resting upon her in respect to the third of the bonds unfunded under the Act of 1871, or the certificates issued therefor.

It is true that each of said Funding Acts, subsequent to that of 1871, by its terms repealed the antecedent Funding Act or Acts: but while such repeal operated to stop any farther funding under such antecedent Acts, as it was designed to do, it could not, of course, operate to impair or affect the contract rights and obligations created by the Acts so repealed, or relieve Virginia from any contractual liability resting upon her under the provisions of those Acts. That such repeal could have any such effect is one of the extraordinary hallucinations into which defendant's counsel have fallen.

Neither the Acts of March 28, 1879, nor February 14, 1882, nor February 20, 1892, called for or required the surrender of any of the certificates issued under the Act of March 30, 1871; or for the substitution of other certificates therefor; or in the slightest degree modified or affected the status of those certificates of 1871, or any contract rights of the holders thereof, or any obligation or liability, contingent or otherwise, of Virginia in respect thereto.

It manifestly results from this, that Virginia has the right to invoke the equitable jurisdiction of this court for her exoneration from any liability resting upon her as to the portion of the common debt represented by the unfunded third of the bonds deposited with her under the Act of 1871, and evidenced by the certificates issued by her under that Act, to the extent of West Virginia's ratable equitable liability therefor.

(b) VIRGINIA HAS AN EQUITABLE CLAIM AGAINST WEST VIRGINIA FOR CONTRIBUTION—IN VIRGINIA'S OWN RIGHT.

If Virginia has paid any portion of the common debt resting upon both States, in full, she has an equity, in her own right, to reimbursment by West Virginia, to the extent of the ratable liability of the new State upon the obligations so paid off and redeemed by Virginia. This is the equity of contribution asserted in Paragraph XVI of the Bill (R. 13; 1 West Va. Compilation 10).

All the evidence in support of this claim has not been put into the cause any more than the evidence as to what the share of the recovery payable on any of the other obligations of the Commonwealth will be; and for the further reason that the court has not directed any such inquiry. There are, however, data, evidence, and authentic statements in the record which show that Virginia, since January 1, 1861, has paid off or taken up obligations for interest and for principal existing prior to January 1, 1861, amounting to a very large sum.

For instance, in payment for the Blue Ridge Railroad $625,348.08, Special Master's Report, pp. 47 and 84, and the record returned therewith, p. 487; Appendix to that Record, p. 45, Section 14 of the Act of March 1, 1867. And it also appears from the record that Virginia acquired $118,518.12 of her bonds for her claims against the Winchester & Potomac Railroad, of which $45,000.00 was paid in old bonds, and $66,130.90 in new registered bonds issued for interest upon the old debt. Special Master's Report, pp. 64 aad 84, Record, pp. 462 and 489, and Appendix p. 31.

In addition to this, the statement published as a part of Exhibit No. 3, filed with the bill, the Act of February 14, 1882, shows that Virginia paid on account of interest on old bonds held by the general public from January 1, 1861, to July 1, 1863, $3,662,434.55, and between July 1, 1863, and July 1, 1871, $3,594,289.11. The same public record shows that during the same period, and before any funding of the share of the debt assumed by Virginia, she redeemed of the common debt dollar bonds to the amount of $3,710,449.67. R., pp. 27-32, 1 W. Va. Compilation, pp. 23-26.

Summarized, the following payments were made by Virginia upon the whole undivided debt in the period mentioned, as shown by said Act of February 14, 1882:

Paid, on account of interest, from Jan. 1, 1861, to July 1, 1871, on bonds held by the general public	$ 7,255,723.66
Dollar bonds redeemed during same period	3,710,449.67
Total sums paid	$10,966,173.33

The statement here referred to was made for the purpose of justifying the readjustment of the State debt proposed by said Act of February 14, 1882. That attempted readjustment proved so unsuccessful and abortive, that, while it was accepted by some of the creditors, chiefly those classes who were given by that Act the largest percentage of their claims in the new bonds tendered, the great mass of the bondholders of the State refused to accede to its terms. To such a large extent was this true, that "not less than twenty-eight million dollars of the public debt" remained, on the 20th of February, 1892, "unfunded under said Act approved February fourteenth, eighteen hundred and eighty-two," as appears from the recitals in the Act of February 20th, 1892. R. 39, 1 West Va. Compilation 32.—See Act of February 20, 1892, printed as Exhibit No. 4 with the bill: R. 38, 1 West Va. Compilation, p. 32.

In addition to the bonds issued under the Acts of February 14, 1882, and February 20, 1892, there were over $2,400,000 of bonds, held by certain educational corporations, which were recognized, assumed and provided for by the ancillary Acts of March 3, 1882, and February 23, 1892, and all of which obligations have since been redeemed and taken up by the Commonwealth, and the contracts represented thereby novated, by the issue of new obligations therefor, pursuant to the provisions of the Act approved February 23, 1892.

See copy of last mentioned Act and statement of bonds retired thereby in the Appendix to this brief.

The claim of Virginia, in her own right, for contribution, is not on account of any bonds issued by her after January 1, 1861, or on account of any bonds issued by her for the two-thirds of the original debt which she assumed, but on account of bonds outstanding prior to January 1, 1861, which were in the hands of the general public on that day, and interest thereon, which have been redeemed by Virginia and paid in full since January 1, 1861—obligations and interest thereon which constituted a part of the $33,897,073.82 of indebtedness ascertained by the Master to have been so outstanding on the 1st of January, 1861.—Masters Rep. 17.

The evidence as to what part of the debt Virginia had so paid off and so held was not called for by the decree of the court; nor was it of any interest to West Virginia for the precise amount of Virginia's interest in her own right to be determined. If she had paid any portion of the original debt of the undivided State she would have an equity for contribution against West Virginia and to participation in any recovery ratably and equitably to the extent that she was entitled to such reimbursement from West Virginia.

The record shows that she has paid millions of dollars, not counting such of the bonds held by institutions of learning as were outstanding prior to January 1, 1861, and as she redeemed, or retired under the provisions of the Act of February 23, 1892.

Upon this state of facts the equity of Virginia, in her own right, to contribution is fully sustained.

Either this, or the associated equity of exoneration, would be sufficient to support the jurisdiction of the court. But in addition to these there is her right to invoke the equitable jurisdiction of the court for an accounting with West Virginia in order to such a settlement between them as the complainant has a right to have.

The contention of West Virginia's counsel, that Virginia cannot maintain this suit because her bill is multifarious in that she,

as they charge, asserts several independent causes of action, and sues in a dual capacity, namely both in her own right and as trustee, has been heretofore fully argued, and effectually disposed of by this court upon the demurrer.—See briefs and oral arguments for complainant, 1 West Va. Compilation 233 to 236, 331 to 332, 333 to 336, 393 to 396; and decision of this court, Idem 434.

In absolute rebuttal of any such defence of multifariousness as is asserted here, see the admirable statement of the rule as now well established in this country given by the distinguished counsel for West Virginia, Mr. Hogg, in his work on Equity Procedure, Vol. I, Sec. 136, quoted at pp. 395-6, 1 West Va. Compilation.

The statement that Virginia is suing here in a dual capacity, namely, in her own right, and as trustee, is incorrect.

Virginia alone is the complainant. She sues distinctly and solely in her own right, and for her own relief and protection.

It is true that she also sustains a fiduciary relation to the bonds and evidences of the common indebtedness which have been confided to her by the creditors of the undivided State; but that circumstance was merely a proper, if not a necessary, incident of the contract she made with the common creditors for funding the two-thirds of their obligations which Virginia undertook to take care of.

It was an arrangement of convenience, if not of necessity, which did not at all prejudice or affect any right of West Virginia. Nor did it impair any right of Virginia.

To be sure the bill asks that all proper accounts may be taken to determine the balance due from the State of West Virginia to Virginia in her own right and as trustee: but such an accounting is not prejudicial to West Virginia. It would be merely incidental to an ascertainment of the amount which West Virginia owes.

It must be remembered that Virginia assumed the position of trustee as an essential part of the scheme for the settlement between the public creditors and herself. She was not a mere volunteer, as were New Hampshire and New York in New Hampshire v. Louisiana, and New York v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76. In those cases, neither New Hampshire nor New York had the remotest personal interest in the subject matter of the trust. The arrangement in those cases was simply a device to evade the Eleventh Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Here Virginia has a substantial personal interest in the trust subject. She is not only not a mere volunteer, but the creation of the fiduciary relation and her acceptance of it was a proper and essential part of the plan of settlement.

The trust devolved upon Virginia here was therefore not only a trust coupled with an interest, but a trust evolved from a common duty and a common obligation.

Virginia's position in this regard is radically different from that of the two plaintiff States in New Hampshire and New York v. Louisiana.

In the case of United States v. Nashville, &c., Ry. 118 U. S. 125, certain coupons were sued upon by the United States in its own name, the defense was interposed that they were held by the United States in trust for the Chickasaw nation of Indians, in pursuance of a treaty with them, and that the claim was barred by statute limitations on account of the United States having no interest except as trustee, and that the suit therefore could not be maintained. The court held, however, "they (the coupons) were held by the United States for a public use in its highest sense," and the suit was sustained.

It is also essentially different and stronger than the position of South Dakota in South Dakota v. North Carolina, for Virginia did not here buy herself into, or voluntarily accept, a controversy against another State. She merely, as was her right, and her duty to do, for her own protection, and at the same time in discharge of her duty to the common creditors, as a proper and essential incident of the settlement with them, accepted the fiduciary relation defined in the Funding Act of 1871 in reference to the bonds confided to her under that Act.

Even if she had been, by the terms of that Act, released entirely by the common creditors, upon the condition that she would by suit or otherwise secure a settlement with West Virginia for their benefit and her exoneration, she would, we think, clearly have a standing to maintain this suit: but as she was not so released there can be no question as to her right to maintain it, even if she had no personal claim for contribution, or for an accounting, on other equitable grounds.

Each of the grounds discussed under the last two general headings were fully argued, and considered, upon substantially the same state of facts which is now presented, when the cause was heard upon the demurrer, and was then unanimously decided by the court, adversely to the contentions of the defendant. No reason has been shown for overruling that decision in these regards, and we confidently rely upon the same.

See decision of the court upon the demurrer.—R. 132-137; 1 West Va. Compilation, 429-434.

THE DUTY AND OBLIGATION OF WEST VIRGINIA ARE TO MAKE A SETTLEMENT WITH VIRGINIA, AND NOT WITH THE BONDHOLDERS OF THE UNDIVIDED STATE.

So far, in all the acts and dealings of the two States upon this subject from the birth of West Virginia down to the filing, at the present term, of Parts I and II of the brief for the defendant, both States have acted upon the basis that any settlement would be, and would have to be, between the two States.

West Virginia, through her Governors, Debt Commissioners, and Legislature, has always heretofore recognized this. Her answer in this case, and her entire line of defence down to the present term has been distinctly upon this basis.

It is true that the preamble to the Virginia Funding Act of 1871 (R. 18; 1 West Va. Compilation 14) acquiesces in a settlement between West Virginia and the bondholders, if West Virginia shall so prefer; but that suggestion was in direct conflict with Section 19, of Article X of the then Constitution of Virginia, which commanded that,

> "Sec. 19. The General Assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia, the proportion of the public debt of Virginia, proper to be borne by the State of Virginia and West Virginia, and shall provide that such sum as shall be received from West Virginia shall be applied to the payment of the public debt of the State."

This declaration of that preamble was also in conflict with and rendered nugatory by Section 3 of that very Act, which expressly contemplates and provides for a settlement between the two States (R. 19; 1 West Va. Compilation 15).

No such line of defence is relied on or suggested in the Defendant's Answer. On the contrary that answer assumes and recognizes that any such settlement must be between the two States.—See particularly Paragraphs VIII, and XI,—R. 148, 149 to 154, and II West Va. Compilation 8, 10 to 15.

The entire defence of West Virginia, from the institution of this suit to the filing of the latest brief by her counsel, has been conducted upon this basis, and it is too late for the defendant in the very last stage of the litigation to adopt a different and inconsistent line of defence.

Apart from other influential considerations the compact arising under Section 8 of Article VIII of the first Constitution of West Virginia, and the Acts of the Legislature of Virginia and the United States Congress giving consent to the creation of the new State upon those terms, was a compact between the two States, which Virginia has the right to invoke the jurisdiction of this court to enforce.

This belated attempt to assert "laches" as a defence against Virginia is without merit.

It is based upon the singular assumption that Virginia is to blame, because she exhausted friendly negotiation before bringing her suit, and did not institute it until after her repeated overtures to West Virginia for an amicable adjustment had all been successively rejected.

Like other defences, unless disclosed by the bill, the defence of "laches" must be asserted in the answer or other defensive pleading.

Here it has never been set up by the answer, or other pleading, and is negatived by the allegations of the bill. It will not be allowed to be set up by amendment of answer long after the filing of same: or after the reference to a Master and the filing of his report.

Webb v. Fuller, 83 Me. 405, 22 Atl. 384;
See also 16 Cyc. 176 and 177, and citations.

We ask leave, however, to briefly consider this defence as presented in defendant's brief, because of its relation to other equitable features of the cause.

The defence of "laches," in equity, is only permitted to defeat an acknowledged right on one or both of the following grounds:

(1) That it raises the presumption that the claim has been abandoned or satisfied.

(2) That the party pleading it has been seriously prejudiced by the culpable failure of the plaintiff to assert his claim.

Demuth v. Old Town Bank, 85 Md. 315, 37 Atl. 260, 268.
Coles v. Ballard, 78 Va. 139, 147;

Morse v. Seibold, 147 Ill. 318, 35 N. E. 369, 371;
Hall v. Otterson, 52 N. J. Equity 522.

Not one of the grounds upon which such a defence must rest as shown by the authorities cited exists here.

(a) Any presumption of satisfaction of her share of the debt by West Virginia or of abandonment of her claim is absolutely rebutted by the proof that the new State has never paid, and has failed and refused to pay, a dollar on account of the Virginia debt, and that Virginia has persistently urged a settlement.

(b) Nor is there any evidence in the case showing, or tending to show that West Virginia has suffered prejudice from Virginia's forbearance to sue.

No evidence helpful to her has been lost. The substantial proofs of the debt and of West Virginia's liability for it, are all matters of irrefutable record, all of which have been kept and preserved with wonderful accuracy and fidelity, so that the absolute verity of every item of the account and every entry upon those voluminous records, covering the transactions of forty years, has compelled the candid assent of the accountants and the counsel for West Virginia.

On the contrary West Virginia has profited enormously by her long delay in making a settlement with Virginia.

While Virginia has been struggling to meet her just obligations on account of this common debt, and has paid and assumed at least $75,000,000 as of the present year, most of her payments having been contributed years ago "from the scant resources of an impoverished people," West Virginia, husbanding her resources, and compounding her wealth, has not paid one cent.

Instead of her position and ability to pay having been impaired by this long delayed settlement, for the postponement of which she is largely responsible, she has profited so greatly by it, that her taxable resources have increased from a total assessed valuation of $126,060,743 in 1867, to $937,232,718.54 in 1908, an enhancement of 643 per cent.!—See Plaintiff's Exhibit E-3, R. 651.

It appears from this same authentic exhibit that the taxable resources of Virginia increased during the same period from $354,848,482.69 to $661,796,631, or only about 84 per cent.

That comparative schedule of taxable resources, fairly interpreted, demonstrates another thing, namely, that instead of being prejudiced by this lapse of time, West Virginia could, in her present prosperity and affluence—largely the result of the development of her territory by lines of railway which had their inception in the works which represent millions of dollars of Virginia's debt,—pay twenty million dollars to-day, with less inconvenience and less burden upon her people, than she could have paid two million dollars in 1867.

It may not be amiss to call attention to a somewhat conspicuous instance of laches, furnished by the defendant in this case, in this: That, although this litigation had been actively progressing and vigorously contested for five years before the cause was, in the spring of 1910, set down for a final hearing, during which long period every defence which the able and resourceful counsel for the defendant could suggest, was set up, no attempt was made by them until this the very last stage of the litigation, when the issues had all been made up and the case submitted for decision to assert any one of several new and novel alleged grounds of defence which are presented for the first time in the brief filed and the oral arguments made for the defendant at the present term.

Moreover, the defense of laches cannot be interposed against a State. In Armstrong v. The Morrill, 14 Wal. 144-5, the court citing Stoughton v. Baker, 4 Mass. 526, holds that no laches can be imputed to the government and that time does not run against a State.

In Metropolitan R. v. Dist. of Columbia, 132 U. S. 11, the court through Mr. Justice Bradley says: "No restrictive laws apply to the sovereign unless so expressed. And especially no laws affecting a right on the ground of neglect or laches, because neglect or laches cannot be imputed to him. And it matters not whether the sovereign be an individual monarch, or a republic, or a State. The principle applies to all sovereigns. The reason usually assigned for this prerogative is that the sovereign is not answerable for the delinquencies of his agents. But whatever the true reason may be such is the general law—such is the universal law, except where it is expressly waived." See also Wever v. Commissioners, 18 Wal. 70. In Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wal. 99. Lindsay v. Miller, 6 Peters 673. United States v. Knight, 14 Peters 315. United States v. Thompson, 98 U. S. 489. Gaussen v. United States, 97 U. S. 584. United States v. Nashville, &c., Ry., 118 U. S. 125, supra.

It is submitted that the transactions referred to in the cases relied on by the defendant related to such transactions as the protest of negotiable paper, or some entirely private matter where there was no public interest or duty whatever involved.

In Bannock County v. Bell, 101 American State Reports, 152-3, Note 2, it is stated as the universal rule that statutes of limitation should not run against a State nor can laches be imputed to it, although private parties may be interested along with the State in the matter sued on. See authorities there cited.

In the opinion of the court on the demurrer in this cause (V. 1. p. 433 of West Virginia Compilation) the lapse of time is referred to, but the demurrer is overruled and an order afterwards entered for an accounting upon the defendants answer which in no manner refers to the matter. This of itself should preclude the question of laches.

II.

UPON THE MERITS.

BASIC PROPOSITIONS ON WHICH THE CASE OF VIRGINIA RESTS.

West Virginia is liable for an equitable proportion of the Virginia debt:

(1) Under the benign principles of Equity and International Law;

(2) Under the conventional agreements and enactments—the constating Acts of the two States, and of the National Congress,—by virtue of which West Virginia came into being.

There is no essential conflict between these postulates. They have already been exhaustively discussed in their various aspects in the principal briefs, and in the oral argument of the cause. So that we deem it sufficient to briefly notice some of the salient points upon this branch of the case.

Some of the authorities which support the view that West Virginia owes an equitable share of the Virginia Debt under the rules of Equity and Public Law are collated in Appendix No. 1 to the brief of Virginia, printed at pages 163 to 167, Vol. II, West Virginia's Compilation. Others are cited in the briefs for complainant filed at the present term. For others we are indebted to Part III of defendant's brief—Mr. Spooner's contribution thereto. We will not undertake to review these authorities in detail.

An examination of them will show that they are not agreed as to the rule which should obtain in the case of the formation of a new State out of the territory of a pre-existing State. Some of the authorities sanction an apportionment of the antecedent public debt of the original State according to the relative population and areas of the two States. Others according to the taxable resources or revenues, or, what amounts to substantially the same thing, according to the taxable values of the two States.

In a case like this, it would, we respectfully submit, be fair to consider all of these as factors in the consideration and solution of the problem. It would not be satisfactory to take total taxable values alone, for the reason that it is extremely difficult to determine accurately the relative values of taxable property—particularly the value of personal property in the two Virginias in June, 1863. Land constituted then, and at all times perhaps, the most reliable, stable, and just measure of values. The record shows that both lands and personal property were very greatly depreciated in value in June, 1863, in "Confederate Virginia" and in "Confederate West Virginia;" and that there was by no means any such depreciation in what may be termed "Federal West Virginia."

The Master finds that the depreciation in the value of real estate in "Confederate Virginia" and "Confederate West Virginia" amounted to 50 per cent. as compared with its value in 1860 or 1861, before the War.—Master's Report, pp. 155-6.

The Master was led into the error of accepting the inflated Confederate assessments of personal property in Confederate Virginia. The proofs tended very strongly to show,—a proposition which is undoubtedly a historic truth,—that the personal property in Virginia, including slaves, had depreciated in value in the aggregate at least 50 per cent. as a minimum, as compared with the aggregate value of the personal property in the same territory in 1860 or 1861, before the War.

We will not repeat the argument upon these points presented at pp. 57 to 64 of our principal brief.

They are here referred to and relied upon by way of introduction to the following proposition, namely, that:

Under the circumstances of this case, a fair basis for determining the equitable proportion of the Virginia Debt to be borne by West Virginia, would be to combine territorial area, population, and assessed values of land.

It must be conceded that the circumstances here presented are exceptional.

This case is not only exceptional, but peculiar,—sui generis.

As stated in our principal brief: "History furnishes no counterpart, no precise parallel or precedent to guide us, by a clearly blazed path, to a correct conclusion."

Kingdoms, republics, and States have been divided—either by force, by violent revolution, or by conquest; or with their voluntary consent. Never as here by a consent which rested upon a fiction legalized only by post-natal recognition.

Here, too, it is an unquestioned historic fact, alleged in the bill and not controverted in the answer, that very little of the public debt of Virginia would ever have been contracted, but for the votes in the General Assembly of Virginia of the representatives from the counties now constituting West Virginia, in favor of Acts creating that indebtedness.

Here, too, it appears that the debt was in large measure contracted in reliance, not upon the then existing, but upon the future enhanced values primarily of the lands in the Commonwealth. From the first active inauguration of her Internal Improvement System, it, and the public debt contracted in its furtherance, were mainly designed to develop primarily and chiefly the territory of the Commonwealth, but especially the vast mineral and timber resources then locked up in the mountain fastnesses of West Virginia.

The more important, and by far the most costly, of the turnpikes, canals, and railroads munificently aided by the State, and which would never have been otherwise undertaken, all pointed towards, and were designed ultimately to penetrate, or to effectually serve, West Virginia.,

It is true that the completion and the extension into West Virginia of the most important and costly of these great projected channels of commerce, were prevented by the War; but by reason of the large sums already spent upon them by Virginia, and her subsequent generous concessions of the works represented by those expenditures to the companies which afterwards extended the Chesapeake & Ohio and the Norfolk & Western Railways into and through West Virginia, large portions of central and southern West Virginia have been given an access to the Atlantic Seaboard and the markets of the country, without which great and rich sections of that opulent young State would, when this suit was brought, have been practically as inaccessible and as undeveloped, as when they were a primeval wilderness.

The schedule printed as Appendix No. 1, pp. 109-110 of our opening brief, affords a conclusive confirmation of the view here presented: for, directly or indirectly, the large expenditures there stated, and which represents 29/33rds of the public debt of the Commonwealth, went into lines of transportation which now efficiently serve West Virginia, and over which her vast output of coal, lumber and oil moves in increasing volume to the ports and cities of the Atlantic Seaboard, and to the markets, furnaces and factories of the West, Northwest and the Southwest.

Under these circumstances, it is right that territorial areas—the very areas which have been so enormously enhanced in value, in great part at least, by these internal improvements, which in their origin and development represent ultimately large portions of the Virginia debt—should be potential factors in the solution of the problem of West Virginia's share of that indebtedness.

And so, too, should population be: for there can be no productive development, without population; and in these States—particularly in such a State as West Virginia, with such a virile population as during the last one hundred years has inhabited the territory in her present limits—this is especially true.

If we could get fairly at the taxable resources of the two States in June, 1863, they too should be brought into the account: but, by reason of the confusion, destruction, and disturbance of values incident to the War, it is impossible to ascertain reliably or definitely the true taxable values in good money of the two States at that time.

By the terms of its decree the court seems to have wisely considered land as the most reliable, as it certainly is the most stable and uniform, subject of taxation, and form of property to be found in the two States at that or at any other period. But, if the assessed value of land be taken by itself, it would leave out of the account population and extent of territory, both of which should, we submit, be considered under the circumstances existing here. Not only should population be considered because, under such conditions, it is an element, and a creator of economic values; but areas should come into the account. It is manifest from the great enhancement of values in West Virginia shown by Complainant's Exhibit E-3, R. 651, that the mineral and lumber resources—the products of the lands of that State—are realizing the hopes and expectations of the projectors of the Internal Improvement System of Virginia, and that that enhancement has been far more rapid, and far greater per square mile of territory in West Virginia, than it has been in Virginia.

Is it not right, therefore, that territorial areas should, under such circumstances, be brought into the account?

Now, stating the account accordingly, we have the following result:

West Virginia has 36.1843 per cent. of the total area of the undivided State, upon which basis she would be assigned the following amount of the Virginia debt.—See Master's Report, p. 37; Principal Brief for Virginia, p. 76.....	$12,265,418.88
West Virginia had, in June, 1863, 24.5145 per cent. of the total population of the undivided State, upon which basis she would be assigned (See Master's Report, p. 37, and Principal Brief for Virginia, p. 76)	8,309,698.16
The assessed value of the lands in West Virginia in June, 1863, was 21.7812 per cent. of the total assessed values of lands in undivided Virginia, on which basis, there would be assigned to the New State this amount of the common debt (see p. 37 of Master's Rep.; p. 76 of Principal Brief for Complainant)	7,383,189.44
Combining these and taking the average we have, as the amount of the debt chargeable to West Virginia, as of January 1, 1861, the sum of...	9,652,768.83

Such will be the result if the apportionment of the debt is made upon the basis thus stated, arrived at by combining the three bases as indicated.

Against any such adjustment of the debt, indeed against any assignment to West Virginia of any substantial part of it upon an accounting upon the principles of Equity and International Law, the present leading counsel for West Virginia has in the last ten days, in his oral argument and printed brief, for the first time presented a new international law theory, and a novel proposition in equity jurisprudence for the guidance of the court.

By the application of this newly discovered theory he proposes to relieve West Virginia from any appreciable burden on account of the public debt of the Commonwealth, if the court shall decide this case upon the principles of equity and public law.

The precedents indicated by Senator Spooner do not at all support the rule he advocates as applied to this case; as, for instance: Where a new State constituting or embracing a province or other integral political sub-division of the original State has been cut off from such original State.

The original State owed a debt which bound all of its parts alike. This was a general or national debt, which upon its partition into two States would have to be apportioned ratably among the new States into which it was subdivided.

But such original State, or some of its subordinate provinces, owed special or local debts contracted by such provinces or by the original State in behalf of such provinces; or the avails of which debt were distinctly expended within and for special exclusive and local benefit of such provinces respectively, by or on behalf of which the money represented by such special debt was borrowed.

Now, when such province, having charged upon it such a debt contracted distinctly for its several and separable benefit, is cut off from the original State, and formed into, or becomes part of an independent State, there can be no question that Mr. Spooner is right in the view, that, in such a case, such a debt would continue to be a charge upon such a seceding or withdrawing province; and that such a seceding or withdrawing province would not be liable for any of the special or local debts of the original state, which were similarly local to the provinces or subdivisions thereof which adhered to, or continued to be parts of, the original State.

And so here, county or city debts due by, or contracted in the name and on behalf of, and which were specially charged upon, counties or cities which were and continued to be parts of Virginia after her dismemberment, could not, of course, bind West Virginia.

The distinction and classification which the learned counsel seeks to make find no support in the facts of this case.

The only debt, of which West Virginia is here called upon to bear an equitable share, is the public debt of Virginia existing prior to January 1, 1861, a debt as well known to the makers of West Virginia as it is to the counsel in this cause, and distinctly recognized in the fundamental constating acts to which West Virginia owes her existence.

The debt, a just and equitable portion of which the makers of West Virginia provided that the new State should assume, was the "public debt of the Commonwealth," statements of which were embraced in the Annual Reports of the Second Auditor of the Commonwealth; and the amount and character of which were known in approximate accuracy of detail to the representative citizens of West Virginia who framed those enactments, a number of whom had also been repeatedly members of the General Assembly, and officials of the unsevered Commonwealth. The learned Counsel, in order to maintain this new contention, in effect, classifies the whole public debt of Virginia as a special and local debt.

The indisputable fact is, that Virginia in 1861 did not owe one dollar of special or local debt.

Opposing counsel treats the words "special" and "local" as synonymous, which is not true of them. A debt, as, for instance, one contracted for the building of a capitol, or a penitentiary, for the common use and benefit of all the people of an entire State may, by the terms of its creation, be a special debt, and yet it will be the debt of and binding upon all of the people in every part of such State.

The distinction, for it to avail anything for West Virginia, would have to be between a distinctly local and a general debt. A local debt might not, and, under circumstances readily conceivable, would not bind a new State detached from the original Commonwealth, if such new State did not embrace the political sub-division or province of the original State upon which such local debt was charged.

The entire records of the Commonwealth from 1820 and prior thereto have been carefully scrutinized by accountants and counsel in this cause, and not one dollar of special, or local, debt has been discovered.

The only debt of Virginia which existed in 1860, or 1861, was what was then well known, and what was correctly defined in the Wheeling Ordinance and in Article VIII of the first West Virginia Constitution, both written and enacted by West Virginians, as "the public debt of the Commonwealth." It was a general debt, binding the Commonwealth and every part of it alike and as a unit. To be sure, much of it was evidenced by bonds which recited the Acts by authority of which those bonds were issued; but they constituted none the less parts of the public debt of the Commonwealth because so ear-marked.

It was created in carrying out a great general public system of Internal Improvement, in part suggested by Washington, and by Chief Justice Marshall, but formally inaugurated by the creation of the Board of Public Works and the General Internal Improvement Fund in 1816, for the common benefit and general ultimate improvement and development of every portion of the State.

There were a large number of counties in Virginia, as now constituted, in which not a mile of railroad or canal had been built, and yet they shared, more or less remotely and unequally, it may be, in the common benefit to the whole State, and were bound along with the counties through which these public improvements passed for the debts contracted in their construction.

The Acts of the General Assembly of Virginia of March 26, 1853, "Establishing a Sinking Fund," and providing for the payment of the semi-annual interest on and redemption of the public debt, printed at pp. 200 to 205 of the appendix to the record, and chapter 44 of the Code of Virginia of 1860, Idem. pp. 196-199; and the statutes relating to the same subject, Idem. 188, and especially the Act of April 9, 1838, referred to by Mr. Spooner, Idem 191 to 195, show conclusively that the public debt of Virginia was a general, and in no sense a local, or a special debt.

Virginia's public debt was just as much the general debt of the whole Commonwealth, as is the debt of the United States the general debt of the nation. Nor can the burden of such a State debt be apportioned or distributed among the different counties or sections of the State in proportion to the benefits realized by each from the expenditure of the money borrowed, any more than the burden of the National debt can be similarly apportioned among the different States and sections of the American Union.

We would not devote so much space to this artificial, and, frankness compels us to say, fanciful classification, but for the confidence and earnestness with which an advocate for whose ability and candor we have the greatest respect, seriously pressed it upon the consideration of the court.

If the doctrine of International Law and Equity are applied to the determination of West Virginia's share of the Virginia debt, she will be required to pay her ratable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth as the same existed on the 31st of December, 1861, and was recognized in the VIII Article of her first Constitution, to be computed upon such basis as will place upon the new State a just and equitable share of that burden.

The considerations which should be potential in such determination have been already fully discussed, both orally and in the printed briefs.

WEST VIRGINIA IS LIABLE FOR A JUST AND EQUITABLE PART OF THE PUBLIC DEBT OF VIRGINIA UNDER THE ENACTMENTS OF THE TWO STATES AND OF THE NATIONAL CONGRESS BY VIRTUE OF WHICH THE NEW STATE CAME INTO BEING.

The views of counsel for Virginia as to the respective rights and obligations of the two States under the constating Acts pursuant to the terms of which the new State was ushered into being, if the settlement should be made thereunder, have been fully stated in their principal or opening brief filed at the present term, and will not be reiterated.

The principal consideration and arguments there presented in support of the positions taken have not been answered, if indeed they have been at all discussed, by opposing counsel.

There are, however, a few important points in connection with this alternative aspect of the case which it is of interest to consider.

The view of Virginia is, and has been, that the important thing in this case is, that the result which shall be attained by the final decision of the cause shall be a just, an equitable, and a righteous result.

The matter of the method, or process of reasoning, by which such a result shall be reached is, and has been, one of no moment.

While the Wheeling Ordinance, the West Virginia Constitution (under the provisions of which the consent of the Legislature of "Restored Virginia" and of the Congress was given to her existence as a State), the Acts giving that consent, and the Act of said Restored Legislature of February 3, 1863, transferring to the new State the property and rights of the old State therein defined, were all parts of one great transaction—the dismemberment of Virginia,—it is, and has always been, our view, that the rights and obligations of the two States in reference to the portion of the debt of undivided Virginia to be borne by West Virginia, and the method of its ascertainment, were absolutely controlled by the eighth section of Article VIII of that first West Virginia Constitution, and the compact necessarily arising from Virginia's consent to her statehood upon those terms.

It is a necessary corollary from this, that the proportion of the debt which West Virginia must pay, must be an equitable proportion, and that, if pursuing the method prescribed by the Wheeling Ordinance, an inequitable result is reached, that method, and that Ordinance must be discarded.

Now, a careful comparison of the results arrived at by fairly applying the method of the Wheeling Ordinance to the facts and figures admitted to be true, will show a remarkable agreement in the results reached by such a computation, with the results produced by an application of the standards, or measures, of West Virginia's liability sanctioned by Equity and Public Law.

After all it is a result which is equitable and just which we desire to attain, and it is of little concern by what process such a result shall be reached.

Now, applying the method prescribed by the Wheeling Ordinance to the facts of the case as the Master has done, but correcting the palpable error into which he was led in his exclusion of the expenditures made by the State in works in West Virginia territory built through the agency of public service corporations, which expenditures amounted to the agreed sum of $1,104,400.85, we have, taking the figures of the Master's Report in all other particulars, the following as the amount due by West Virginia under the Wheeling Ordinance fairly and equitably construed and applied:

(a) Stating the account on the basis of the Wheeling Ordinance, apportioning the ordinary expenses of government on the basis of the white population.—(that is, of the population excluding slaves, who did not then constitute a part of the body politic), as is shown at page 85 of our opening brief, we have as West Virginia's share of the debt on the 1st of January, 1861 ..... $9,910,960.20

(b) Upon the same basis, stated under the Wheeling Ordinance, but following the suggestion made by Mr. Justice Harlan (II West Virginia Compilation, p. 227), and apportioning the ordinary expenses of the State government on the Federal basis, by which three-fifths of the slaves will be counted, we have as West Virginia's share of the debt on January 1, 1861 ..... $7,620,087.59

(See pages 85, 86 and 87, of our opening brief.)

Counsel for both States were agreed that population is the fairest criterion for apportioning the ordinary expenses of the State government. (Brief for Defendant, II West. Va. Compilation, p. 129: Oral argument for Complainant, Idem, pp. 227, 228). The only difference between counsel is, that those for West Virginia insisted that the total population should be taken as the factor, while counsel for Virginia urged that the white population alone should be considered, for the reasons stated in the brief for Virginia (II West Va. Compilation, pp. 157, 158), which seem to us to have great weight, and which we now quote and reaffirm:

"As to the criterion on which the apportionment of the expenses of government should be made, if this is to be the population, we respectfully submit that in this case it should be the free population—the citizenship—and not the total of the free and the slave population. The care and policing of the slaves cost the State little or nothing. Those matters were regulated by their masters on the plantations. Of course, none of them could vote; but upon the "mixed basis" of representation which was partially adopted in Virginia, they counted to some extent in fixing the basis of representation in the General Assembly: that is, five negroes counted as much as three white men, where the mixed basis prevailed.

"The debt was contracted solely by the votes of the white population or their representatives. It was expended by them or under laws of their enactment. The taxes were levied exclusively upon the property of the free population; and the revenues were appropriated and expended as they directed, and exclusively for their benefit.

"The negroes owed no part of the debt, did not constitute a part of the citizenship of the State during any part of the period when the debt was contracted, or the money realized from it was expended; nor were they any part of the body politic.

"Under these circumstances we would submit as a just criterion for such apportionment the white population of the territory embraced in West Virginia, and of the territory still remaining to the Commonwealth, at the times when the expenditures to be apportioned were made."

Now, we beg leave, by way of comparison with the amounts thus arrived at under the method prescribed by the Wheeling Ordinance fairly and equitably construed and applied, to give the results reached, if, discarding the Ordinance, we state the account upon the principles of Equity and Public Law reasonably applied to the facts of the case.

Ascertained in accordance with the principles of Equity and Public Law, fairly applied to the facts of the case, we have, as we have already seen, as West Virginia's share of the debt on the 1st of January, 1861:

(a) Computing the same on the combined basis of territorial area, population, and assessed valuation of lands in the two States.....	$9,652,768.83
(b) On the basis of assessed valuation of the lands in the two States taken as the only factor.....	7,383,189.44

And per contra ascertained under the Wheeling Ordinance:

(c) Apportioning ordinary expenses according to white population	$9,910,960.20
(d) Apportioning ordinary expenses according to the Federal basis, counting three-fifths of the slaves	7,620,087.59

The approximation of these results is something more than a coincidence, and goes far to show that an equitable result can and will be attained by pursuing either method, fairly applying the same to the facts of the case.

In view of the long lapse of time since the assumption by West Virginia by the terms of the 8th Section of Article VIII of her first Constitution of an equitable proportion of the then debt of the Commonwealth and the stipulation thereby made for the payment of the accruing interest thereon, the matter of interest is obviously the most important item in the account between the two States.

That question is so fully considered, and Virginia's equitable right to a decree for interest is so conclusively shown in the treatment of that subject found at pages 94 to 107 of our opening brief upon the present hearing, that we are content to refer the court to that discussion as fairly presenting our views.

Part III of defendant's brief in its complete form was not received by counsel for Virginia until the 2nd and 3rd instant.

It would be impossible in the time permitted for filing this brief to reply to, or even to notice the numerous points made therein; nor is any such reply necessary, for the distinguished counsel has failed to meet the positions taken by the Master, supported as they are by reason and authority, or to answer the arguments submitted in our opening brief in any important particular.

Especially is this true as to the question of classifying the annual interest on the State debt as one of the ordinary expenses of the State.

Defendant's counsel claim that the weight of authority is against such classification.

The Master's report and the opening brief for complainant show that the uniform and practically universal rule of the national, State, city, town and county governments in this country, and as is shown also to be the case as to the governments of Europe, so far as there is any information given on that subject, is to classify interest on a public debt as an ordinary governmental expense; and that this rule is sanctioned by publicists, political economists, and the courts.

Particularly should this rule control in this case, or else palpable inequity would be done; for the season that under the Wheeling Ordinance West Virginia is to be credited with all the taxes which she must have paid into the State Treasury during the debt period on account of that interest. Being given this large credit it would be right that she should also be charged with her just proportion of the annually recurring interest paid out of those very taxes, as the Master has done; and palpably unjust and inequitable to exonerate her from such a charge.

With this concise response to the elaborate briefs of the learned counsel for the defendant, we respectfully submit this cause to the consideration and judgment of the court.

CHAP. 344.—An ACT for the retirement of bonds held by schools and colleges, and the issuing of registered certificates therefor, and providing for the payment of interest thereon.

Approved February 23, 1892.

Whereas, the friends of education have voluntarily contributed many millions of dollars for the establishment of schools and colleges in different parts of the State of Virginia, a large portion of which has been expended in the purchase of lands and the erection of suitable buildings thereon, and the residue held as permanent endowments, about two millions of which are in State bonds; and

Whereas, it appears from acts passed by the general assembly in eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, and at various other times since then, to be the settled policy of the State to encourage these efforts for the education of her citizens, and to co-operate with the generous donors of her bonds, by paying full interest thereon so long as they shall be held as endowments for educational purposes; and

Whereas, it is proper that all obligations of the State held by schools and colleges be of the same character, and on the same footing; therefore,

1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of Virginia, That the schools, colleges, and other educational organizations hereinafter named, shall, through their duly authorized officers or agents, on or before the first day of July, eighteen hundred and ninety-two, surrender to the second auditor all evidences of the State's indebtedness which they hold as endowments for educational purposes.

2. That said auditor shall make and keep a record of all bonds and other evidences of the State's indebtedness so surrendered to him, and shall, in the presence of the auditor of public accounts and treasurer, cancel all such evidences of debt, and issue to those by whom they have been surrendered registered certificates of debt for the respective amounts of the bonds and other evidences of debt surrendered by them.

3. That these certificates shall be non-transferable and redeemable at the pleasure of the State, and shall set forth that the State of Virginia is due the respective schools, colleges, and other educational organizations of learning to which they are issued the sums named therein, and that interest thereon shall be paid semi-annually at the rates and for the amounts now paid by the Commonwealth, as set forth in the report of the second auditor for the fiscal year ending September thirtieth, eighteen hundred and ninety-one, including in addition thereto interest on the amount herein named held by the Randolph-Macon's woman's college, at the rates set forth in the bonds it holds, so long as they are held as endowments for educational purposes.

4. That the second auditor shall, upon the first day of January and July of each year, draw his warrant upon the auditor of public accounts in favor of the following holders of the said certificates for the respective amounts due them at the aforesaid rate of interest upon the following sums, to-wit:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

vs.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

BRIEF FOR THE DEFENDANT.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE UPON DEMURRER.

On January first, 1861, Virginia was indebted on account of the issuance of bonds at various times prior thereto in the aggregate amount of $31,800,712.90, upon which past due interest including the interest maturing on that date amounted to $1,045,183.01.

On July first, 1863, a date ten days subsequently to the admission of West Virginia as a State into the Union, the bill shows a public indebtedness of the plaintiff, including principal of said bonds and the interest accrued and unpaid thereon, amounting in the aggregate to $39,098,922.00. Of this sum, $5,954,716.08 is interest, and the residue, $33,141,212.92, is principal, representing the entire indebtedness against the State of Virginia at the time of the formation and admission into the Union of West Virginia. This indebtedness was held by private owners of bonds which Virginia had issued and sold upon her own account.

In 1871 the Legislature of Virginia passed an act providing for the funding and payment of her public debt, in which, among other things, there is recited that the people of Virginia being anxious for the prompt liquidation of her portion of the said debt, which was estimated by said act to be two-thirds of the entire indebtedness incurred by the State of Virginia, and also suggesting that the authorities of West Virginia might prefer to pay that State's portion of the said indebtedness to the holders thereof, and to enable the State of West Virginia to settle her portion of the said debt with the holders thereof, allotted to West Virginia by her own ex parte and gratuitous act the payment of the other third of said debt. The act provides for the surrender of the old and the acceptance of the new bonds of Virginia for two-thirds of the amount of said aggregate indebtedness, and the issuance to the owners or holders of the other one-third of the amount due upon the old bonds, certificates bearing the same date as the new bonds representing the funded debt of Virginia, setting forth the form of the bond which is not funded, and the payment thereof to be provided for in accordance with such settlement as might thereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia.

In 1879 a further act was passed by the Legislature of Virginia regarding her said debt, which provides, among other things, for the issuance of certificates on West Virginia to the holders of the old bonds who had not already received such certificates, and that the State of Virginia would aid the holders of certificates issued by Virginia, in negotiating with the State of West Virginia for an amicable settlement of all the claims of such creditors holding the certificates issued by Virginia against the State of West Virginia, and that the acceptance of such certificates for West Virginia's one-third issued under the acts of the Legislature of Virginia, should be taken and held as a full and absolute release of Virginia from all liability on account of said certificates.

In 1882 another act was passed by the Legislature for the express purpose of ascertaining and declaring Virginia's equitable share of the debt created before and actually existing at the time the State of West Virginia was formed, the design of which act was to make a full settlement of said debt, and thus present a true state of the account between Virginia and her creditors, which embodies a recital to that effect, and which provides for the issuance of certain certificates by the Commonwealth of Virginia, covering the one-third of her indebtedness claimed to be payable by the State of West Virginia, and there is recited in the form of said certificate that the Commonwealth of Virginia has discharged her equitable share of her debt evidenced by such certificate, leaving a balance with interest to be accounted for by the State of West Virginia, without recourse upon the Commonwealth of Virginia. These certificates were accordingly issued by Virginia and received and accepted by the holders of that part of the original debt represented by said certificates, all of the old bonds surrendered to the Commonwealth of Virginia and cancelled, and Virginia thereby relieved from all liability on her own account to the holders of the West Virginia deferred certificates.

The only obligation left upon Virginia after the issuance of these deferred certificates purporting to represent West Virginia's portion of the debt of Virginia gratuitously fixed ex parte by the State of Virginia, and accepted by the holders of that part of the original debt of Virginia in settlement thereof, was to use her offices and endeavors to effect payment thereof, or its adjustment in some way, by the State of West Virginia. By this arrangement, effected alone by the State of Virginia with her creditors, she was relieved from all substantial liability—in fact from any pecuniary liability—as to the one-third of her indebtedness created by her prior to the formation and admission into the Union of the State of West Virginia.

This suit was instituted in part for the recovery of that portion of the debt of Virginia created prior to and existing on June 20, 1863, the date of the admission of West Virginia into the Union and is the gravamen of the complainant's bill.

Another claim asserted by said bill is an alleged indebtedness evidenced by the bonds of Virginia and other liabilities held by and due to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund of said State, as created under her laws, amounting, the former to $1,462,993.00, and the latter to $1,543,669.00, as of the date of January first, 1861.

This cannot be treated as a debt within the meaning of that term to be asserted against the State of West Virginia, because these Commissioners were simply agents for the management and control of a part of the internal fiscal affairs of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and the use of which was and is available only to the State of Virginia for the advancement of her own peculiar State interests.

Another and further claim made by the said bill is for the collection or payment for all property, real, personal and mixed, owned by or appertaining to the said State of Virginia, and being within the boundaries of the State of West Virginia, which passed to and became the property of the latter State, and was taken and appropriated to her own use by the State under the provisions of an act passed by the State of Virginia, in February, 1863, the bill alleging that the property passing to the State of West Virginia under and by virtue of the said act, consisted of a number of items alleged to amount in the aggregate to several millions of dollars, the exact amount of which complainant, it is alleged, is unable to definitely ascertain and state.

These three classes of claims made by the complainant in her bill constitute the sum total of the demand made by her against the defendant in this suit.

The first effort of Virginia to fund her said debt was the Act of the General Assembly approved March 30, 1871, in which she declared her portion thereof to be two-thirds, and provided a plan for its funding and payment, and as to the residue thereof this Act declares:

> "Upon the surrender of the old and the acceptance of the new bond for two-thirds of the amount due as provided in the last preceding section, there shall be issued to the owner or owners, for the other one-third of the amount due upon the old bond, stock or certificate of indebtedness so surrendered, a certificate bearing the same date as the new bond, setting forth the amount of the bond which is not funded as provided in the last preceding section, and that payment of said amount with interest thereon at the rate prescribed in the bond surrendered, will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia existing at the time of its dismemberment, and that the State of Virginia holds said bonds, so far as unfunded, in trust for the holder or his assignees; and provided further, that until such final settlement with West Virginia, there shall be paid upon what are known as sterling bonds, in the manner now prescribed by law, two-thirds of the interest accruing on the principal of said bonds, after July first, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, and for the interest accrued to said date certificates dated on that day shall be issued, drawing the same rate of interest as the bonds, two-thirds of which shall be paid as provided to be paid on the bonds. The remaining one-third of unpaid interest, both on the bonds and certificates, shall be payable in money, and the principal of said certificates in new sterling bonds of the same character as the old, in accordance with such final settlement as shall be made with West Virginia."

(Plaintiff's Bill, pp. 14, 15.)

Under the terms of this statute Virginia still remained liable for the payment of her entire debt including the one-third, unfunded, for which deferred payment certificates were to be issued, payable upon final settlement between Virginia and West Virginia.

The next effort of Virginia to adjust her bonded indebtedness created prior to the formation of West Virginia as a State, was the Act of her General Assembly, approved March 28, 1879, whereby she provided an abatement of the rate of interest and divided her then outstanding indebtedness into two classes, as follows:

> "Class I, which shall be taken to include all tax-receivable coupon bonds, and all registered bonds and fractional certificates which are convertible under the act approved March thirtieth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, into such tax-receivable coupon bonds.
>
> "Class II, which shall be taken to include all bonds funded under the act approved March thirtieth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, as amended by the act approved March seventh, eighteen hundred and seventy-two; and also two-thirds of the face value, with two-thirds of the unpaid accrued interest up to the first of July, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, on all unfunded bonds, including sterling bonds."

This act also further declares as to the liability of West Virginia touching the said indebtedness of the complainant, as follows:

> "The owners of all classes of bonds mentioned in this act, who shall exchange their securities for the bonds created under this act, and who shall not have yet received certificates representing the remaining one-third of their principal and interest, due and payable by the State of West Virginia, shall receive certificates of a like character to those issued under the act of March thirtieth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, when they make such exchange, and the State of Virginia will negotiate or aid the creditors holding all of such certificates issued, under this act, or previous acts, in negotiating with the State of West Virginia for an amicable settlement of the claims of such creditors against the State of West Virginia. The acceptance of the said certificates for West Virginia's one-third, issued under this act, shall be taken and held as a full and absolute release of the State of Virginia from all liability on account of said certificates."
> (Plaintiff's Bill, p. 19.)

Under these acts of the Legislature of Virginia, nearly if not quite all of her said indebtedness was funded on the basis prescribed by these enactments, thus relieving her of all liability upon the one-third part of her original antebellum obligations.

A third expression of Virginia touching her said debt, so far as the same relates to West Virginia, is that embraced in an Act of her Legislature approved February 14, 1882, which is entitled as follows:

> "An act to ascertain and declare Virginia's equitable share of the debt created before and actually existing at the time of the partition of her territory and resources and to provide for the issuance of bonds covering the same, and the regular and prompt payment of interest thereon."

This act contains an extended preamble setting forth what purports to be an account between the state and her creditors, showing the aggregate of principal and interest in two distinct totals in separate columns, declaring the assumption of two-thirds thereof as her equitable portion, fixing the total amount of this equitable portion as of July 1st, 1882, at $21,035,377.15, and then provides for the funding of this debt by the issuance of bonds drawing interest at the rate of three per cent.

This act also further provides as follows:

> "For all balances of such indebtedness, constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt, principal and interest, in the settlement of Virginia's equitable share as aforesaid, the said board of sinking fund commissioners shall issue a certificate, as follows:
>
> "No. .....
>
> "The Commonwealth of Virginia has this day discharged her equitable share of the (registered or coupon, as the case may be) bond for ..... dollars, held by ....., dated the .... day of ....., and numbered ....., leaving a balance of ..... dollars, with interest from ....., to be accounted for by the State of West Virginia, without recourse upon this Commonwealth,

"Done at the capitol of the State of Virginia, this ..... day of ..... eighteen .....

"....., Second Auditor.

"....., Treasurer."

(Plaintiff's Bill, pp. 28, 29.)

A further act of the General Assembly of Virginia was passed, approved February 20, 1892, which bears the following title:

> "An act to provide for the settlement of the public debt of Virginia not funded under the provisions of an act entitled an act to ascertain and declare Virginia's equitable share of the debt created before and actually existing at the time of the partition of her territory and resources, and to provide for the issuance of bonds covering the same, and the regular and prompt payment of the interest thereon, approved February 14, 1882."

This act provided for the issuance of nineteen millions of dollars in bonds in lieu of twenty-eight million dollars of outstanding obligations of Virginia, not funded under the act approved February 14, 1882, hereinbefore mentioned, and prescribed the form of the new bonds to be issued under this act and the coupons thereof.

This act also provides that in taking up these outstanding bonds before issuing new bonds in lieu thereof there shall be deducted "one third of the principal and interest of such obligations as were issued prior to the thirtieth day of March, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, and also deducting one-third of the principal and interest of such obligations as are issued under the act approved the thirtieth day of March, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, as do include West Virginia's portion."

This act further provides as follows:

> "For all balances of the indebtedness, constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt, principal and interest, in the settlement of Virginia's equitable share of the bonds authorized to be exchanged under this act, the said share having been heretofore determined by the commonwealth of Virginia, the said commissioners shall issue certificates substantially in the following form, viz:
>
> "No. ..... The Commonwealth of Virginia has this day discharged her equitable share of the (registered or coupon, as the case may be) bond for .....dollars, dated ..... day of ....., and No. ....., leaving a balance of ..... dollars with interest from ..... to be accounted for to the holder of this certificate by the State of West Virginia, without recourse upon this Commonwealth.
>
> "Done at the capitol of the State of Virginia, this ..... day of ....., eighteen hundred and ninety-two.
>
> "....., Second Auditor.
> "....., Treasurer.

By virtue of this act of legislation Virginia made a further considerable reduction of the principal of her debt and received a more favorable rate of interest and better terms as to its payment.

After the lapse of about two years from the approval of the act last named a joint resolution was adopted by the legislature of Virginia, entitled as follows:

> "A joint resolution to provide for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia, for the application of whatever may be received from West Virginia to the payment of those found to be entitled to the same."

This resolution was approved March 6, 1894, and in its preamble refers to the acts by their titles, passed by the General Assembly of Virginia relating to her debt, concluding the preamble of this resolution as follows:

> "Whereas the present State of Virginia has settled and adjusted, to the entire satisfaction of her people and the creditors, the liability assumed by her on account of two-thirds of the debt of the original state."
> (Plaintiff's Bill, p. 40.)

The resolution then creates a commission "authorized and directed to negotiate with the State of West Virginia a settlement and adjustment of the proportion of the public debt of the original state of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia."

> "But said commission shall not proceed with said negotiation until assurances satisfactory to the commission shall have been received from the holders of a majority in amount of said certificates, exclusive of those held by the state through the agency of the board of education and sinking fund commissioners, that they desire the said commission to enter into and undertake such negotiation, and will accept the amount so ascertained to be paid by the State of West Virginia in full settlement of the one-third of the debt of the original State of Virginia which has not been assumed by the present State of Virginia. But said commission shall in no event enter into any negotiation hereunder except upon the basis that Virginia is bound only for the two-thirds of the debt of the original state which she has already provided for as her equitable proportion thereof.
> "All expenses incurred by said commission and said board of arbitrators, including reasonable compensation of the members thereof, shall be paid out of the proceeds of such settlement or by the holders of said certificates who are the beneficiaries of such settlement, but without subjecting the state to any expense on this account."

A further act was passed by the Virginia legislature, approved March 6, 1900, reciting the previous acts of said legislature relating to the public debt of said state, and also reciting that,

> "Whereas in each of said acts provision is made for issuing to creditors of the original State of Virginia who should accept the new bonds provided for by said several acts, certificates for such proportion of the obligation surrendered by them as was deemed proper to be borne by the State of West Virginia, to wit: One-third of the amount of said obligations, of which certificates this state holds a large amount, through the agency of the commissioners of its sinking fund and literary fund, and * * *
> "Whereas, it appears that while Virginia has satisfactorily settled the two-thirds of the original debt which she assumed, yet it is possible that complications will arise with respect to said certificates which will render it desirable that she should endeavor to secure an adjustment thereof upon terms which will protect herself, but will work no injustice to West Virginia, and thus finally dispose of the only question remaining unsettled in connection with said debt * * * and take upon deposit the certificates aforesaid, or have the same otherwise held or placed on deposit subject to their control upon an agreement and contract on the part of the holders of said certificates that if the said commission will secure a settlement with West Virginia with respect to said certificates the holders of said certificates so deposited will accept the amount realized on such settlement from West Virginia on said certificates as a full settlement of all their claims thereunder. If at least two-thirds in amount of said certificates issued under the act of eighteen hundred and seventy-one, exclusive of those held by the State through the agency of the board of education and sinking fund commissioners, and at least a majority in amount of all the other certificates aforesaid shall be deposited or placed subject to the control of the said commission upon the agreement and contract aforesaid, then the said commission shall be authorized and empowered by and with the advice and approval of the attorney general of Virginia, to take such action and institute such proceedings on behalf of the state as may, in the judgment of said commission and attorney general, be needful and proper to protect the interest of the state and bring about and carry into effect a settlement as aforesaid. All the expenses involved in connection with any of the matters aforesaid shall be borne by the certificate holders, as provided in the joint resolution aforesaid, and the state shall not be subject to any expense on that account."

In accordance with the provisions and requirements of said act approved March 6, 1900, said commission entered into an arrangement with the duly authorized representatives of the holders of the deferred certificates issued by Virginia, without recourse upon her and received by her creditors in settlement of one-third of the original debt, whereby said commission reduced to its possession and control more than five-sixths of the entire amount of these certificates outstanding and the said commission now holds said certificates in trust for the present owners thereof, the amount of which certificates has, no doubt, largely increased since the institution of this suit, as indicated by a statement contained in the report of said commission submitted to the General Assembly of Virginia, thus placing in the possession of said commission nearly or quite all of said certificates.

The ownership of these certificates held by said commission is still in the original holders of the old debt of Virginia, and their possession by said commission is solely for the purpose of giving color to the institution of a suit in this court by the state to promote the collection of an alleged debt payable—not to the plaintiff—but to various private persons represented by the committee who assembled these certificates and turned them over to the said commission.

That this is the extent of the interest which the said commission created by the State of Virginia has in the said certificates, a demand for the payment of which constitutes the gravamen of the bill filed in this suit, is clearly apparent from the agreement entered into between the said commission and the committee representing the holders of said certificates, and the parts of said agreement relating to this feature of the case are here copied and are as follows:

> "The said Virginia commission hereby stipulate and agree by and with the advice and approval of the attorney general of Virginia, that, in their judgment, it is needful and proper, in order to protect the interests of the state and bring about and carry into effect a settlement in the premises, that a suit should be instituted in the name of the State of Virginia against the State of West Virginia in the Supreme Court of the United States, asking for an adjudication and settlement by that court of the matters aforesaid unsettled and undetermined between the two states, arising and growing out of the debt of the original State of Virginia before its dismemberment and on account of which said deferred certificates were issued, the same to be brought and instituted as provided in the act of the General Assembly of Virginia of March 6, 1900, referred to in the said contract of December 14, 1904; and the said Virginia commission acting by and with the advice and approval of the attorney general of that state, do hereby undertake and agree that such a suit shall be brought against the State of West Virginia for the purpose of obtaining a settlement as aforesaid, as soon as the pleadings, papers and documents relating thereto can be conveniently and properly drawn up and prepared for presentation to the said court, which said suit shall be instituted, conducted and proceeded with in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the said act of the General Assembly of Virginia and the joint resolution of the General Assembly of March 6, 1894, also referred to in said contract of December 14, 1904; but the power to make and carry into effect a settlement and adjustment in the premises by agreement with West Virginia, as to the deferred certificates placed subject to the control of the commission as aforesaid, as provided in the previous contracts aforesaid, shall remain vested in the said commission, notwithstanding the institution and pendency of such suit.

"And the Virginia commission do further undertake and agree that, in accordance with the terms and conditions of the said joint resolution and Act of the General Assembly of Virginia, they will account for, pay over and deliver such amount, either in cash or securities, as may be realized from West Virginia through any settlement made by the said commission with that State, either by means of an adjudication or a recovery in said suit or otherwise, for or on account of the deferred certificates now or hereafter deposited and placed subject to their control as aforesaid, to the said Depositing Committee in full settlement and satisfaction of all claims under said certificates; and the said Depositing Committee agree on behalf of the depositors of said deferred certificates so placed to the control of the said commission and on behalf of those entitled to the benefit of said certificates as assignees of said depositors or otherwise to accept as aforesaid such amount, either in cash or securities, as may be determined or ascertained in any such suit to be due by, or as may be realized through any adjustment or settlement as aforesaid from the State of West Virginia on account of the said certificates, and on account of the bonds represented by and mentioned in the said certificates respectively, in full settlement and satisfaction of all claims on account of said certificates and on account of the bonds therein mentioned, and to accept and take such adjudication against the State of West Virginia in full discharge and acquittance of all claims in the premises against the State of Virginia.

"It is further understood and agreed that if from any cause the said commission shall fail or be unable to bring about such adjustment or settlement, or to obtain a determination or ascertainment of the liability of West Virginia as hereinbefore provided for, then it shall be the duty of the said commission to restore to the control of the said Depositing Committee all such deferred certificates as may have been placed subject to the control and disposal of the said commission as aforesaid."

We have thus given in brief outlines the material facts appearing upon the face of the record of the bill and its exhibits, and which declare the true and legal status of this suit at its very threshold.

The Propositions Raised by the Demurrer.

The case as made by the bill and its exhibits presents several vital points for consideration arising upon the demurrer interposed by the defendant, which may be thus particularized:

I. Is this a controversy between two states within the meaning of section 2, art. 3 of the Constitution?

II. Does the complainant have such an interest in the subject matter of litigation or in the result thereof, so far as the deferred certificates are concerned, as to give her standing in a court of equity?

III. Have not the real owners of these certificates such a substantial interest and right of ownership therein as to make them indispensable parties, and whose presence would oust the court of jurisdiction in respect to this feature of the bill?

IV. Does the fact that the commissioners of the Sinking Fund and Literary Fund of Virginia have in their possession certain small portions of these certificates thus issued by the plaintiff to herself give her any cause of action against the defendant in respect thereto?

V. Does the claim for property transferred by the plaintiff to the defendant contained within the boundaries of the territory out of which West Virginia was erected into an independent state, create any right of action on the part of Virginia against her for the value of this property?

VI. If this does afford the plaintiff a cause of action must it not be asserted at law, and not in a court of equity?

VII. Does the bill disclose any authority from Virginia directing a suit for the recovery of the value of property transferred by her and used by the defendant?

Relation of Virginia to the Old Debt.

In determining whether the bill and its exhibits present a controversy between two states within the meaning of section 2, article 3, of the Constitution, the relation of Virginia to her old debt will not be overlooked. Before the formation of West Virginia it must be conceded that Virginia was morally and legally bound for the whole debt which she had created by the issuance and sale of her bonds. At that time her entire territory was intact and all her resources unimpaired, in so far as they were not affected by the ravages of war, for which, of course, her creditors were not responsible.

In 1862, of her own accord, she parted with a portion of her territory, and gave her free consent to the creation of a new and independent state out of the territory by her thus surrendered. This, however, did not impair her liability upon this debt, nor any part thereof, to her creditors holding the bonds which she had issued, or in any manner lessen her obligation for their payment.

This must be conceded upon the well recognized principles of international law.

Taylor, Int. Pub. Law, pp. 203, 204, Sec. 166.
Halleck, Int. Law Vol. 1, p. 76.
Hall, Int. Law, Sec. 27.

Mr. Taylor in his recent and very able and clear treatment of the effect of a dismemberment of a state upon its obligations, presents the subject in two aspects: First, when a portion of its territory and population have been taken by conquest to form an integral part of another state; second, when the severed territory is erected into a new and independent state. We are interested in the latter feature of the subject, upon which this distinguished author says:

> "A narrower and more technical rule prevails when the parent state is deprived of a portion of its territory which is erected into an entirely distinct political community. The cogent reason in such case is that as a man who loses an arm or leg in battle is not thereby relieved of any part of his obligations, so a state that is so dismembered as to suffer no loss of identity remains bound as before for its entire general indebtedness. 'Such a change,' says Hallock, 'no more affects its rights and duties than a change in its internal organization, or in the person of its rulers. This doctrine applies to debts due to as well as from the state, and to its rights of property and treaty obligations, except so far as such obligations may have particular reference to the revolted or dismembered territory or province.' In other words, as the old state continues its corporate life without interruption, it retains all general state property, and all general benefits resulting from treaties, with full liability for all general obligations with which the new creation taken from its side may disavow all legal connection."

The high moral obligation and legal duty on her part to meet her indebtedness still remained, with the right to treat, upon terms fair and just, with her creditors, for its adjustment and settlement. Accordingly, therefore, Virginia proposed to treat with her creditors with reference to the debt she had contracted, and submitted to them through her legislative department a proposition for its adjustment and ultimate liquidation. The terms of settlement were those which she herself proposed, and were met by her creditors in a broad spirit of liberality and compromise.

As the basis of settlement Virginia offered to pay two-thirds of her old or original debt by the issuance of new bonds by her, resting this proposition upon the consideration that one-third of her territory had passed to the new state after the debt had been contracted, proposing to issue contemporaneously with such new bonds certificates payable by West Virginia, for the other third of the debt, which Virginia did not feel inclined to pay for the reason just stated, and these certificates were accepted by the creditors without recourse upon Virginia, in payment or settlement of this one-third of her debt, thereby releasing Virginia from the payment of the one-third of her old original debt.

Thus Virginia adjusted and settled her former indebtedness contracted prior to June 20, 1863, on the basis and upon the terms fixed by herself and by negotiations to which she and her creditors alone were parties.

As a part of the consideration of this settlement with her creditors, Virginia agreed to aid them in collecting these certificates from West Virginia, amicably if she could, but by an action if necessary.

By this composition with her creditors Virginia extinguished her old debt—the one for any part of which West Virginia was, or could have been made, liable to the owners or holders thereof—and created a new debt of her own, in the creation of which West Virginia had no part or agency.

This new debt Virginia herself recognizes as her own, for which she alone is liable, and does not by this suit, or in any other manner, seek to make West Virginia liable, or for any part thereof.

This new debt, founded upon the consideration of a liability attaching to the old one, constitutes a valid and subsisting obligation of Virginia, and her promise to aid the holders of the certificates issued by her against West Virginia is a mere collateral agreement, and does not add to or detract from the validity of the new debt.

Thus it will be perceived that Virginia has discharged her obligation to her creditors arising from the debt which she contracted before the division of her territory, and in that debt she is no longer interested pecuniarily, and that the only persons who are so interested are the owners of the certificates representing the one-third of the original debt.

The only claim which the holders of these certificates have upon Virginia, so far as these certificates are concerned, rests upon her promise to aid in their collection, which is but collateral, and can only be construed to mean that she will exert her moral influence to constrain West Virginia to recognize so much of the old debt as may be represented by the aggregate of these certificates.

The Status of West Virginia with Reference to the Old Debt of Virginia.

Initiatory to the formation of the new state, on August 20th, 1861, Virginia, through the convention which had restored the government of the State of Virginia, promulgated an ordinance to provide for the formation of a new state out of a portion of that state, in which, among other things, is the following declaration as to the debt of Virginia:

"The new state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all the state expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government since any part of the said debt was contracted and deducting therefrom all the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new state during said period."

This is Virginia's own declaration made as aforesaid as to how West Virginia's part or share of the old debt shall be ascertained and determined. And if the same were obligatory, the means of reaching a proper conclusion on this basis have always been within the possession and exclusive control of Virginia. They are to be found in her own archives of state, which have at all times been in the custody of her own officers.

The Constitution of the new state at the time of her admission into the Union contained with reference to said debt, the following provision:

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this state, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

The constitution containing this clause was framed and adopted subsequently to the adoption of the ordinance aforesaid by the State of Virginia.

The ordinance and legislation of Virginia looking to and providing for the erection of a new state out of a part of her own territory, were adopted and passed without the privity or consent of her creditors.

Then upon the division of the territory of Virginia, if the obligation of West Virginia, as claimed by some, to the creditors of Virginia became a joint liability as to which the two states were bound, and it appears to have been so regarded by Virginia, as the course she has pursued with reference thereto would seem to indicate, this suit as to said debt cannot be maintained.

Because, when the creditors of Virginia accepted new bonds in payment of the old bonds and surrendered the latter for cancellation and such cancellation was effected, all liability upon the part of West Virginia ceased and determined, and the issuance of certificates by the State of Virginia, mere ex parte memoranda, to be paid by West Virginia, was a mere gratuity which could not operate as a modus to give vitality to any part of the old debt which Virginia had fully discharged by her own composition with her creditors.

Here was an act of one claiming to be jointly liable with another whereby that one pays in new evidences of debt two-thirds of it, with an agreement of release as to the entire liability which must by the very act itself operate as a discharge of the other debtor. This must be the effect upon the well recognized principle of the law of contracts that the discharge of one joint obligor relieves the other from liability, in the absence of a valid stipulation to the contrary to which the parties in interest are privy.

It may be contended, however, that the principle here relied on does not apply to the transactions of sovereign states in matters of public concern. Nevertheless, when governments come into courts of justice for the determination of a controversy, they submit themselves to the ordinary rules of law which govern in such cases, and the same principles which would apply to private persons are also applicable to them. When they become suitors they no longer occupy the lofty attitude of sovereigns, so as to place themselves above and beyond the ordinary standards of right and wrong, but in the very nature and condition of things, these standards must be invoked or the courts themselves could not act as judicial tribunals.

If this were not so, the court's proceedings would necessarily be discretionary and capricious, without any established rules to govern their action. This is the principle which obtains and governs in cases of this character, even though the proceedings be by suit in equity.

This is Not a Controversy Between Two States.

As already shown, Virginia has been released from the payment of one-third of her debt contracted before the formation of West Virginia, and has arranged for the payment of the two-thirds thereof by new bonds issued by her, and that she has no substantial interest in the third thereof for which she issued her own certificates without recourse upon herself, to be paid by West Virginia, the old bonds having been surrendered and canceled.

The record discloses that she has no interest in these certificates, as they impose no obligation upon her, and leave the creditors without any right of action or demand against her upon the failure or refusal of West Virginia to assume their payment. It also appears from the record of the bill and its exhibits that upon the failure of the commission into whose hands these certificates were placed to collect these certificates, that they are to be surrendered to the committee representing the owners thereof, and in the event that suit should be brought by Virginia against West Virginia, that the owners are to defray all expenses including the fees of counsel, and that no decree can be entered in this cause that will inure to the benefit of the plaintiff.

No one can examine the bill and its exhibits in this suit without being satisfied beyond all doubt that it is in legal effect commenced and now prosecuted, so far as said certificates representing the old debt are concerned, solely by the owners thereof and for their benefit and not for the State of Virginia. No decree as to these certificates can inure to the benefit of Virginia. Her only relation to them is her assurance to their holders that she will aid them by bringing suit in reference thereto at the expense of the owners. She is the merest nominal plaintiff carrying on the suit in her own name with an immunity from all costs of any character whatsoever.

This suit is governed, so far as the demand respecting the old debt of Virginia is concerned, by the well settled principles already laid down by this Honorable Court in the following cases:

New Hampshire v. Louisiana, and New York v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76, 27 Law. ed. 656.

See also in this connection Re Hartung, 98 Wis. 140, 73 N. W. 988; People v. General Electric Ry. Co., 172 Ill. 129, 50 N. E. 158.

To create a controversy between two states, it seems to us that there must be an assertion of a substantial right of one state as such which is denied or repudiated by the other, and which relates to the interests of each as states, and that the determination of the issue thus raised will promote or secure some substantial right of the one or the other of these states as states.

This may be illustrated by some of the decided cases, in each of which it was held that the contention involved a controversy between states.

New Jersey v. New York, 5 Pet. 285, 8 L. ed. 127; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. 657, 9 L. ed. 1233; Florida v. Georgia, 11 Howard 293, 13 Law. ed. 702; Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall. 39, 20 L. ed. 67, were cases in equity and all involved state boundaries; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Company, 9 How., 657; 13 L. ed. 294; S. C. 11 How. 528, 13 Law. ed. 799; S. C. 13 How. 518, 14 Law. ed. 249; S. C., 18 How. 429, 15 Law. ed. 436, was a case in equity involving the free and unobstructed navigation of the Ohio river which caused a special damage to the plaintiff state for which there was no adequate remedy at law.

These cases just cited present an exercise of jurisdiction in cases directly affecting the property rights and interests of a state and that over lands and their inhabitants claimed by the states themselves.

Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U. S. 206, 45 L. ed. 497, involved a case in which the health and comfort of the inhabitants of a state were threatened.

South Dakota v. North Carolina, 192 U. S. 289, 48 L. ed. 488, was a suit in which the plaintiff sought the enforcement of the payment of a debt belonging exclusively to the plaintiff and no one else had any interest therein, and the jurisdiction was sustained by a majority of the court.

In the suit now before the court what interest can Virginia claim against West Virginia in certificates that do not belong to her and in which she can assert no interest? She cannot maintain a suit to vindicate her integrity in the matter of the issuance of these certificates. This is entirely too flimsy to constitute the basis of a controversy, and besides this, the act or its motives has not been assailed or questioned by West Virginia.

The conclusion is irresistible that Virginia has no interest in this suit so far as it is designed to enforce payment of the debt represented by said certificates, that it is being prosecuted for their owners and that as to such matters there is no controversy between the two states, and that the bill as to this matter must be dismissed.

II.

THE COMPLAINANT HAS NOT SHOWN SUCH INTEREST IN THE DEFERRED CERTIFICATES AS GIVES HER ANY STANDING IN A COURT OF EQUITY.

Does the Commonwealth of Virginia have such an interest in the subject matter of litigation or in the result thereof, so far as the deferred certificates are concerned, as to give her any standing in a court of equity in relation thereto?

As we have already seen, the former owners of the old debt are the present owners of these certificates; that they were placed in the hands of a committee whose members these owners had chosen, and this committee delivered the certificates to a commission selected under a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia, who were empowered to collect these certificates for the owners at the sole expense of such owners.

The right of Virginia to maintain a suit as sole plaintiff therein, must be determined by the well settled rules of equity practice as recognized and enforced by the English Court of Chancery, and as understood and applied by this Court.

Virginia has no interest in these certificates, nor can her interests be in any manner affected by a decree in relation to these certificates.

She is not a guarantor because their issuance is based upon the condition of her non-liability in any event, and as a consideration of her release from all liability upon these certificates, and the portion of the debts represented by them, she issued new bonds for her old debt, and was acquitted from all obligation as to these certificates. In what way can she be interested in this suit so far as it relates to these certificates? Does her interest at most exceed that of a mere committee representing the holders thereof? Has she any connection with them except by her agreement to aid their holders in an effort to enforce their collection? Has she not constituted herself a mere medium for the institution of this suit in her own name for the use and benefit of the holders and owners of these certificates?

If she has any connection with this part of the suit it is as its mere promoter, by virtue of her promise to the holders of the certificates—an agent for them—only an instrumentality for the institution of this suit.

This is not such interest as to support a suit in equity. The plaintiff's interest must be as substantial and certain as that of the defendant.

A person having no interest, legal or equitable, in land, beyond a mere possession, cannot maintain a bill in respect thereto.

Smith v. Hollenbeck, 46 Ill. 252.
Smith v. Brittenham, 109 Ill. 540.

> "A complainant in chancery must have an interest in the subject matter of the controversy. Unless a complainant has some interest in the property in controversy his bill cannot be maintained."
> Smith v. Hollenbeck, supra.

In Smith v. Brittenham, supra, the court in its opinion, discussing the insufficiency or want of interest in the plaintiff to maintain the suit, says:

> "It is a well recognized rule that in equity the party having the beneficial interest in the subject matter of suit must sue in his own name for any invasion of his rights in respect thereto, although the legal title thereto may be in another. (Frye v. Bank of Illinois, 5 Gilm. 332; Elder v. Jones, 85 Ill. 384; Moore v. School Trustees, 19 id. 83.) It is also settled that no one, in the absence of statute authorizing it, can maintain a suit in chancery with respect to real estate to which he has neither the legal nor equitable title. (Bowles v. McAllen, 17 Ill. 30; Horace v. Harris, 11 id. 24.) If such an interest in the plaintiff is indispensable to the commencement of this suit, as will be conceded, the conclusion would seem to follow that where a party having such interest commences a suit, and before any hearing or disposition of the cause upon the merits, voluntarily transfers his interests to another, and the same is made to appear of record, as is the case here, the whole proceeding will become so defective for want of proper parties, that no valid decree can be entered in the cause until the complainant's assignee, by supplemental bill or otherwise, makes himself a party complainant to the suit—and this, indeed, is the well recognized doctrine and practice in such cases. Mason v. York & Cumberland R. R. Co., 52 Me. 82."

"Where the wrong complained of is one in which the State has no direct interest, any more than it has in an ordinary controversy between individuals, the State is not a proper party plaintiff, and the suit should be instituted by the particular individual who will be injured."

10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 903, 904, and the very numerous cases cited in Note 1.

"The rule is fundamental that no person can maintain a suit respecting a subject matter with reference to which he has no interest, right or duty, either personal or fiduciary."

Hogg's Equity Procedure, sec. 37, p. 40, citing Baxter v. Baxter, 43 N. J. Eq. 82, 10 Atl. Rep. 814; Ashby v. Ashby, 39 La. Ann 105, 1 So. Rep. 282.

In Ashby v. Ashby, supra, the syllabus of the case is as follows:

"An action can only be brought by one having a real and actual interest which he pursues. So, where one claiming to be a judgment creditor of another seeks to annul a mortgage executed by the latter in favor of his children on the ground of fraud, and the record shows that the judgment on which the suit is > founded is not in favor of the plaintiff, but in favor of her minor children for whom she was tutrix, and who had attained their majority before the action of nullity was brought, and they did not join in the action, the suit must be dismissed."

>
> "Where a bill is filed for relief, it must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest."
>
> Oakley v. Bend 13th Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 482.

The doctrine here cited is supported by numerous authorities, among which are the following:

> Field v. Maghee, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 539; Rogers v. Traders' Ins. Co., 6 id. 583; Sedgwick v. Cleveland, 7 id. 267.

It can not be contended that because the State of Virginia has constituted herself an agent or representative of the holders of the certificates mentioned in the plaintiff's bill that this gives her any right to maintain the suit in her own name.

From the opinion delivered in Oakley v. Bend, supra, we take the following:

> "A person who is a mere agent to sue for and collect money under a power of attorney, can not be a party to a bill for an accounting in his own name, nor be joined as a co-plaintiff with his principal. King of Spain v. Machado, 4 Russ. 225, 240, recognized in Clarkson v. Depyester, 3 Paige, 337, as good ground of demurrer. As a general rule, if an agent institutes a suit under an authority from his principal, he must do so in the name of his principal. Lee v. Thomas 2 Ves. 313. And see Calvert, Parties, 229, 232, for the authorities on the subject."

The doctrine set forth in these authorities and cases is so firmly settled that further discussion or citation would seem superfluous, and an annoyance to, and tax upon the time and patience of the court required for their notice or examination.

III.

THE REAL OWNERS OF THE DEFERRED CERTIFICATES HAVE SUCH A SUBSTANTIAL INTEREST AND RIGHT OF OWNERSHIP THEREIN AS TO MAKE THEM INDISPENSABLE PARTIES, WHOSE PRESENCE WOULD OUST THE COURT OF ITS JURISDICTION.

The practice in this court in cases in equity is regulated by the former practice of the courts of chancery in England. And in cases of original jurisdiction it will frame its proceedings according to those which had been adopted in the English courts in analogous cases, and follows the general rules of that court in conducting a cause to a finality.

California v. Southern Pacific Railroad, 157 U. S. 229, 249, 39, L. ed. 683, 690.

The only instance wherein the court will deviate from or refuse to follow this practice is when it impairs the case by unnecessary technicalities, or defeats the purpose of justice.

California v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co., supra; citing Florida v. Georgia, 58 U. S., 17 How., 478, 15 L. ed. 181.

The general rule as to parties in equity as followed in English chancery practice, was well settled at the time the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States was created, and is thus laid down by Mr. Daniell:

> "It is the constant aim of a court of equity to do complete justice by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject of the suit, so as to make the performance of the order of the court perfectly safe to those who are compelled to obey it, and to prevent further litigation. For this > purpose all persons materially interested in the subject ought, generally, either as plaintiffs or defendants, to be made parties to the suit, or should have served upon them a copy of the bill, or notice of the decree, to have an opportunity afforded of making themselves active parties to the cause if they should think fit."

> 1 Daniell's Ch. Pl. & Pr. (4th Am. Ed.) 190.

This rule under some circumstances, not important to be considered here, may be dispensed with when its application becomes extremely difficult or inconvenient.

Equity Rule 48.

This court, in Caldwell v. Taggart, 4 Pet. 190, 7 L. ed. 828 says:

> "The general rule is that however numerous the persons interested in the subject of the suit, they must all be made parties plaintiff or defendant, in order that a complete decree may be made; it being the constant aim of a court of equity to do complete justice by embracing the whole subject, deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject of the suit; to make performance of the order perfectly safe to those who have to obey it, and to prevent future litigation."

In Barney v. Baltimore, 73 U. S., 6 Wall., 280, 18 L. ed. 825, speaking with reference to the subject of parties, the court decides as follows:

> "Courts of chancery will refuse to make a decree where, by reason of the absence of persons interested in the matter, the decree would be ineffectual, or would injuriously affect the interests of the absent parties."

In Shields v. Barrow, 58 U. S., 17 How., 130, 15 L. ed., 159, the subject of parties to suits in equity received a very thorough consideration at the hands of the court, whose opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Curtis, and in which he classifies parties to a bill in equity as follows: Formal parties; second, necessary parties; third, indispensable parties. Those under the second class include all persons having an interest in the controversy, and who ought to be made parties in order that the court may act upon that rule which requires it to decide on, and finally determine the entire controversy, and do complete justice by adjusting all the rights involved in it. If the interests of this class of parties are separable from those of the parties before the court, so that the court can proceed to a decree and do complete and final justice without affecting other persons not before the court, then the latter are not indispensable parties.

Those coming under the third class are those persons who not only have an interest in the controversy, but an interest of such a nature that a final decree can not be made without either affecting the interest, or leaving the controversy in such condition that its final determination may be wholly inconsistent with equity and good conscience.

This well considered opinion, which has been followed in many subsequent cases, contains several illustrative cases of the rule here announced as to the classification of parties to a bill in equity.

One of the points in the syllabus of the last case cited states the rule as follows:

> "Persons having rights which must be affected by the decree cannot be dispensed with."

In the case before the court the holders of the deferred certificates, who own both the legal and equitable title thereto, are not made parties. The only plaintiff seeking relief is the State of Virginia, who has brought the suit in her own name without any title to this part of the subject matter of the suit, and without any direct or substantial interest in the result thereof. The purpose of this suit is to settle the liability of West Virginia on these deferred certificates to the owners and holders thereof, and any decree which is rendered in this case must relate solely to their rights. The court can not enter any decree with reference to these certificates which must not necessarily affect the interests of these outstanding owners and holders, who are not before the Court either as plaintiffs or defendants.

The purpose of the bill is not only to fix a liability on the State of West Virginia for the payment of these certificates, but also for an accounting to determine the extent of this liability. So it is clearly and at once perceivable that the holders of these certificates are vitally interested as to both of these purposes of the suit.

Therefore, as these persons have no opportunity to be heard, and as the decree can not bind them, the court cannot, for that very reason, afford any relief to the nominal plaintiff, the Commonwealth of Virginia, in this suit.

Suppose it be contended that these bonds are now held by the Commission created by the State of Virginia, apparently possessing powers to act as a corporate body, to negotiate with reference to these certificates, and that this commission holds the bonds in trust, as it evidently does, for the bond holders. Would not the Commission at least, acting in its fiduciary capacity, be an indispensable party to this suit? Could the State of Virginia, divested of all interest in these certificates, sue in her own name both for this commission and the beneficiaries, who are the owners of these certificates? This Commission being a creature of the legislature of Virginia, endowed with corporate capacity to act in furtherance of the objects of its creation, is evidently interested in carrying into effect the steps which it has taken to secure the payment of these evidences of indebtedness.

But defect of parties may ordinarily be remedied by an amendment of the bill in such a manner as to cure this defect, and thus avoid the effect of a demurrer for want of parties. This is the general or ordinary rule—the one usually observed by the courts. Indeed, a court ought not to dismiss a bill and deny relief where the only obstacle to the granting of relief is the want of essential parties, when the bill may be relieved from this objection by amendment.

This case, however, constitutes an exception to this rule. It must be clearly apparent that the relationship of the owners or holders of the certificates, to the suit, if brought into the case, must be that of plaintiffs; and as they are numerous, a few could join, suing on behalf of themselves, and all others similarly situated, and thus avoid the inconvenience of large numbers appearing on the record as plaintiffs in the suit. They would be the real plaintiffs, with the State of Virginia as a mere nominal party, thus creating a suit by individuals against a state of the Union, which is prohibited by the Constitution.

If an amendment were thus permitted so as to bring the Commission as the Trustee into this case as a party plaintiff, or this Commission together with the owners as co-plaintiffs with the State of Virginia, there would be presented a case in which the real parties in interest as individuals are the plaintiffs, in which a state with no interest and as a mere nominal party would be joined, thus allowing an individual to do by indirection associated with the state as a nominal party what he would be prohibited from doing in his own name. An evasion of this sort will not be permitted by the court, and the bill in this regard is not amendable, and the court on this consideration alone has no jurisdiction of that part of the bill seeking to establish the liability of West Virginia on these deferred certificates, and the extent of such liability.

If, however, the State of Virginia should ask to amend her bill by making the Commission as Trustee and holder of these certificates a party defendant, in order to give these owners and holders representation in the suit, if this could be done in the absence of the real parties in interest, then the court would have no jurisdiction under the principles laid down by this court in numerous cases which are cited and reviewed in the opinion announced in California v. Southern Pacific Co., 157 U. S. 229, 39 L. ed. 683. So, we perceive that as to this feature of the bill now under consideration, the court has no jurisdiction in any aspect of the case, nor can any amendment be made so as to give this court jurisdiction.

IV.

THE FACT THAT THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE SINKING FUND AND LITERARY FUND OF VIRGINIA HAVE IN THEIR POSSESSION COMPARATIVELY SMALL PORTIONS OF THE SAID CERTIFICATES ISSUED BY THE PLAINTIFF DOES NOT GIVE THE PLAINTIFF ANY CAUSE OF ACTION AGAINST THE DEFENDANT.

The commissioners of these two funds are mere state agencies or instrumentalities created by the Commonwealth of Virginia, to care for and preserve certain of her own financial resources, available for specific purposes, and which belong exclusively to Virginia. A few of the old bonds of Virginia issued prior to 1861 were by her converted into immediately available money by being deposited with these commissioners, and were therefore never sold and the title transferred from her so as to create a liability against the State herself, and hence at no time was there ever any right of action or liability on account of these old bonds so deposited with the said commissioners which could properly be asserted against the old state. In other words, these few old bonds deposited with these commissioners did not create any debt against the State of Virginia. At no time or under any circumstances could these bonds have been made or become a legitimate subject matter of controversy or suit against the Commonwealth of Virginia. To make them such, would present the grotesque spectacle of a sovereign state suing herself, for an accounting and payment to herself of her own funds, already under her absolute control.

Again there can be no liability in favor of the State of Virginia against the State of West Virginia on these bonds so held. The moneys in the sinking fund which purchased these bonds previous to the first day of January, 1861, were raised by the revenues of the entire State before the division, and they were therefore the property of such entire State, and being in the ownership of the State itself, the debtor, they were a dead asset both as to that portion of the State which passed into the new State and the State of Virginia as she remained, and Virginia claiming to be such owner has no more right to institute and prosecute a suit thereon against West Virginia than would West Virginia if a similar bond had fallen into her possession. If there is any liability in respect to said bonds it is a liability of the State of Virginia to the State of West Virginia for a portion thereof.

Then if this were the status of Virginia as to the old bonds held by the commissioners of her Sinking Fund and Literary Fund, prior to 1861, and which remained unchanged at the time of the formation of the State of West Virginia, could their refunding and the issuance of the deferred certificates as to the one-third of them alter this status with reference to her right of suit thereon, or any part of them? The very propounding of the question must evoke a negative answer.

The idea of debt necessarily implies an obligation payable by the debtor to some third party—a creditor existing independently of the debtor, and over whom, as to the obligation asserted, the debtor can have no control, and in the use or disposition of which the debtor has no right or interest whatever.

How then—upon what principle—upon what ground or reason—can Virginia claim that the old bonds placed by her with her Commissioners of the Sinking and Literary Funds, were or are now any part of her ante bellum debt? We are wholly unable to perceive any. In fact, there is none.

If it be contended that the commissioners of the Sinking and Literary Funds are distinct entities from the State, persons clothed with an existence distinct and separate from the Commonwealth, with the right to assert a liability against Virginia on account of these old bonds acquired by them prior to the erection of the territory contained within the boundaries of West Virginia into a state, then and in that event this court cannot entertain jurisdiction of this suit, because these commissioners are necessary parties thereto, and the commission having been created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of Virginia, must be a citizen of Virginia, and if a distinct entity, it must necessarily be a corporation having its domicile in Virginia, where it was created.

Thus, we perceive that in any aspect of the case, the court has no jurisdiction of this suit so far as the certificates belonging to these commissioners are concerned. In fact, this feature itself of this cause constitutes no ground of controversy between the parties to the bill.

V.

THE CLAIM FOR PROPERTY TRANSFERRED BY THE PLAINTIFF TO THE DEFENDANT CONTAINED WITHIN THE BOUNDARIES OF THE TERRITORY OUT OF WHICH WEST VIRGINIA WAS ERECTED INTO AN INDEPENDENT STATE CREATES NO RIGHT OF ACTION ON THE PART OF VIRGINIA FOR THE VALUE OF THIS PROPERTY.

In February, 1863, the General Assembly of the State of Virginia passed the following Act, declaring:

> "That all property, real, personal and mixed, owned by or appertaining to this state, and being within the boundaries of the proposed State of West Virginia, when the same becomes one of the United States, shall thereupon pass to, and become the property of the State of West Virginia, and without any other assignment, conveyance or transfer or delivery than is herein contained, and shall include among other things not herein specified all lands, buildings, roads and other internal improvements or parts thereof, situated within said boundaries, and vested in this state, or in the President and Directors of the Literary Fund, or the Board of Public Works thereof, or any person or persons for the use of this state, to the extent of the interest and estate of this State therein; and shall also include the interest of this state, or of the president and directors, or of the said board of public works, in any parent bank or branch doing business within the said boundaries and all stocks of any other company or corporation, the principal office and place of business whereof is located within the said boundaries, standing in the name of this state, or of the said president or directors, or of the said board of public works, or of any other person or persons for the use of this state.

> "That if the appropriations and transfers of property, stocks and credits provided for by this act, take effect, the State of West Virginia shall duly account for the same in the settlement hereafter to be made with this state provided that no such property, stocks and credits shall have been obtained since the organization of the state government."

The bill of complaint relating to this property makes the following allegation:

> "Your oratrix is informed, believes, and so charges that the property which was by the operation of this act appropriated and transferred from the State of Virginia to the State of West Virginia, and which was subsequently received and enjoyed by the State of West Virginia, consisted of a number of items, and the value of it amounted, in the aggregate, to several millions of dollars, the exact amount your oratrix is unable at this time more definitely to ascertain and state. That of the bank stocks alone, which were transferred under the operation of this act, the State of West Virginia realized and received into her treasury, from the sale thereof, about six hundred thousand dollars, and that no part of the property so received by West Virginia had been obtained by Virginia since April, 1861."

It will be observed that all the property mentioned in this act was located within the territory comprised within the boundaries of West Virginia, and was designed for the use of the latter in the formation of a state government and in promoting the purposes of its establishment. The parent state parted with certain of her own territory and resources to create a new state within her own boundaries and to exercise over a part of her own people the powers of government, to be thereafter created by them, and to assume all the burdens and responsibilities incident to a state, and to erect for themselves all public institutions necessary to conduct the operations of the government of the new state, thus proposed to be created. Virginia in this act proposed new duties and obligations for a part of her own citizens, and at the same time declared in her own halls of legislation what should be done by the new state which then had no existence, but which she, by her own act and that of the general government, designed to bring into existence, by parting with the very property which she intended should be used by the new government and a part of the people of Virginia would share in the benefits and advantages thus afforded.

Now can Virginia by her own act create an obligation to be assumed by a state not then in existence and which she by her own acts aids in creating? Can she, in this act, declare that a creature not then in being, shall account to her for property which she herself really bestows upon a part of her own citizens, and who, in the true sense of the term, are the real owners thereof, and when she has thus freely bestowed her own bounty upon her own citizens, make a demand thereafter upon the new government when it has been established, and that too when this new government is to extend to a large part of the citizens of Virginia full protection in the enjoyment of all their absolute and social rights? If so, upon what legal or moral principles can such a claim be predicated? The parent thus transfers all the burdens of her own government to a new state, created in her own boundaries, divesting herself of all responsibility for the conduct and safety of a large part of her former population and imposes upon another sovereignty these very obligations which she herself had borne, and that, too, by her own act, and now seeks indemnity and compensation from this sovereignty for performing a duty of which she herself has been relieved by her own act and concession.

By this act Virginia simply declared to a part of her own citizens that they could organize themselves into a government in a part of her own territory and thus become an independent state. These citizens of Virginia were the promotors and she co-operated with them to the end that a new state might be formed.

It will not be overlooked that the territory of Virginia was divided in 1863 while she retained her own identity and institutions, and out of the territory which she surrendered, and within it, a new state arose.

This is not the case wherein one state is treating with another, whereby one state cedes a part of her territory to be added to the domain of the latter. In such case she could stipulate the terms of the cession, which would constitute a compact between the two states enforceable as a binding obligation. Their attitude towards each other would be that of two independent and competent contracting parties.

Here the attitude of Virginia is very different. She, on the one side, proposes that a new state may be organized if the National Government will assent to its admission into the Union. She cannot propose conditions in advance of the creation of the new state, and enforce them against it as the price of property within its own territorial limits. This would constitute a mere nudum pactum. It would be without consideration because whatever is within the boundaries of the new state belongs to it, both upon reason and authority.

> "The new State on its part carries with it only local obligations, and whether contracted for local objects or secured by a lien on local revenues, and such local duties as arise out of agreements to maintain the channel of a river or to levy no more than certain tolls along its course. As a compensation for such burdens the new state is entitled to property within it of a local character, or to such, not within it, as belongs to state institutions localized there, and to the privileges arising from treaties specially contracted for the benefit of its territory, such for instance as contain demarcations of its boundaries, and such as secure to its inhabitants, or a part of them, the right to navigate streams running through other countries from its frontiers." Taylor, International Public Law, p. 204, citing Hall's Treaties on International Law (4th Ed., Oxford.) Sec. 27.

So if the new state is entitled to property within it of a local character, or to such not within it, as belongs to state institutions localized there, upon what principle can Virginia base a claim for the value of property within the territory of the new state of West Virginia? She cannot found it upon the doctrine of public international law. Neither can she found it upon an act of her own legislature, nor can she do so upon any act or agreement upon the part of West Virginia, for West Virginia did nothing, nor has she done anything to authorize it, as the new state was not a party to the agreement. Virginia has no claim and can have no claim for property, real or personal, localized or pertaining to or belonging to institutions localized in the territory out of which West Virginia was formed. She cannot base this claim upon treaty or compact, because at the time she declared by her own act of assembly that this property was to be taken by the new state when it came into being, there was no representative to act on behalf of the proposed new state so as to accept a cession of property upon terms proposed by the owner. This act of assembly could not be construed as a treaty between the state of Virginia and the proposed new state, as this was a mere ex parte act emanating from Virginia alone, and a treaty in its humblest and narrowest aspect, "is a mere agreement between states for the settlement of their current interests or controversies, made either with a tacit admission of the existence of the common law of nations, or with the express stipulation that some principle of that law shall be changed or modified in a particular case." Taylor, International Law, p. 93.

Hence the making of a treaty necessarily presupposes and assumes the presence and participation in its negotiations of two sovereign powers capable of acting. Another reason why it could not be referable to treaty is that one state cannot enter into a treaty with another state without the consent of Congress. In February, 1863, when this act of assembly was passed, upon which Virginia rests her claim as presented by this feature of the bill, West Virginia had not been fully created and organized. Now, then, shall Virginia passing the title of property by her own act and imposing terms both unfair and unfounded upon the principles of public law, assert a claim to the value of this property when conditions have changed and the new sovereignty finds herself in possession of this property which is within her own territory, and actually necessary for the legitimate purposes of the new government? But it may be said or contended that if West Virginia is liable for her equitable portion of Virginia's public debt, is she not also liable for the public property of Virginia localized in the territory of the new state, or belonging to any of the public institutions localized there? This admits of a plain and satisfactory answer in the negative.

West Virginia's attitude as to the public debt of Virginia was provided for by the ordinance of Virginia and the constitution of West Virginia, and in the absence of such provision, it can scarcely be contended that the State of Virginia could assert any liability against the State of West Virginia as to any part of said debt.

Furthermore, there is nothing in the record to show that Virginia, either by her Act of Assembly or by any act on the part of her governor, has authorized any demand upon the state of West Virginia for compensation for property situated in the territory now comprising the State of West Virginia.

The bill sets up a further claim for property predicated upon the Act of the General Assembly of Virginia passed on the 4th day of February, 1863, and which, according to the bill, is in the following language:

> "1. That the sum of One Hundred and Fifty Thousand Dollars be and is hereby appropriated to the State of West Virginia out of moneys not otherwise appropriated, when the same shall have been formed, organized and admitted as one of the United States.

> "2. That there shall be, and hereby is, appropriated to the said State of West Virginia when the same shall become one of the United States, all balances, not otherwise appropriated, that may remain in the treasury, and all moneys not otherwise appropriated that may come into the treasury, up to the time when the said State of West Virginia shall become one of the United States; provided, however, that when the said State of West Virginia shall become one of the United States, it shall be the duty of the auditor of the State to make a statement of all the moneys that up to that time have been paid into the treasury from counties located outside of the boundaries of the said State of West Virginia, and also of all moneys that up to the same time, have been expended in such counties, and the unexpended surplus of all such moneys shall remain in the treasury and continue to be the property of this state."

After reciting this act the bill avers:

> "And this last named sum of One Hundred and Fifty Thousand Dollars, together with other sums belonging to the State of Virginia, were turned over to and received or collected by the new State of West Virginia after its formation as aforesaid."

The same reasons and principles apply to this item demanded by Virginia from West Virginia, because of personal property located within the territory comprised within the State of West Virginia, that is applicable to the demand of a similar character made in the bill by reason of the Act already quoted passed by the General Assembly of Virginia on February 3, 1863.

It does seem to us that this claim of Virginia, which she rests upon the two acts passed by the General Assembly of February third and fourth respectively, in the year 1863, is not only without foundation upon any principles of law or equity, but is most unjust and unreasonable.

It is quite apparent that Virginia demands that West Virginia shall pay one-third of the old debt of Virginia upon the sole ground that she parted with one-third of her territory, and therefore, on that ground alone, West Virginia should be made to bear that proportion of her ante bellum debt to the holders thereof, while Virginia should meet and discharge the other two-thirds of this obligation.

Has it occurred to the authorities of Virginia that when she parted voluntarily with one-third of her territory, she at the same time retained all of her institutions, or nearly so, intact, with the means in her own control of continuing the operations of her state government, while the territory she parted with had to be erected into a state government, all the institutions necessary to its operation to be constructed, and great expense incurred in order to bring the territory into the status of an independent state and put her machinery of government into operation? In this aspect of the case, Virginia cuts off about one-third of her domain, containing a large percentage of her citizenship, sets them adrift without the means of government, and now demands not only that the new government erected out of this territory shall bear the burden of one-third of her public debt, but also pay to her compensation for "all lands, buildings, roads, and other internal improvements, or part thereof, situated within said boundaries, and vested in this State (Virginia), or in the president and directors of the literary fund, or the board of public works thereof, or in any person or persons for the use of this State (Virginia), to the extent of the interest and estate of this State (Virginia) therein," and all other property within the boundaries forming said new state, as well as all money properly belonging to the institutions of the state of Virginia localized in these boundaries.

On the other hand Virginia refuses to recognize any liability for the one-third of this debt on the very arbitrary basis assumed by her for its adjustment, still retains intact all property and institutions of every kind and character within her own domains, demanding compensation also for every article of property of any value with which she parted, and that too by her own act of legislation. She cannot in equity and good conscience make this two-fold demand. She must forego her claim upon West Virginia for the liquidation of any part of her public debt, or she must concede to West Virginia the absolute ownership in all the property localized within her boundaries. But she cannot now deal with the one-third of her old debt, because she is practically released from any liability thereon by reason of the acts and course pursued by her with the creditors themselves. The only parties that are now asserting any demand against West Virginia as to the one-third of the old debt of Virginia are the creditors themselves—the true and legal owners and holders thereof. The right to look to West Virginia for the payment of this one-third, if the right exists anywhere, necessarily resides in the creditors, and not in the State of Virginia. She, therefore, has left the demand as to one-third of the debt against West Virginia, so far as she herself is concerned, in the hands of the creditors, and no act of hers can now affect their substantial rights. She cannot, therefore, do anything at this time to release West Virginia from any part of the demand which the creditors are asserting against her through the medium of this suit nominally instituted by Virginia.

She is therefore referred to the only alternative in foro conscientiae aut legis, and that is, a relinquishment of her own demand for compensation for property left by her within the boundaries of the territory out of which the state of West Virginia was created. She can only, therefore, stand upon that feature of her bill which relates to her old public debt, and as to this feature of the case, as we have already shown, she is without standing in a court of equity.

VI.

THE PLAINTIFF CANNOT ASSERT THE CLAIM WHICH SHE SETS FORTH IN HER BILL IN A COURT OF EQUITY.

In considering the proposition that the plaintiff cannot assert the demand contained in the bill in a court of equity, we must keep in mind the relation which Virginia bears to that part of her ante bellum public debt which is sought to be made the subject of controversy in this suit. She disclaims at this time all liability to her creditors on account of the so-called equitable proportion thereof which she insists shall be borne by the state of West Virginia, at the same time averring that she has adjusted and settled two-thirds of the original debt by agreement and contract between herself and its owners.

It is patent upon the face of the bill and its exhibits, as hereinbefore stated, that the prosecution of this suit by Virginia is solely in the interests of the owners and holders of the deferred certificates issued by Virginia herself without recourse upon her, and set apart as a liability of West Virginia to the holders of the old obligations, which have been surrendered to the state of Virginia and by her cancelled in accordance with her own acts of legislation.

She therefore cannot come into a court of equity to assert a right of contribution against West Virginia. There are two clear and cogent reasons for this:

(a) First, the decree which she seeks to obtain cannot inure to her benefit, but only to that of the holders of the deferred certificates.

(b) Second, she must have paid everything for which she and the new state were jointly liable so as to relieve the new state from all liability before she can seek contribution from her joint obligor.

That this is the principle upon which rests the equitable right of contribution is the recognized and well settled doctrine of the courts.

9 Cyc. 699; 3 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 163.

The demand made by Virginia which she claims arises out of the acts of her General Assembly, passed February 3rd and 4th, respectively, in the year 1863, whereby she transferred certain real and personal property belonging to her to be used by the new state when created and organized, if it has any validity, which is not conceded here, is purely a legal demand and one which cannot be asserted under any circumstances in a court of equity.

If it be an equitable demand, upon what principle or doctrine of equity does it rest? It is not secured by any lien; it is not in the nature of a trust; it rests upon no equities to be asserted in order to enter a decree or to make the claim available. It is simply a money demand for the value of property which the plaintiff claims was used and appropriated by the defendant for which payment should be made.

This court has declared in Scott v. Neely, 140 U. S. 106, 117, 35 L. ed. 358, that,

> "All actions which seek to recover specific property, real or personal, with or without damages for its detention, or a money judgment for breach of a simple contract, or as damages for injury to person or property, are legal actions and can be brought in the federal courts only on their law side."

This principle is based upon the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that,

"In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved."

In the federal courts this right cannot be dispensed with except by the assent of the parties entitled to it, nor can it be impaired by any blending with a claim, properly cognizable at law, of a demand for equitable relief in aid of the legal action or during its pendency. Such aid in the federal courts must be sought in separate proceedings, to the end that the right to a trial by jury in a legal action may be preserved intact.

Scott v. Neely, supra, in the opinion of the court.

Pursuing this provision of the organic law of the United States, the sixteenth section of the judiciary act of 1789, enacted that such suits "shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States in any case where a plain, adequate and complete remedy may be had at law;" and this prohibition is carried into the revised statutes of the United States.

Section 723.

This provision of the revised statutes "is simply declaratory of the rule obtaining and controlling in equity proceedings from the earliest period in England, and always in this country. And so it has been often adjudged that whenever, respecting any rights violated, a court of law is competent to render a judgment affording a plain, adequate and complete remedy, the party aggrieved must seek his remedy in such court, not only because the defendant has a constitutional right to a trial by jury, but because of the prohibition of the Act of Congress to pursue his remedy in such cases in a court of equity."

> Scott v. Neely, supra, citing Hipp v. Babin, 60 U. S. 19 How., 271, 278, 15 L. ed. 633, 635; Lewis v. Cox, 90 U. S. 466, 470, 23 L. ed. 70, 71; Killian v. Ebinghaus, 110 U. S. 568, 573, 28 L. ed. 246, 248; Buzard v. Houston, 119 U. S. 347, 351, 30 L. ed. 451, 453.

As already stated, the demand asserted by Virginia for money and property localized within the boundaries of West Virginia is simply for a debt predicated upon the transfer of property by Virginia and appropriated by West Virginia after her creation and organization as a state.

The demand made by the bill in this respect is for the money mentioned in the Act of February 4th, 1863, and the value of the property designated in the Act of February 3rd of the same year.

On the common law side of the court this demand may be made the subject of an action of debt, or even of an action of assumpsit on the implied promise, if any legal liability exists, which is not here conceded, on the part of West Virginia to repay Virginia the money which she used and to compensate her for the property appropriated and used, the amount of which would depend upon its value.

Therefore, the demand in the case now before the court is the alleged debt due the complainant for this property which in no respect differs from any debt upon contract; it is the subject of a legal action only in which the defendant is entitled to a jury trial in this court.

But it may be contended that there is no precedent for the trial of an action at law in this court, in which a jury may be empaneled as in ordinary trials in actions at law instituted in the Federal Circuit Court. It may also be contended that this is an exceptional case to be tried in a court exercising exceptional original jurisdiction, and that therefore the ordinary distinction between law and equity ought not to be observed and followed. If there were no precedent for this, there is no assignable reason why such a precedent should not now be made.

But this court has already declared that it will not entertain a suit in equity brought by a state where an adequate remedy at law exists.

In Georgia v. Brailsford, the fourth case entered upon "the original docket" of the Supreme Court, a definition was first given of the original jurisdiction of this court. During the pendency in the circuit court for the district of Georgia between Brailsford and others and Spalding, to which the State of Georgia was not allowed to be made a party, this state, in February, 1792, filed its bill in equity in this court seeking the aid of its original jurisdiction for an injunction, in behalf of the state, to stay the payment to others of a certain debt in controversy in the said circuit court, which the State of Georgia claimed had been vested in her by the Act of Confiscation passed May 4, 1782.

The judges of the Supreme Court were divided in their opinion on the question of granting an injunction upon the ground that Georgia had a complete and adequate remedy at law.

Therefore, in 1793, a motion was made to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill, and upon this motion the following order was indicated by the chief justice: "The bill, however, was founded in the highest equity; and the ground of equity for granting the injunction continues the same, that the money ought to be kept for the party to whom it belongs. We shall therefore continue the injunction until the next term, when, however, if Georgia has not instituted her action at common law it will be dissolved."

Acting upon this statement of the court Georgia brought an action on the common law side of the original jurisdiction, perfecting her pleadings therein during February, 1794, a jury was empaneled for the trial of the case, and the court charged the jury in effect that the act of the state of Georgia did not vest the title to the debt in the state at the time of its passage, and that by the terms of the act the debt was not confiscated but only sequestered, and the right of the obligees to recover it revived on the treaty of peace.

The record then recites that "the jury retired for a few minutes, and, on their return to the bar, by their foreman, Reynold Keen, say they find a verdict for the defendant."

Taylor, Jurisdiction and Procedure of the United State Supreme Court, pp. 52, 53.

Mr. Taylor, in his very estimable work just cited, considering the matter now under discussion, says:

> "No more emphatic assertion could have been made of the immemorial distinction between law and equity, or of the fact that the equity side of the original jurisdiction cannot be invoked when there is a plain and adequate remedy at law."
> Idem, 53.

This same distinguished author, quoting from Carson's History of the Supreme Court, page 169, note 7, further says:

> "It has been asserted that this is the only instance of trial by jury in the Supreme Court. This is an error. The minutes of the court disclose that in the case of Oswald v. New York, a jury was sworn and witnesses called, and a verdict found for the plaintiff of $5,315.06. This was in February, 1795. Two years and a half later a writ of enquiry of damages in the case of Catlin v. South Carolina was executed at the bar of the Supreme Court, and a verdict was given for plaintiff for $55,002.84. Although judgments were entered there is no record of any steps to enforce them."

At the time of the formation of the Constitution of the United States the distinctions existing between law and equity were well defined, and these distinctions were familiar to the framers of this instrument, and they considered it a wise policy to carry them into the federal tribunals, and they have ever since been observed and enforced.

Therefore, Virginia's claim for a judgment against West Virginia for money and property located within the boundaries of the latter must be asserted at law.

It may be contended, however, that equity does have jurisdiction of that part of the bill which relates to the public debt of Virginia created prior to the formation of West Virginia, and that the court having jurisdiction of this feature of the case on equitable ground, which however is not conceded by West Virginia for the reasons hereinbefore stated, and though the other part of the demand may be legal in its nature, the court will entertain jurisdiction of the entire bill and grant full relief if the bill can be sustained upon any equitable ground whatsoever.

Be this as it may in some of the state courts, no such rule is observed in the federal courts.

It has long been a settled doctrine of the federal courts that legal and equitable claims cannot be blended together in the same suit.

In Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 36 L. ed. 1059, the court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, in the course of its opinion says:

> "Section 914 of the Revised Statutes, in providing that the practice, pleadings and forms, and modes of proceeding in civil causes in the circuit and district courts shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record in the state within which such circuit or district courts are held, in terms excludes equity causes therefrom, and the jurisprudence of the United States has always recognized the distinction between law and equity as, under the Constitution, matter of substance, as well as of form and procedure, and, accordingly, legal and equitable claims cannot be blended together in one suit in the circuit courts of the United States, nor are equitable defenses permitted."

In support of this doctrine thus so clearly announced, the learned Chief Justice cites a number of decisions of this court, together with some decisions of the circuit courts.

The same principle is announced in Scott v. Neely, 140 U. S. 106, 35 L. ed. 358, and from this case we here quote points five and six of the syllabus as follows:

> "5. Remedies in federal courts at law or in equity, are not according to the practice of State courts, but according to the principles of the common law and equity.
>
> "6. A federal court has no jurisdiction of a suit in equity in which a claim, only cognizable at law, is united with a claim for equitable relief."

These principles have been fully adhered to in all of the federal courts, and are always applied in strict conformity to the well marked distinctions here laid down.

Now what is the status of the case at bar from any standpoint of its consideration? If it be conceded that the bill states a claim in equity relating to the ante bellum debt of Virginia, it cannot admit of argument that the claim for compensation for property used by West Virginia within the territory constituting her own boundaries formerly belonging to Virginia, is a pure legal demand, which has been united in the bill, and therefore the court will not entertain jurisdiction of this suit.

But we earnestly insist, upon reason and authority, that the plaintiff has no standing, even in a court of equity, with reference to that part of the bill relating to her public debt created prior to the formation of West Virginia; that as to this feature of the cause there is no ground for the assertion of any claim by the plaintiff against the defendant either at law or in equity; that this part of the bill is without merit, and that upon no consideration can this part of the plaintiff's claim be entertained by this court. This then leaves the naked legal claim of the plaintiff undisposed of, and the court being without jurisdiction in equity will not hear the cause as to this feature of the bill. The entire bill is without equity, and the demurrer interposed by the defendant ought to be sustained.

VII.

THIS COURT HAS NO JURISDICTION TO SETTLE OR DETERMINE THE PRINCIPLE UPON WHICH WEST VIRGINIA SHALL BE MADE LIABLE FOR ANY PORTION OF THE OLD DEBT OF VIRGINIA, BECAUSE THIS WAS MATTER OF CONTRACT BETWEEN VIRGINIA AND WEST VIRGINIA UPON THE ADMISSION OF THE LATTER INTO THE UNION.

The constitution of the new state, as prepared and formulated, looking to its admission into the union contained the following provision as to the old debt of Virginia:

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

On May 13th, 1862, the Legislature of Virginia passed an act entitled "An Act giving the consent of the Legislature of Virginia to the formation and erection of a new state within the jurisdiction of this state."

The first clause of said act is as follows:

> "Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That the consent of the Legislature of Virginia be and the same is hereby given to the formation and erection of the State of West Virginia to include the counties of Hancock, Brooke, * * * according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the Constitution for the said State of West Virginia, and > the schedule thereto annexed proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the twenty-sixth day of November, 1861."

The third clause of said Act is as follows:

> "Be it further enacted that this Act shall be transmitted by the executive to the senators and representatives of this Commonwealth in Congress, together with a certified original of the said Constitution and schedule, and the said senators and representatives are hereby requested to use their endeavors to obtain the consent of Congress to the admission of the State of West Virginia into the Union."

It was thus provided by said Constitution that the Legislature should ascertain the same as soon as it was practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years; that is, it provided for the ascertainment of such equitable proportion by the Legislature of the State of West Virginia independently of the State of Virginia, and further made provision as to how the State of West Virginia should pay the same, and having provided that the Legislature of West Virginia itself should ascertain such equitable proportion, and Virginia having consented that it should ascertain such portion, it is respectfully submitted that neither Virginia nor any court can intervene and perform this legislative duty.

When West Virginia framed her constitution and inserted in it the provision concerning the public debt of Virginia created prior to 1861, and the State of Virginia through her Legislature accepted the Constitution of West Virginia as the basis of her consent, this created a compact between the two States and was absolutely binding both upon Virginia and West Virginia.

It is matter of history that the vote on the adoption of the Constitution of the new State was held on the first Thursday in April, 1862; that this vote was taken and the Constitution ratified by the people; that the act of the Virginia Legislature was passed on the 13th of May, 1862, shortly after the vote on the adoption of the said Constitution was taken. This act was directed to be sent to the senators and representatives of Virginia in Congress, with instructions to obtain the consent of congress to the admission of the State of West Virginia into the Union. Accordingly on the 31st day of December, 1862, Congress acted on the matter, reciting the proceeding of the convention of West Virginia, and that of Virginia, and the act of the Legislature of the State of Virginia requesting that the new State should be admitted into the Union, and it then passed the act for the admission of said State.

These matters are fully recited in the opinion of this court delivered in the case of the Commonwealth of Virginia against the State of West Virginia, decided in 1870, and reported in 11 Wall. 39-65.

The action of the proposed new state in adopting her constitution by popular vote, the consent of Virginia through her Legislature given to the formation of the new State composed of the counties recited in the act giving her consent, and the deliberate consent of Congress, as required by the Constitution, consenting to the formation of the new State and admitting her into the Union, constitute a compact between Virginia and West Virginia, the terms of which, with reference to the said debt, form a part of this compact and are inviolable under the Constitution of the United States.

Biddle v. Green, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 Law. Ed. 547.

By this compact between Virginia and West Virginia, the former State referred to the Legislature of the latter the matter of ascertaining "an equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861," and therefore this "proportion" cannot be otherwise ascertained or determined than by the consent of the State of West Virginia; nor can its liquidation be otherwise provided for than by a sinking fund sufficient in amount to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal of whatever sum may thus be ascertained as the equitable proportion that West Virginia agreed to assume. Virginia referred this matter absolutely to the judgment of the Legislature of West Virginia and tacitly agreed to abide by the action of this legislative body.

This stipulation or compact between Virginia and West Virginia, with reference to the public debt of the former, is a valid and binding contract, and Virginia can do nothing, either by legislation or otherwise, to impair its obligation. West Virginia has the undoubted moral and legal right to stand upon its terms; and if in the exercise of its judgment exercised upon a basis just and equitable, it should be ascertained by the Legislature of West Virginia that the State owes nothing to the bondholders of the old debt of Virginia, then there is no obligation whatever subsisting which can be enforced by the holders of any part of the old debt of Virginia, and especially has Virginia herself no cause of action against this State.

VIII.

THE EFFECT OF THE COMPACT BETWEEN VIRGINIA AND WEST VIRGINIA ARISING FROM THE ADMISSION OF THE LATTER INTO THE UNION AS A STATE UPON THE CLAIM OF VIRGINIA TO PROPERTY LOCALIZED OR PERTAINING TO INSTITUTIONS LOCALIZED WITHIN THE BOUNDARIES OF WEST VIRGINIA.

We have already presented to the court our considerations relating to this feature of the case upon grounds independently of that which is here presented, and have shown that Virginia cannot sustain this part of her claim in this suit. It seems to us, however, that there is a further and conclusive reason why this part of her demand is without foundation.

In the initiatory convention held by Virginia on the 20th of August, 1861, having as one of its objects the consideration of the matter of the formation of a new State out of a part of the territory within her then existing boundaries, the representatives in that convention did not consider any condition touching the formation of a new State other than the one that the new state should take upon itself the payment of "a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861," and this was made the ultimate condition as expressed in the Constitution of West Virginia ratified by popular vote in April, 1862. This condition was, with some modification in the language employed to express it, inserted in the Constitution which West Virginia adopted. And Virginia, in May, 1862, signified her consent through her Legislature that the new state should be formed with the constitution which she had theretofore in April, 1862, adopted as her organic law, and with no other or additional burdens or liabilities touching the new state soon to be brought into existence, and needing only therefor the consent of Congress which was given in December, 1862.

When Virginia had given her consent properly expressed, as was done in this case, she could not revoke it, and the only other body whose action was essential to the creation of a new state that could impose other or further conditions touching her admission into the Union, was the Congress of the United States. Congress did give her consent in December, 1862, and it only remained for West Virginia to provide against slavery within her boundaries, and when this measure was adopted in the manner provided by the act of admission, West Virginia then became an independent and sovereign State of the Union.

After Virginia gave her consent to the formation of West Virginia in May, 1862, and the act of Congress was passed in December of the same year, providing for her admission as a state, all property localized in West Virginia, or belonging or appertaining to institutions localized there, passed to and became absolutely the property of West Virginia.

Therefore the acts of the Legislature of Virginia subsequently passed on the 3rd and 4th days of February, 1863, respectively, seeking to create a liability against West Virginia by an ex parte act, are without any force or effect to create any debt against West Virginia because of the matters in any of them to which the acts respectively relate. All of the property formerly belonging to Virginia located within the boundaries of West Virginia became and constituted a part of her public domain, and over which her territorial sovereignty extended as fully and efficiently as if no part of this property had ever belonged to the old state.

This necessarily results from the relation of the states to each other and to the general government. If it were otherwise and the property and sovereign interests belonging to

West Virginia, after her admission as a state into the Union, could be made the subject of disposal through a legislative act of Virginia efficient for the purpose for which such act was passed, then it would be within the sole power of Virginia to annihilate, by her own acts, all the instrumentalities and means necessary to uphold the integrity of West Virginia as a state. It would defeat her own avowed purpose as well as that of the national government.

Furthermore, if force and effect be given to these acts of legislation passed by the General Assembly of Virginia in February, 1863, it would necessarily impair the obligation of a contract existing between Virginia and West Virginia growing out of the terms of admission of the latter as a State into the Union. Because the only liability which she in any wise agreed to assume, and thereby did assume, was an "equitable proportion" of the public debt of Virginia.

It is now respectfully submitted that the State of Virginia has no claim against West Virginia with reference to her public debt, nor any valid demand against her for property localized within the boundaries of West Virginia; that it clearly appears upon the face of the bill that it is without equities to support it; and therefore the demurrer filed by the State of West Virginia ought to be sustained, and the plaintiff's bill dismissed.

v.

BRIEF ON DEMURRER.

The bill in this case sets up at least two separate and distinct causes of action, one in behalf of Virginia in her own right to have an accounting with the State of West Virginia for the value of certain property and money alleged to have been transferred to and received by the defendant State under two acts passed by the legislature of Virginia on the 3d of February, 1863, and the 4th of February, 1863; and the other in the name of Virginia as trustee, suing for the use and benefit of the owners of certain certificates set out and described in the bill and exhibits.

The first act under which it is alleged property was transferred provided as follows:

> "That all property, real, personal and mixed, owned by, or appertaining to this State, and being within the boundaries of the proposed State of West Virginia, when the same becomes one of the United States, shall thereupon pass to, and become the prop> erty of the State of West Virginia, and without any other assignment, conveyance or transfer or delivery than is herein contained, and shall include among other things not herein specified all lands, buildings, roads, and other internal improvements or parts thereof situated within said boundaries, and vested in this State, or in the president and directors of the Literary Fund, or the board of public works thereof, or in any person or persons for the use of this State, to the extent of the interest and estate of this State therein; and shall also include the interest of this State, or of the said president and directors, or of the said board of public works, in any parent bank or branch doing business within said boundaries and all stocks of any other company or corporation, the principal office or place of business whereof is located within said boundaries, standing in the name of this State, or of the said president or directors, or of the said board of public works, or of any person or persons, for the use of this State."

And by the fifth section it was enacted:

> "That if the appropriations and transfers of property, stocks, and credits provided for by this act, take effect, the State of West Virginia shall duly account for the same in the settlement hereafter to be made with this State, provided that no such property, stocks and credits shall have been obtained since the reorganization of the State government."

It is then charged in the bill that the property which was transferred to the State of West Virginia under this act was received and enjoyed by that State, and consisted of a number of items the value of which amounted in the aggregate to "several millions of dollars," the bank stocks alone having realized to the State about "six hundred thousand dollars."

The second act is as follows:

> "1. That the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars be, and is hereby appropriated to the State of West Virginia out of moneys not otherwise appropriated, when the same shall have been formed, organized and admitted as one of the States of the United States.
>
> "2. That there shall be, and hereby is appropriated to the said State of West Virginia when the same shall become one of the United States, all balances, not otherwise appropriated, that may remain in the treasury, and all moneys not otherwise appropriated, that may come into the treasury up to the time when the said State of West Virginia shall become one of the United States; Provided, however, That when the said States of West Virginia shall become one of the United States, it shall be the duty of the auditor of this State, to make a statement of all the moneys that up to that time, have been paid into the treasury from counties located outside of the boundaries of the said State of West Virginia, and also of all moneys that up to the same time, have been expended in such counties, and the unexpended surplus of all such moneys shall remain in the treasury and continue to be the property of this State."

It is alleged that the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, "together with other sums belonging to the State of Virginia," were received or collected by the State of West Virginia after its formation.

Again it is alleged that:

> "The State of West Virginia has, since her creation as a State, received from the State of Virginia real and personal property, amounting in value to many millions of dollars, and held and enjoyed the same, but upon expressed condition that she should duly account for the same in a settlement thereafter to be had between her and the Commonwealth of Virginia."

It is alleged in the bill that on the 20th day of August, 1861, the Commonwealth of Virginia, in convention assembled, at the city of Wheeling, adopted an ordinance "to provide for the formation of a new State out of the portion of the territory of this State," and that the ninth section of the ordinance was as follows:

> "The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all the State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State Government since any part of said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during said period. All private rights and interests in lands within the proposed State, derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in the State of Virginia."

It is then alleged that the new State was admitted into the Union on the 20th day of June, 1863, under a constitution which contained the following provisions:

> "5. No debt shall be contracted by this State except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the State, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, or defend the State in time of war."
>
> "7. The legislature may, at any time, direct a sale of the stocks owned by the State, in banks and other corporations, but the proceeds of such sale shall be applied to the liquidation of the public debt, and hereafter the State shall not become a stockholder in any bank.
> "8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and > the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

It is shown by the bill that the State of Virginia has settled with the holders of the old public debt by issuing new bonds for two-thirds of the principal and interest, which was decided by the State herself to be her equitable proportion of the debt, and issuing certificates for the other one-third which was assumed by the State of Virginia and by her creditors to be the proportion for which West Virginia was liable, and it is stated that—

> "By each of the acts for the settlement of her debt above recited, it was provided that the bonds of undivided Virginia so far as not funded in the new obligations given by your oratrix, should be surrendered to and held by your oratrix, who either by the express terms of the settlement provided for by said acts, or as a just and equitable consequence therefrom, received and holds said original bonds so far as unfunded, in trust, for the creditor who deposited the same with her, or his assigns; and certificates to this effect were given by your oratrix to each creditor whose old Virginia bond was so surrendered to her."

And it is also alleged that—

> "All of the bonds and obligations and other evidences of the indebtedness of the original State of Virginia outstanding and contracted on January 1, 1861, as stated in paragraph I of this bill, except a comparatively insignificant sum, not amounting to one per cent. of the aggregate of those liabilities, have been taken up and are now actually held by your oratrix, and she has the right to call upon West Virginia for a settlement with respect thereto."
> (R., p. 9.)

It is averred in paragraph one of the bill that on the 1st day of January, 1861, the State was indebted "in about the sum of $33,000,000," and that in addition to this "there was a large indebtedness evidenced by her bonds and other liabilities held by and due to the commissioners of the sinking fund and the literary fund of the State," the former amounting to $1,462,993.00 and the latter to $1,543,669.05, as of the same date.

The several acts of the legislature under which the debt was adjusted and the contracts under which the certificates issued by the State have been deposited with a commission, in trust for the purpose of bringing this suit, are exhibited with and made part of the bill, and it is alleged that "this suit has been instituted at the request and direction of the said commission and in strict conformity with the provisions of the said act of March 6, 1900," which act wil be hereafter referred to in this brief.

In the preamble to the act of March 30, 1871, which was the first one passed by Virginia to provide for the funding and payment of two-thirds of the debt, it was recited, among other things, that—

> "Whereas it has been suggested that the authorities of West Virginia may prefer to pay that state's portion of said debt to the holders thereof and not to this State, as the constitution of this State provides; now, therefore, to enable the State of West Virginia to settle her proportion of said debt with the holders thereof, and to prevent any complicaions or difficulties which might be interposed to any other manner of settlement, and for the purpose of promptly restoring the credit of Virgina by providing for the prompt and certain payment of the interest upon her proportion of said debt as the same shall become due; therefore be it enacted," etc., etc.

The third section provided that—

> "Upon the surrender of the old and the acceptance of the new bond for two-thirds of the amount due as provided in the last preceding section, there shall be issued to the owner or owners, for the other one-third of the amount due upon the old bond, stock, or certificate of indebtedness so surrendered, a certificate bearing the same date as the new bond, setting forth the amount of the bond which is not funded as provided in the last preceding section, and that payment of said amount with interest thereon at the rate prescribed in the bond surrendered, will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia existing at the time of its dismemberment, and that the State of Virginia holds said bonds, so far as unfunded, in trust for the holder or his assigns."

It appears from one of the exhibits attached to and made part of the bill that the certificates issued to the creditors under the provisions of this act were as follows:

> "This is to certify that there is due unto —— —— —— heirs, executors, administrators or assigns $—, being one-third of bond surrendered under the provisions of an act approved March 30th, 1871, entitled, 'An act to provide for the funding and payment of the public debt,' namely, bond No. —, with interest, amounting to $—. Payment of said one-third with interest thereon at the rate of six per cent. per annum will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia existing at the time of its dismemberment, and the State of Virginia holds said bonds so far as unfunded in trust for the holder hereof or his assigns."

The fourth section provides, among other things, that—

> "The treasurer shall, by proper endorsement, written or stamped, upon each bond, certificate of stock, or interest certificate so surrendered and delivered to him, cancel the same, and endorse thereon the date of such cancellation, and shall preserve the same in his office until otherwise directed by law."

This act provided for funding two-thirds of the public debt and interest in bonds bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent.; but subsequently, on March 28, 1879, another act, prescribing a plan of settlement, was passed, which provided for the issue of twenty-year bonds bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. and ten-year bonds bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent.

The sixth section of that act provided that—

> "The rules prescribed under the act approved March thirtieth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, in respect to preparing, signing and issuing the new bonds and coupons, regulating the same, and in taking in, cancelling and registering the old bonds, shall be observed by the officers of the treasury in the execution of this act, except so far as the same be modified by the provisions of this act. * * * But in cancelling and registering the bonds as above directed, in every bond and coupon surrendered under this act holes shall be punched in one or more places, and in such a manner as to render a new funding of the same impossible, and every bond and coupon so cancelled shall be filed for reference."

And in the seventh section of that act it is provided that—

> "The owners of all classes of bonds mentioned in this act, who shall exchange their securities for the bonds created under this act, and who shall not have yet received certificates representing the remaining one-third of their principal and interest, due and payable by the State of West Virginia, shall receive certificates of a like character to those issued under the act of March thirtieth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, when they make such exchange; and the State of Virginia will negotiate or aid the creditors holding all of such certificates issued under this act, or previous acts, in negotiating with the State of West Virginia for an amicable settlement of the claims of such creditors against the State of West Virginia. The acceptance of the said certificates for West Virginia's one-third, issued under this act, shall be taken and held as a full and absolute release of the State of Virginia from all liability on account of said certificates."

February 14, 1882, another act was passed entitled "An act to ascertain and declare Virginia's equitable share of the debt created before and actually existing at the time of the partition of her territory, resources," etc., etc. This act again provided for refunding only two-thirds of the old debt and interest at 3 per cent., and it was enacted that—

"For all balances of such indebtedness, constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt, principal and interest, in the settlement of Virginia's equitable share as aforesaid, the said board of sinking fund commissioners shall issue a certificate, as follows:

"No. —.

"The Commonwealth of Virginia has this day discharged her equitable share of the (registered or coupon, as the case may be) bond for — dollars, held by —— ——, dated the — day of ——, and numbered —, leaving a balance of — dollars, with interest from —— —, to be accounted for by the State of West Virginia, without recourse upon this commonwealth."

In section 8 it was provided that—

"All the bonds and certificates of debt and evidences of past-due and unpaid interest taken in under the provisions of this act, shall be canceled by the > treasurer in the presence of the board of the commissioners of the sinking fund as the same are required (acquired), and by the treasurer the same shall be carefully preserved until such time as the General Assembly may otherwise direct. A schedule of the bonds, certificates and other evidences of debt so canceled, from time to time, shall be certified by said board and filed with the treasurer for preservation."

This act also provided that after its passage "no bonds, certificates, or other evidences of indebtedness, shall be issued for any portion of the debt of this State, nor shall any interest be paid upon any part or portion of said debt, except as hereinbefore provided."

February 20, 1892, an act was passed to refund at least $23,000,000 of the outstanding debt which had not been presented in exchange for new bonds under the act of February 14, 1882. Like the others, this act provided for only two-thirds of the principal and interest of the debt, then outstanding, and by the sixth section it was enacted that—

> "For all balances of indebtedness, constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt, principal and interest, in the settlement of Virginia's equitable share of the bonds authorized to be exchanged under this act, the said share having been heretofore determined by the Commonwealth of Virginia, the said commissioners shall issue certificates substantially in the following form, viz:
>
> "No. —.
>
> "The Commonwealth of Virginia has this day discharged her equitable share of the (registered or coupon, as the case may be), bond for — dollars, dated — day of ——, and No. —, leaving a balance of — dollars, with interest from —— —, to be accounted for to the holder of this certificate by the State of West Virginia, without recourse upon this Commonwealth."

In the ninth section it was provided that—

In the tenth section it is enacted, among other things, that—

> "All bonds of the State issued under the provisions of the act aforesaid, approved February fourteenth, eighteen hundred and eighty-two, and now held by said commissioners of the sinking fund, shall, as soon as at least fifteen million of dollars of new bonds shall have been issued and delivered pursuant to the provisions of this act, be cancelled by said commissioners and preserved in the office of the treasurer of the Commonwealth."

March 6, 1894, the legislature of Virginia passed a joint resolution, the preamble to which, after reciting the titles of the acts to which we have heretofore referred, declared:

> "Whereas in each of said acts provision is made for issuing to creditors of the original State of Virginia who should accept the new bonds provided for by said several acts, certificates for such proportion of the obligation surrendered by them as was deemed proper to be borne by the State of West Virginia, to-wit: one-third of the amount of said obligations, of which certificates this State holds a large amount, through the agency of the commissioners of its sinking and literary fund; and

"Whereas the present State of Virginia has settled and adjusted, to the entire satisfaction of her people and the creditors, the liability assumed by her on account of two-thirds of the debt of the original State; now, therefore, be it resolved," etc.

(R., p. 40.)

This resolution provided for the appointment of a commission of seven members, which was—

"authorized and directed to negotiate with the State of West Virginia a settlement and adjustment of the proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia.

"But said commission shall not proceed with said negotiation until assurances satisfactory to the commission shall have been received from the holders of a majority in amount of said certificates, exclusive of those held by the State through the agency of the board of education and sinking fund commissioners, that they desire the said commission to enter into and undertake such negotiation, and will accept the amount so ascertained to be paid by the State of West Virginia in full settlement of the one-third of the debt of the original State of Virginia which has not been assumed by the present State of Virginia. But said commission shall in no event enter into any negotiation thereunder except upon the basis that Virginia is bound only for the two-thirds of the debt of the original State, which she has already provided for as her equitable proportion thereof.

"All expenses incurred by said commission and said board of arbitrators, including reasonable compensation of the members thereof, shall be paid out of the proceeds of such settlement, or by the holders of said certificates who are the beneficiaries of such settlement, but without subjecting the State to any expense on this account. And their action shall be subject to the approval or disapproval of the General Assembly, and shall not be binding on the State untill approved by the General Assembly. The governor is requested to communicate this joint resolution to the governor and legislature of West Virginia."

Commissioners were appointed under this resolution, but, no adjustment having been made, the act of March 6, 1900, was passed, entitled—

> "An act to provide for the settlement with West Virginia of the proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia, and for the due protection of the Commonwealth of Virginia in the premises."

The preamble to the act, after reciting the titles of acts previously passed, is as follows:

> "Whereas in each of said acts provision is made for issuing to creditors of the original State of Virginia who should accept the new bonds provided for by said several acts, certificates for such proportion of the obligation surrendered by them as was deemed proper to be borne by the State of West Virginia, to-wit: one-third of the amount of said obligations, of which certificate this State holds a large amount, through the agency of the commissioners of its sinking fund, and
>
> "Whereas the General Assembly is required by the constitution of Virginia to provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia, but no such adjustment has ever been had; and
>
> "Whereas it appears that while Virginia has satisfactorily settled the two-thirds of the original debt which she assumed, yet it is possible that complications will arise with respect to said certificate which will render it desirable that she should endeavor to secure an adjustment thereof upon terms which will protect herself, but will work no injustice to West Virginia, and thus finally dispose of the only question remaining unsettled in connection with said debt; now therefore, be it enacted," etc.

The first section provided—

> "That the commission created and appointed under a joint resolution of this General Assembly entitled a joint resolution to provide for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia, for the application of whatever may be received from West Virginia to the payment of those found to be entitled to the same, approved March sixth, eighteen hundred and ninety-four, be, and said commission hereby is, authorized to receive and take upon deposit the certificates aforesaid or have the same otherwise placed or held on deposit subject to their control upon an agreement and contract on the part of the holders of said certificates that if the said commission will secure a settlement with West Virginia with respect to said certificates the said holders of said certificates so deposited will accept the amount realized on such settlement from West Virginia on said certificates as a full settlement of all their claims thereunder."

The second section provided that—

> "If at least two-thirds in amount of the said certificates issued under the act of eighteen hundred and seventy-one, exclusive of those held by the State through the agency of the board of education and the sinking fund commissioners, and at least a majority in amount of all the other certificates aforesaid shall be so deposited or placed subject to the control of the said commission upon the agreement and contract aforesaid, then the said commission shall be authorized and empowered by and with the advice and approval of the attorney-general of Virginia to take such action and institute such proceedings, on behalf of the State, as may in the judgment of said commission and attorney-general be needful and proper to protect the interest of the State and bring about and carry into effect a settlement as aforesaid. All the expenses involved in connection with any of the matters aforesaid shall be borne by the certificate holders, as provided in the joint resolution aforesaid, and the State shall not be subject to any expense on that account."

The holders of a large amount of certificates issued by Virginia for what she claimed was West Virginia's just proportion of the debt, had deposited their certificates with a committee for collection or adjustment, and on the 20th of July, 1898, the depositing committee, through its chairman, made the following proposition to the Virginia commission:

"Whereas your commission was constituted as set forth in said joint resolution and act of assembly for the purpose of negotiating and bringing about a settlement with the State of West Virginia with respect to the proposition of the public debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia and in connection with which the present State of Virginia has issued certain certificates under four acts of its General Assembly, approved, respectively March 30th, 1871, March 28th, 1879, February 14th, 1882, and February 20th, 1892.

"And whereas your commission was, under the said act of March 6, 1900, further authorized to receive and take upon deposit the certificates aforesaid, or to have the same otherwise placed or held on deposit subject to your control, upon the agreement and contract on the part of the holders of said certificates that if your commission would secure a settlement with West Virginia with respect to said certificates, the said holders of said certificates, so deposited, would accept the amount realized on such settlement from West Virginia as a full settlement of all their claims thereunder; and said act further provided that if at least two-thirds of the amount of the said certificates issued under said act of 1871, (exclusive of those held by the State through the agency of the board of education and the sinking fund commissioners) and at least a majority in amount of all the other certificates should be so deposited or placed subject to the control of your commission upon the agreement and contract aforesaid, then your commission should be authorized, by and with the approval of the attorney-general of Virginia, to take action in the premises as might be needful to protect the interests of the State and bring about and carry into effect a settlement as aforesaid.

"And whereas by a certain agreement of July 28th, 1898, a committee on behalf of the holders of the said certificates was constituted to bring about the deposit, as far as practicable of said certificates in such depository as the committee should appoint with powers in the committee to act as agent of the certificate holders so depositing in bringing about a settlement of their claims upon such plan, as might be recommended by the advisory board named in said agreement and as should become effective thereunder; it being further stated in said agreement that all the said certificates so deposited would be promptly surrendered in exchange for whatever amount West Virginia might agree to pay and the creditors of West Virginia might agree to accept as aforesaid.

"And whereas more than two-thirds in amount of all the said certificates of 1871, outstanding as aforesaid, to wit, $8,565,095.70 and a majority of all the other certificates aforesaid, to wit, $1,782,475.13, have been duly deposited with said committee and are in custody of Brown Brothers & Company, bankers of New York city, N. Y., the depository named by said committee, and are held subject to the control of the said committee under the said agreement, so that the same can be duly placed and held subject to the control of your commission in accordance with the said agreement and in pursuance of such plan of settlement as is now proposed or as may hereafter become effective.

"In view of the premises the undersigned, the committee aforesaid, do now hereby tender and place subject to the control of your commission all the aforesaid certificates, so held on deposit, upon the agreement and arrangement on the part of your commission, acting for the State of Virginia under the said joint resolution and act of assembly aforesaid, that your commission will enter into negotiations with the State of West Virginia or the constituted authorities thereof for the purpose of effecting a settlement with West Virginia with respect—the said certificates in accordance with the said agreement of July 28th, 1898, and in accordance with such plan of settlement as is now proposed or as may hereafter become effective; and that your commission will by and with the advice and approval of the said attorney-general take such action as they may deem needful in the premises; and in event such a settlement is so made, then it is hereby agreed that the amount realized thereon shall be accepted in full satisfaction of all the claims of the certificate holders thereunder and the undersigned committee will surrender to your commission, in exchange for such amount the certificates aforesaid so deposited.

"If this proposal be accepted by your commission, the same shall constitute an arrangement and contract with the State of Virginia for obtaining a settlement with West Virginia and the same shall continue binding upon the undersigned committee and upon the holders of said certificates so deposited for the period of three years next ensuing from the date hereof for the purpose of allowing time for a settlement aforesaid; and the same shall be subject to renewal and extension for such further time as may be agreed upon and to such modification and amendment as may be agreed upon, and shall apply to and include any and all such certificates as aforesaid as may hereafter be deposited with and held by the said committee under said agreement of July 28th, 1898."

This proposition was accepted by the Virginia commission, with the approval of the attorney-general, on the 18th of September, 1902.

On the 3d of December, 1902, the advisory board of the depositing committee promulgated the following plan of settlement, which was approved by the committee:

"Under an agreement of July, 1898, a committee was constituted for the purpose of assembling the Virginia deferred certificates, with certain powers and functions as in the agreement specified, and by the same agreement an advisory board was constituted whose functions were also specified in the agreement.

"In pursuance of this agreement, a certain plan of settlement was, on the 21st day of June, 1899, formulated and recommended by the committee and advisory board, which among other things, contained the following provision:

" 'The committee may surrender to either State (Virginia or West Virginia) any of the deposited certificates and receive in full satisfaction therefor their pro rata of such an amount in State bonds, or cash as may be agreed upon between the committee and the representatives of Virginia or West Virginia, as the maximum amount which West Virginia will assume on account of her proportion of the debt of the original State.'

"Since the date last named the General Assembly of Virginia, on the 6th day of March, 1900, passed an act authorizing a commission which had been appointed and constituted on her behalf in the premises, by and with the advice and approval of her attorney-general, to take such action and institute such proceedings as might, in the judgment of the commission and attorney-general, be needful and proper to bring about and carry into effect a settlement of said certificates; but it was further provided in this act that such action should be taken only in the event that at least two-thirds of all the certificates of 1871 (exclusive of those held by the State) and a majority of all the other certificates, should be deposited with or placed subject to the control of the commission upon an agreement on the part of the holders of such certificates that if the commission would secure a settlement with West Virginia with respect to said certificates, they would accept the amount realized from West Virginia on such settlement in full of all their claims thereunder.

"On the 18th of September, 1902, the committee held on deposit $8,565,095.70 of the certificates of 1871, being more than two-thirds thereof (*) as above stated, and $1,782,457.13 of all the other certificates, being a majority thereof; and the committee accordingly on that day entered into a contract with the Virginia commission, by which it was stipulated that the said certificates should, for the period of three years, be held subject to the control of the commission upon the agreement and arrangement on the part of the commission that they would enter into negotiations with the State of West Virginia for the purpose of effecting a settlement with respect to said certificates, and would by and with the advice and approval of said attorney-general, take such action as they might deem needful in the premises; the amount realized on such settlement to be accepted in full of said certificates as above stated, which contract was duly approved by the attorney-general of Virginia on September 29th, 1902.

"In view of this act of the Virginia assembly, and of the recent action taken thereunder, it is deemed desirable to make the plan of settlement heretofore recommended more definite with respect to the matters now involved; and to this end the following is hereby formulated, approved and recommended by the committee and the advisory board by way of supplement and addition to the original plan:

"I. The above named committee shall pledge or deposit the certificates now or hereafter received under the agreement of July 28, 1898, with the Virginia commission, in conformity with the act of March 6, 1900, for the purpose of taking such action and instituting such proceedings, by and with the advice and approval of the attorney-general of Virginia as may be deemed needful to bring about and carry into effect a settlement as in said Act provided; such pledge or deposit to be for such length of time as may be agreed on; and the said agreement of September 18, 1902, shall continue in force for the period therein specified; and the committee may enter into such further agreements with the said commission as may be deemed needful to bring about a settlement in the premises.

"II. In the event that no settlement shall be effected by the Virginia commission either under the agreement of September 18, 1902, within the period therein specified, or under any other agreement which may be entered into between the committee and the said commission within such time as may be limited therein, the committee may, after any and all such agreements with the said commission shall have expired, take such other and further proceedings and make such other and further agreements and settlement in the premises as the committee may deem judicious.

"III. The committee shall be authorized to make such disposition by pledge, sale or otherwise, of the certificates, now or hereafter deposited, under the agreement of July 28, 1898, as may be necessary to carry into effect any proceedings taken and any agreements or settlements made by them as above stated, with or through the said commission or otherwise, or for the payment of expenses now or hereafter to be incurred, whether a settlement is effected or not, not to exceed, however, the limit fixed by said agreement, and may give such release and acquittance as may be necessary to that end.

"The amount realized on or the proceeds of any such settlement, after deducting proper charges under the agreement of July 28, 1898, shall be apportioned and distributed among the different certificate holders in such manner and according to such percentages as may be ascertained and established for the different classes of certificates by a tribunal to be constituted as follows; one member thereof to be appointed by the committee, one member by the advisory board, and the third by the two so appointed; and if it be impracticable in the judgment of such tribunal to distribute in kind any bonds or securities which may be received in any such settlement, then the same may be sold and converted into money for the purposes of such distribution. If a vacancy occur in such tribunal the same shall be filled by the remaining members.

"New York, December 3d, 1902."

This agreement was signed by the members of the advisory board and the chairman of the committee.

On the 14th day of December, 1904, an additional agreement was made between the depositing committee and the Virginia commission, which was extended indefinitely as to time by contracts made September 9, 1905 and November 24, 1905. The said contracts are as follows:

> "Memorandum of agreement, made this 14th day of December, 1904, between the depositing committee of the securities known as the Virginia deferred certificates as constituted under the contract of July 28th, 1898, and of which John Crosby Brown is chairman, and Robert L. Harrison, secretary, acting under the plan of settlement approved on December 3rd, 1902, by the advisory board referred to in the said contract, hereinafter referred to as the depositing committee, party of the first part, and the commission constituted on behalf of the State of Virginia for the purpose of bringing about a settlement with the State of West Virginia with respect to said certificates as constituted and acting under the joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, approved March 6, 1894, and the act of said General Assembly, approved March 6, 1900, and of which John B. Moon is chairman, and Joseph Button is secretary hereinafter referred to as the Virginia commission, party of the second part:
> "Whereas, by an agreement entered into between the above parties on the 18th day of September, 1902, certain of the certificates aforesaid amounting in the aggregate to $10,347,570.85 were tendered by the depositing committee aforesaid to the said Virginia commission, and were placed subject to the control of the said commission upon the agreement and arrangement on the part of the said commission acting for the State of Virginia under the said joint resolution and act of assembly aforesaid, that the said commission should enter into negotiations with the State of West Virginia or the constituted authorities thereof for the purpose of effecting with West Virginia a settlement with respect to the said certificates, in accordance with the said contract of July 28th, 1898, and in accordance with such plan of settlement as was then proposed or might thereafter become effective, and that the said commission would, by and with the advice and approval of the attorney-general of Virginia, take such action as they might deem needful in the premises; and that in the event such a settlement was so made, then it was agreed that the amount realized thereon should be accepted in full satisfaction of all the claims of the certificate-holders thereunder, and that the said committee would surrender to the said commission, in exchange for such amount, the certificates so placed subject to the control of said commission. And it was further specified in the said agreement of September 18, 1902, that the same should apply to and include all such certificates as might thereafter be deposited with and held by the said committee under the said contract of July 28, 1898, and that the said agreement should constitute an arrangement and contract between the said committee acting for the said certificate-holders with the State of Virginia for obtaining a settlement with West Virginia, and that the same should continue binding upon the parties and upon the holders of the certificates so deposited for the three years next ensuing from the date of the said agreement; that is to say, until the 18th day of September, 1905. And the said agreement further provided that the same should be subject to renewal and extension for such further time as might be agreed upon between the parties and to such modification and amendment as might thereafter be agreed upon; and

"Whereas, the said agreement of September 18, 1902, was approved by the Hon. William A. Anderson, attorney-general of Virginia, by his endorsement at the foot thereof on the 29th day of September, 1902; and

"Whereas, the provisions of the said agreement last named were fully approved and recommended on the 3rd day of December, 1902, by the advisory board referred to in the said contract of July 28, 1898, as appears by the plan of settlement made and approved by the said committee and the advisory board and bearing date December 3rd, 1902, of which plan of settlement publication was duly made as provided in the said contract of July 28, 1898, and no notification whatsoever was given to the said committee, either directly or through any depository, by any of the holders of the deposited certificates, of their unwillingness to accept the proposed settlement as set forth in the said plan so published and more than thirty days having elapsed after the said publication was completed, and the said plan of settlement having therefore become complete; and of this fact the declaration in writing of the committee having been duly made to the only depository under the said contract, to wit, Messrs. Brown Brothers & Company, of 29 Wall street, New York, the said plan of settlement thereupon became effective and final; and

"Whereas, it is now proposed under the terms of the said agreement of September 18, 1902, and by way of modification thereof as therein provided, to place more fully and completely under the control of the said Virginia Commission all the certificates aforesaid which had up to that date been deposited, and also all thereafter deposited so that the said Virginia commission may be given full and complete control of all the said certificates in their proposed negotiations with the State of West Virginia, and also in any action and proceeding which may be taken or instituted by the said Virginia Commission by and with the advice and approval of the said attorney-general under the said act of the General Assembly of Virginia March 6, 1900:

"Now therefore this agreement witnesseth: that the aforesaid depositing committee does hereby authorize and direct their said depository Messrs. Brown Brothers & Company to issue to the Virginia Debt Commission a certificate that all the aforesaid Virginia deferred certificates which have up to this time been deposited with the said Brown Brothers and Company under the said depositing agreement of July 28, 1898, and all which may hereafter and before the 18th day of September, 1905, be so deposited with the said depository are held by the said depository on deposit for and subject in all respects to the control and disposition of the said Virginia Commission in pursuance of the said joint resolution and act of the General Assembly of Virginia; and to this end the said Messrs. Brown Brothers & Company are authorized and instructed to issue such certificate to the said Virginia Commission in such form as to show that all of the certificates aforesaid have been received and are held by them on deposit for the said Virginia Commission and subject to the control and disposal of the said commission:

"But this agreement shall continue in force only until the said 18 day of September, 1905, when the said certificate issued by the said Brown Brothers and Company to the said Virginia commission for the purpose of making a settlement with West Virginia as aforesaid shall be returned to the said depositing committee, unless a settlement shall have been before that time negotiated with West Virginia in pursuance of said contract of September 18th, 1902, or unless negotiations be then pending with the properly constituted authorities of West Virginia for such settlement upon some equitable basis which has been agreed to by said commission and the authorities of West Virginia aforesaid. Provided, however, That it is fully understood and agreed that the time for continuing in force this agreement may be extended by the consent and agreement of the parties hereto indorsed hereon or at the foot hereof, for such length of time and upon such conditions as the parties may hereafter specify; and this agreement may be changed, modified and amended with respect to the action and proceedings to be taken or instituted by the said commission in the premises, as may hereafter be agreed upon by the parties and then indorsed as aforesaid, or as may be specified in a further and supplemental agreement between the parties.

"In testimony whereof the signatures of the chairman of the said depositing committee and of the Virginia Commission, attested by the respective secretaries thereof, are hereunto affixed on the day and year first above written.

"JOHN B. MOON,
"Chairman of Virginia Commission.

"JOSEPH BUTTON, Secretary."

"The foregoing agreement is hereby approved as having been entered into by my advice and approval.

"WILLIAM A. ANDERSON,
"Attorney-General of Virginia.

"Dated December 14, 1904."

"The foregoing agreement of December 14th, 1904, together with the contract of September 18th, 1902, therein referred to, are hereby extended in all their provisions until December 1st, 1905, and they shall remain in full force until that date just as if December 1st, 1905, instead of September 18th, 1905, had been the date originally named therein for their limitation, with the right of extension, enlargement and modification on or before December 1st, 1905, in all respects as therein specified.

"Given under our hands this 9th day of September, 1905.

"JOHN CROSBY BROWN,
"Chairman Depositing Committee.

"ROBT. L. HARRISON, Secretary.

"JOHN B. MOON,
"Chairman Virginia Commission.

"JOS. BUTTON, Secretary."

"The above extension of the contracts above referred to is hereby approved this 9th day of September, 1905.

"WILLIAM A. ANDERSON.
"Attorney General of Virginia."

"Upon the execution of the foregoing contract of December 14, 1904, hereto annexed, Messrs. Brown Bros. & Co., bankers of New York, N. Y., the depository referred to in said contract, issued to the Virginia Commission therein named the certificate provided for in said contract, which was also in the form of a receipt and showed that Virginia deferred certificates of 1871 to the amount of $10,639,776.42 and certificates of other dates to the amount of $2,270,779.47 were held by said Brown Bros. & Co. on deposit for and subject to the control and disposal of said commission; thus placing subject to the complete control and disposal of the commission considerably more than two-thirds of the total of $12,703,451.79 of the certificates of 1871 outstanding and in the hands of the public, and a large mapority of the total of $2,778,239.80 of the other certificates so outstanding.

"Thereafter, in January and February, 1905, the Virginia Commission, through its properly constituted sub-committee acting with the attorney-general of Virginia, made to the governor and attorney-general of West Virginia, and to the finance committees of the legislature of that State, which was then in session, a full statement and presentation of the matters outstanding and unsettled between the two States in connection with the deferred certificates aforesaid, accompanied by an urgent plea on behalf of the State of Virginia that the legislature of West Virginia would, at least, appoint a committee or other public functionary with authority to take up the questions involved for the purposes of discussion and negotiation, but the commission was again met, as it had been in a previous attempt to open negotiations on the subject, by an absolute refusal on the part of the authorities of West Virginia to treat on the subject at all; thus leaving to the Virginia Commission and attorney-general of that State no possible means of bringing about the settlement, which they are charged with the responsibility of making, except by a resort to the court having jurisdiction of controversies between States.

"Now, therefore, it is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the depositing committee, named as the party of the first part in the said foregoing contract of December 14th, 1904, and the Virginia Commission therein named as the party of the second part, the said commission acting in this behalf by and with the advice and approval of the attorney-general of Virginia, that in accordance with the provisions contained in the said foregoing contract and addendum thereto of September 9th, 1905, the same is hereby amended, modified and extended as follows, to wit:

"1st. Neither the said foregoing contract of December 14th, 1904, nor the contract therein referred to between the same parties, bearing date September 18th, 1902, shall expire on the 1st day of December, 1905, but the same shall continue in force in all respects just as if no time limit had been named in either of said contracts, and this agreement shall be taken as a continuation, modification and extension of said contracts.

"2nd. The certificaie or certificates heretofore given by Brown Bros. & Co., the depository of the said committee, to the said Virginia Commission, covering the deferred certificates aforesaid, shall be retained by the said commission and shall remain in full force and effect without regard to time limit; and the said Brown Bros. & Co. shall issue and give to the said commission such other and further certificates and receipts in the premises, by way of amendment or in lieu of those already given or otherwise, as may be deemed needful or desirable in order to place said deferred certificates more completely and finally under the control and at the disposal of the said commission for the purpose of carrying out this agreement; and especially shall they give such certificates or receipts to cover all such Virginia deferred certificates as have been or may be deposited with them and not covered by certificates or receipts previously given to the commission; and the said Virginia Commission are hereby given and invested with the full and complete control and right to dispose of all deferred certificates now or hereafter covered by or embraced in the receipts and certificates of Brown Bros. & Co., as aforesaid.

"3rd. The said Virginia Commission hereby stipulate and agree, by and with the advice and approval of the attorney-general of Virginia, that, in their judgment, it is needful and proper, in order to protect the interest of the State and bring about and carry into effect a settlement in the premises, that a suit should be instituted in the name of the State of Virginia against the State of West Virginia in the Supreme Court of the United States asking for an adjudication and settlement by that court of the matters aforesaid unsettled and undetermined between the two States, arising or growing out of the debt of the original State of Virginia before its dismemberment and on account of which said deferred certificates were issued, the same to be brought and instituted as provided in the act of the General Assembly of Virginia, of March 6th, 1900, referred to in said contract of December 14th, 1904; and the said Virginia Commission acting by and with the advice and approval of the attorney-general of that State, do hereby undertake and agree that such a suit shall be brought against the State of West Virginia for the purpose of obtaining a settlement as aforesaid, as soon as the pleadings, papers and documents relating thereto can be conveniently and properly drawn up and prepared for presentation to the said court, which said suit shall be instituted, conducted and proceeded with in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the said act of the General Assembly of Virginia and the joint resolution of the said General Assembly of March 6th, 1894, also referred to in said contract of December 14th, 1904; but the power to make and carry into effect a settlement and adjustment in the premises by agreement with West Virginia as to the deferred certificates placed subject to the control of the commission as aforesaid, as provided in the previous contracts aforesaid, shall remain vested in the said commission, notwithstanding the institution and pendency of such suit.

"4th. And the Virginia Commission do further undertake and agree that, in accordance with the terms and conditions of the said joint resolution and act of the General Assembly of Virginia, they will account for, pay over and deliver such amount, either in cash or securities, as may be realized from West Virginia through any settlement made by the said commission with that State, either by means of an adjudication or recovery in said suit or otherwise, for or on account of the deferred certificates now or hereafter deposited and placed subject to their control as aforesaid, to the said depositing committee in full settlement and satisfaction of all claims under said certificates; and the said depositing committee agrees on behalf of the depositors of said deferred certificates so placed subject to the control of the said commission and on behalf of those entitled to the benefit of said certificates as assignees of said depositors or otherwise to accept as aforesaid such amount, either in cash or securities, as may be determined or ascertained in any such suit to be due by, or as may be realized through any adjustment or settlement as aforesaid from the State of West Virginia on account of the said certificates and on account of the bonds represented by and mentioned in the said certificates respectively, in full settlement and satisfaction of all claims on account of said certificates and on account of the bonds therein mentioned, and to accept and take such adjudication against the State of West Virginia in full discharge and acquittance of all claims in the premises against the State of Virginia.

"5th. It is further understood and agreed that if from any cause the said commission shall fail or be unable to bring about such adjustment or settlement or to obtain a determination or ascertainment of the liability of West Virginia as hereinbefore provided for, then it shall be the duty of the said commission to restore to the control of the said depositing committee all such deferred certificates as may have been placed subject to the control and disposal of said commission as aforesaid.

"RICHMOND, VA., November 24th, 1905."

This contract was signed by all the members of the depositing committee and the Virginia Commission, and approved by the attorney-general on the day of its date.

It appears from one of the exhibits attached to and made a part of the bill that the total amount of certificates issued by Virginia on acount of West Virginia's alleged proportion of the public debt was as follows:

Under the act of 1871	$15,281,970.47
Under the act of 1879	564,258.87
Under the act of 1882	1,775,603.48
Under the act of 1892	605,320.78
Total	$18,227,153.60

(R., p. 90.)

It appears that on January 4, 1906, certificates to the amount of $13,173,435.41 had been deposited by the committee with Brown Brothers and Company, and that they have been withdrawn by the Virginia Commission and are now in its custody or under its exclusive control.

For the owners of the whole amount of certificates issued, whether they have or have not been deposited with the committee or with the commission, Virginia sues as trustee in this case under the contracts and statutes to which we have referred.

The prayer of the bill is as follows:

> "Forasmuch, therefore, as your oratrix is remediless save in this form and forum, and to the end that the State of West Virginia may be duly served, through her governor and attorney-general, with a copy of this bill, your oratrix prays that the said State of West Virginia may be made a party defendant to this bill, and required to answer the same, that all proper accounts may be taken to determine and ascertain the balance due from the State of West Virginia to your oratrix, in her own right and as trustee as aforesaid; that the principles upon which such accounting shall be had may be ascertained and declared, and a true and proper settlement made of the matters and things above recited and set forth; that such accounting be had and settlement made under the supervision and direction of this court by such auditor or master as may by the court be selected and empowered to that end, and that proper and full reports of such accounting and settlement may be made to this court; that the State of West Virginia may be required to produce before such auditor or master, so to be appointed, all such official entries, documents, reports and proceedings as may be among her public records or official files and may tend to show the facts and the true and actual state of accounts growing out of the matters and things above recited and set forth, in order to a full and correct settlement and adjustment of the accounts between the two States; that this court will adjudicate and determine the amount due to your oratrix by the State of West Virginia in the premises; and that all such other and further and general relief be granted unto your oratrix in the premises as the nature of her case may require or to equity may seem meet."

The bill has been demurred to on the following grounds:

First. That it appears by said bill that there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff and a misjoinder of causes of action. The said bill is brought by the Commonwealth of Virginia to recover debts alleged to be due to her in her own right from the defendant for property and money alleged to have been transferred and delivered to the defendant under certain acts of the legislature passed in 1863, and also, as trustee for the owners of certain certificates mentioned and described in said bill, to have an accounting to ascertain and declare the amount claimed to be due from the defendant as her just proportion of the public debt of the plaintiff prior to the first day of January, 1861.

Second. That this court has no jurisdiction of either the parties to or the subject-matter of this action, because it appears by the said bill that the matters therein set forth do not constitute, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, such a controversy, or such controversies, between the Commonwealth of Virginia and the State of West Virginia as can be heard and determined in this court, and this court has no power to render or enforce any final judgment or decree thereon.

Third. That it appears by said bill that the plaintiff herein sues as trustee for the benefit of a number of individuals who are the alleged owners of certain certificates in the said bill set forth and described.

Fourth. That the said bill does not state facts sufficient to entitle the Commonwealth of Virginia to the relief prayed for, or to any relief, either in her own right or as trustee for the owners of the certificates therein set forth and described.

Fifth. That it does not appear by said bill that the attorney-general has ever been authorized to institute and prosecute this suit in the name of the Commonwealth of Virginia in her own right, but only as trustee for the use and benefit of the owners of certain certificates mentioned in the act of March 6, 1900, which is referred to and made part of said bill.

Sixth. That the said bill does not sufficiently and definitely set forth the claims and demands relied upon, but the allegations thereof are so indefinite and uncertain that no proper answer can be made thereto.

Seventh. That the allegations in the said bill are not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff therein, either in her own right or as trustee, to an account or to a discovery from this defendant.

Eighth. That the said bill does not contain any prayer for a judgment or decree or any other final relief against this defendant.

The first question to be considered in the case is whether this court has jurisdiction to hear and determine the causes of action, or any of the causes of action, alleged in the bill, for if no cause of action is alleged upon which the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment or decree in this court, it will not decide any of the other questions presented by the demurrer. Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine a cause between the parties to the action who are before the court, and to render a final judgment or decree and enforce its execution by judicial process. Judicial tribunals cannot take cognizance of controversies merely for the purpose of ascertaining and declaring what the legal or equitable rights of the parties are. They must render judgments or decrees which remedy the wrongs complained of, or enforce the rights asserted in the case; in other words, their powers are remedial, not merely declaratory.

Jurisdiction is defined by Bouvier as "the authority by which judicial officers take cognizance of to decide causes. Power to hear and determine a cause (3 Ohio, 494; 6 Pet., 591). The right of a judge to pronounce a sentence of the law on a cause or issue before him acquired through due process of law. It includes power to enforce the execution of what is decreed. (8 Johns., 239; 3 Met., Mass., 460; Thach., 202" (2 Bouvier Law Dic., 26).

In defining jurisdiction, Black says:

> "The power and authority constitutionally conferred upon or constitutionally recognized as existing in a court or judge to pronounce the sentence of the law or to award the remedies provided by law upon the set of facts proved or admitted, referred to the tribunal for decision and authorized by law to be the subject of investigation or action by that tribunal, and in favor or against persons (or a res) who present themselves, or who are brought before the court in some manner sanctioned by law as proper and sufficient. Jurisdiction is a power constitutionally conferred upon the judge or magistrate to take cognizance of and determine a cause according to law and to carry a sentence into execution (6 Pet., 591; 9 Johns., 239; 2 Neb., 135)."

The bill, so far as it relates to the old debt of Virginia, although it sets up all the provisions of the compact, seems to be framed upon the theory that West Virginia is liable for one-third of the debt as it existed prior to the first day of January, 1861, upon the alleged ground that the formation of the new State diminished the territory and population of the original or parent State to that extent. It is evident, however, that no such rule can be applied here, for this is not a case in which West Virginia's "just proportion" of the debt is to be determined upon such rules or principles as a court may decide to be fair and equitable, but is to be ascertained and paid according to a method agreed upon by the parties; and that method must be observed, whether the action is prosecuted at law or in equity. The liability of the defendant State, if any exists, is founded entirely upon a compact entered into between the two States with the consent of Congress, and the adjustment must therefore be made according to its terms. No rule, or supposed rule, of international law can be applied in such a case.

By the ordinance of the Wheeling convention, which represented the State of Virginia, consent was given to the formation of a new State out of a part of her territory, and it was provided, as we have already seen, that it should take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of Virginia existing prior to the first of January, 1861, which, according to the ordinance, was to be ascertained by charging to the new State all the State expenditures within the limits thereof and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of the debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the State of Virginia during that period from the counties included within the new State.

It was also provided that all private rights and interests in lands within the proposed new State derived from the laws of Virginia prior to the separation should remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State and should be determined by the laws then existing in the State of Virginia. At the time of the passage of this ordinance there was, of course, no State of West Virginia, and therefore no second party to the proposed compact or agreement. Subsequently the people inhabiting the counties proposed to be included in the new State held a sovereignty convention and adopted a constitution preparatory to admission into the Union. This was the first time the new State, or proposed new State, had the capacity to assent to, or dissent from, the proposition submitted by Virginia, and it assented to it with the qualification, or addition, that its equitable proportion of the debt should be ascertained by its own legislature as soon as practicable, and that the legislature should provide for its liquidation by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years. But this did not complete the compact, for Congress had not yet given its consent, which was necessary under the Constitution of the United States.

Afterwards application was made by the proposed new State for admission to the Union under the Constitution containing the provisions above recited; and, on the 31st day of December, 1862, an act was passed by Congress providing for its admission upon certain conditions, none of which had any reference to the indebtedness of the old State (12 Stat., 633). This act of Congress recited that the "Legislature of Virginia, by an act passed on the 13th of May, 1862, did give its consent to the formation of a new State within the jurisdiction of the said State of Virginia, to be known by the name of West Virginia," etc., etc. The Virginia act of May 13, 1862, was passed while the application of West Virginia for admission into the Union was pending, and its first section provided that the consent of the legislature of Virginia is given to the formation and erection of the State of West Virginia within the jurisdiction of that State, to include certain counties which are mentioned in the act, "according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the Constitution for the said State of West Virginia and the schedule thereto annexed proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 26th day of November, 1861."

It was further provided that—

> "This act shall be transmitted by the executive to the senators and representatives of this Commonwealth in Congress, together with a certified original of the said constitution and schedule, and the said senators and representatives are hereby requested to use their endeavors to obtain the consent of Congress to the admission of the State of West Virginia into the Union."

The schedule attached to the constitution of West Virginia and referred to in the act declared that "when the General Assembly of the State of Virginia and the Congress of the United States shall severally give their consent to the formation and erection of the State of West Virginia as proposed, the commissioners hereby appointed shall forthwith issue their proclamation," etc., etc.

Finally, on the 20th day of June, 1863, the State of West Virginia was admitted into the Union under the constitution framed by its convention, approved by the State of Virginia and the Congress of the United States. And thus the consent of that body was given to all the provisions of the agreement and it became a legal and constitutional compact between the two States.

Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall., 39.
Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat., 1-86.
Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U. S., 503.

West Virginia having agreed to the proposed compact, upon the conditions that her own legislature should ascertain the amount of the debt and provide for its liquidation in a certain manner and the reconstructed State of Virginia having been authorized by Congress to elect delegates to frame a constitution, proceeded to do so, and in 1867 adopted a constitution, the 19th section of article 10 of which contained the following provision:

> "The General Assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of Virginia proper to be borne by the States of Virginia and West Virginia, and shall provide that such sum as shall be received from West Virginia shall be applied to the payment of the public debt of the State."

In 1902, after Virginia had settled with her creditors, a new constitution was adopted, which omitted this section and contained no provisions upon the subject of a settlement with West Virginia.

It appears plainly from the foregoing that essential parts of the compact as agreed to by West Virginia were that the legislature of that State should ascertain what was her just proportion of the debt; that it should provide for its liquidation by the establishment of a sinking fund; that the State of Virginia assented to this condition by consenting to the admission of the new State "under the provisions set forth in the constitution of the said State of West Virginia and the schedule thereto annexed," and that Congress admitted the State under that Constitution, thereby consenting to the compact with the conditions constituting a part of it.

The two States have therefore, by compact between themselves, and with the consent of Congress, as required by the Constitution, designated a tribunal to ascertain and settle West Virginia's share of the debt. This tribunal still exists and is unquestionably competent to discharge the duties imposed upon it. And, moreover, but most important of all, it is the only tribunal existing, or that can be established, possessing the power to provide for the payment of West Virginia's share of the debt, when the same has been ascertained, in accordance with the terms of the compact. It cannot be coerced by any judicial or other civil process known to the Constitution or laws of this country. No court can compel it either to adjust the debt or to provide a sinking fund, or impose taxes, issue bonds, or appropriate money.

Conceding, for the sake of the argument, that Virginia might maintain a suit in this court as trustee, the question must be considered whether the bill states a good cause, or good causes, of action in favor of the plaintiff, either in her own right or as trustee for the parties. Clearly there is no cause of action shown against West Virginia under the provisions of the act of February 4, 1863, which is embodied in the bill (R., p. 4). The first section of that act appropriates $150,000 to the State of West Virginia when it shall be organized and admitted into the Union; but it does not provide that the new State shall account for it in any way. Whether the whole of the sum appropriated, or, if not the whole, what part of it, had been paid into the treasury by the counties located within the boundaries of the proposed new States does not appear from the act, and is not alleged in the bill. As there was no provision that it should be accounted for or repaid to Virginia, the presumption is, especially in the absence of an allegation upon that subject, that it was in fact collected from the West Virginia counties, or that it was intended as a gratuity to the new State. The bill being silent upon the subject and every presumption being against the pleader in such a case, the court cannot infer a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff. The second section of the act shows plainly on its face that it appropriated no money except what had been actually collected from the counties within the proposed boundaries of the new State, and as it was not required to account, and never agreed to account, no cause of action, legal or equitable, can be based on that part of the statute.

The other act under which a claim is made in this action was passed February 3, 1863 (R., p. 4). In brief, the first section of that act transfers to West Virginia certain public property "within the boundaries of the proposed new State of West Virginia when she becomes one of the United States," and declares that the title shall pass without any other assignment, conveyance, transfer or delivery than is therein contained. The second section provides that if the appropriation of the property, stocks, and securities made by the act shall take effect, the State of West Virginia "shall duly account for the same in the settlement hereafter to be made with this State." The bill alleges that the plaintiff "is informed, believes, and so charges" that the property transferred under this act consisted of a number of items, and that its value amounted to "several millions of dollars," but that the plaintiff is "unable to state at this time the exact amount." It is then alleged that the State of West Virginia realized from the bank stocks alone "about six hundred thousand dollars;" but there is no allegation as to their value at the time of the transfer.

It is evident that the "settlement hereafter to be made with this State" means a settlement of West Virginia's just proportion of the old public debt which had been provided for by the ordinance of the Wheeling convention and by the constitution of West Virginia, which was then before Congress on her application for admission into the Union. In the adjustment provided for in the compact West Virginia was to be charged with "all the State expenditures within the limits thereof," since any part of the debt was contracted, and consequently the State of Virginia, in order that it might not thereafter be claimed that the expenditures on account of the public property transferred by the act of February 3, 1863, were not to be included in the settlement under the compact, expressly provided that they should be. The bill therefore shows an attempt to make two causes of action out of one—a separate cause of action based upon the compact for the recovery of the amount of money originally expended by the State of Virginia in paying for the property so transferred, and another cause of action founded on the statute. The State of Virginia of course retained all the public property situated within her own boundaries after the separation, and it was the intention of Virginia that West Virginia should become the owner of all within her limits and should, in the settlement under the compact, account to the old State for the expenditures made by that State in procuring it.

We think enough will be said, and suggested, in other parts of this argument to establish the proposition that the State of Virginia has not alleged, and cannot allege, either in her own right, or as trustee, a good cause of action against the defendant State on the compact. Before she could possibly sue the defendant State, either at law or in equity, to recover for contribution, she must have paid the whole debt, or at least she must have paid more that her own legal or equitable share of it. As the case is now presented, neither Virginia nor her creditors have been injured in the slightest degree by the fact that West Virginia has not paid her proportion of the debt. Virginia has not been injured, because she has herself paid, or extended, only that part of the debt which, according to her own judgment, she would have been justly required to pay if West Virginia had fully complied with her alleged obligations, and she has been released from all the remainder; and the creditors have not been injured by any alleged default on the part of West Virginia, because they never had any claim, legal or equitable, against her and have voluntarily discharged their only debtor from liability. It is elementary law that if one owes a debt and another agrees with him—not with the creditor—that he will furnish a part of the money to pay it, or that he will reimburse the debtor as to a part of it, the original debtor cannot sue for contribution until he has paid the debt, and certainly not until he has paid his own share and some part of what the other agreed to furnish or reimburse; and in the latter case he could sue only for what he had paid in excess of his own share. The applicability of this legal and equitable rule is the same whether the liability to contribute is founded on an express contract between the parties or is implied, as in the case of cosureties.

It is not alleged in the bill that the State of Virginia has ever made an account or statement of her claim under the compact and presented it for payment or adjustment. On the contrary, it is shown by the bill and exhibits that as early as 1871, if not before that date, Virginia repudiated the compact and arbitrarily decided that West Virginia was liable for one-third of the debt, and has always, at least up to the time of the institution of this suit, insisted upon an adjustment on that basis only. This is shown by the preambles and provisions of every act passed providing for an adjustment with her creditors; and in the joint resolution of March 6, 1894, creating a commission to settle with West Virginia, it was declared:

> "But such commission shall in no event enter into negotiations hereunder except upon the basis that Virginia is bound only for the two-thirds of the debt of the original State which she has already provided for as her equitable proportion thereof."

This restriction upon the power of the commission has never been repealed, and that body has now no power to negotiate with the defendant State upon any other basis. It is a mockery, however, to characterize such a proceeding as a "negotiation." An ultimatum was presented at the very beginning, and West Virginia was distinctly informed that she must recognize her liability to pay one-third of the debt, or have no adjustment. Under this proposition no accounts were to be presented or examined, no vouchers or other documents were to be considered, except such as would show the amount of the debt prior to January 1, 1861; the terms of the compact were to be wholly ignored and nothing was to be done except to divide the amount of the debt by three. West Virginia was perfectly justifiable in declining to "negotiate" upon such a basis as this.

If the allegations contained in paragraphs fifteen and sixteen of the bill (R., p. 9) are to be regarded by the court as setting up a cause of action for West Virginia's equitable proportion of the debt, the plaintiff is claiming in this case a double liability upon the part of that State—a liability for her equitable proportion, or for one-third, of $33,000,000, the alleged amount of the whole public debt on the 1st of January, 1861, and also a liability for her equitable proportion, or one-third, of the $25,000,000 alleged to have been paid by Virginia, which is a part of the $33,000,000. We do not tnink, however, that the court can regard the general and indefinite allegations in the paragraphs to which we have referred as even a serious attempt to state a cause of action; but if it is, then the bill contains three separate claims instead of two.

But it is clear that Virginia could not under the ordinance, or upon any principle of law or equity, have a cause of action against West Virginia for contribution to the payment of her (Virginia's) own equitable share of the debt, either before or after she had paid it; nor can that State recover against West Virginia any part of the old debt from which she has been released and discharged by her creditors.

We have endeavored to show that if Virginia, either in her own right or as trustee, ever had a cause of action against West Virginia on account of the old debt, it was founded on the compact, and the sum she had a right to demand was to be ascertained and paid in the manner prescribed in the compact; but that State and her creditors have, without consulting West Virginia, created a situation which renders it impossible for this court, or any other tribunal, now to adjust the liability of the latter State in the manner therein prescribed without doing great injustice to her. An examination of the Wheeling ordinance shows that the amount of the Virginia debt as it existed prior to January 1, 1861, is not a factor to be taken into consideration in ascertaining West Virginia's just proportion. It is alleged in the bill that the debt at the time of the separation amounted to "about $33,000,000." When Virginia passed the ordinance, and when West Virginia accepted it with the modifications as to the manner of ascertaining and paying the debt, both parties knew what the amount of the indebtedness was; and it was agreed between them that if West Virginia was charged "with all the State expenditures within her limits and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State since any part of the debt was contracted, and credited with the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the proposed new State during the same period," the result would show what was her just proportion of the debt; that is, her just proportion of $33,000,000. If Virginia had repudiated the entire debt, or had admitted her liability for only $5,000,000, or for any other sum less than the $33,000,000, and her creditors had settled upon such a basis, it could scarcely be seriously contended that West Virginia would still be liable to her for exactly the same amount as if she had paid, or adjusted, the whole $33,000,000; and yet that will necessarily be the result if the mode of settlement provided for in the compact is applied to a situation which Virginia and her creditors have now created. The State of Virginia has not paid the debt, but has extended two-thirds of it, which she decided for herself was her equitable share, and has been released from all the remainder; but she now asks that West Virginia may be compelled to pay to her in her own right, or as trustee, the same amount precisely as if the whole debt had been paid or settled by the issue of new bonds.

It is important to bear in mind throughout the consideration of this case that West Virginia's obligation to pay a just proportion of the debt was to Virginia alone, not to the bondholders. As to the bondholders, Virginia was legally the sole obligor and has always remained so. Neither changes in her constitution of government nor in her territorial area could affect in any degree her liability under her previous obligations. Notwithstanding such changes in either of these respects, the State continued to be the same political entity which incurred the obligation, and the compact by which West Virginia agreed to pay her just proportion of the obligations was made between the two States alone, not between them and the bondholders, and the settlement was to be made between the two States. We doubt whether, in the absence of a compact on the subject, the State of West Virginia would have been legally liable to pay any part of it to Virginia, or to reimburse the parent State on account of any part of it; but as there was a compact, the discussion of these propositions would be purely academic in this case.

If the court has any power to render and enforce a judgment or decree in this cause which would afford to the plaintiffs effective and final relief, it must be a judgment or decree for a definite sum of money found to be due to the State of Virginia on a settlement made in the mode provided by the compact, or else the solemn compact entered into with the consent of Congress, thereby becoming, as this court said in State of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How., 185, "a law of the Union," must be wholly disregarded and the amount of the judgment or decree must be ascertained according to some other rule or principle, adopted by the court, to which the parties refused to assent when the compact was made. The adoption of the latter method is not even supposable, for the compact is either valid or invalid; and if it is valid, it cannot be disregarded by the court, while if it is invalid the consequence would be that West Virginia was unconstitutionally admitted and is not now a State of the Union, and therefore cannot be sued as such.

In Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat., 1–85, 86, this court said:

> "Now, it is perfectly clear that although Congress might have refused their consent to the proposed > separation, yet they had no authority to declare Kentucky a separate and independent State without the assent of Virginia or upon terms variant from those which Virginia had prescribed. But Congress, after recognizing the conditions upon which alone Virginia agreed to the separation, expressed by a solemn act the consent of that body to the separation. The terms and conditions, then on which alone the separation could take place, or the act of Congress become a valid one, were necessarily assented to; not by a mere tacit acquiescence, but by an express declaration of the legislative mind, resulting from the manifest construction of the act itself. To deny this is to deny the validity of the act of Congress, without which Kentcky could not have become an independent State; and then it would follow that she is at this moment a part of the State of Virginia, and all her laws are acts of usurpation. The counsel who urged this argument would not, we are persuaded, consent to this conclusion; and yet it would seem to be inevitable, if the premises insisted upon be true."

In State of Penna. v. The Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How., 518, 566, the court, speaking of this same compact, declared (p. 566):

> "This compact, by the sanction of Congress, has become a law of the Union," citing Green v. Biddle, supra.

In the case of Poole v. Fleger, 11 Pet., 185, 209, the court construed the compact between Kentucky and Tennessee, consented to by Congress, determining a matter of boundary, and it held that—

> "The compact, then, has full validity, and all the terms and conditions of it must be equally obligatory upon the citizens of both States."

If the court is to found its judgment or decree upon the compact, it must take the place of the legislature of West Virginia in the determination of the amount due, and then it must also disregard the terms of payment provided for in the constitution of that State, which is a part of the compact, or it must in some way establish a sinking fund sufficient to discharge the interest and principal of the debt at the end of a series of years. It may be observed here that the sinking fund contemplated by the constitution of West Virginia was not intended to be, and in fact could not be, established until the amount of that State's proportion of the debt had been ascertained by the legislature, for until that had been done it was not possible to know what sum would be required to produce the necessary accumulation.

Leaving out of consideration the untenable proposition that the compact is to be disregarded and the adjustment made according to some rule or principle not recognized in it, the demand of the plaintiffs is, in substance and effect, that the court shall decree and enforce a specific performance of the compact, for if that is not the object of the suit, it presents only a moot question which the court will not decide. A mere declaration of the principles upon which an accounting shall be had and the taking of the account accordingly, to be followed by no enforceable judgment or decree, affords no relief and would therefore be an idle and useless proceeding. Besides, it is wholly unnecessary for the court to declare the principles upon which the adjustment shall be made; that is plainly done in the compact.

We have said that this court could not compel the legislature of West Virginia to levy a tax or appropriate money or issue bonds to provide for the payment of any judgment or decree which might be rendered in this case; and we may add that it could not even appoint a receiver or commissioner to collect a tax or to issue bonds for that purpose even if the tax had been imposed by the proper legislative authority, or the issue of bonds had been duly authorized.

The authorities upon this and analogous questions are numerous and conclusive. In Rees v. City of Watertown (19 Wall., 107), which was a suit in equity to enforce the collection of certain judgments upon the bonds of the city of Watertown, the court said:

> "We are of the opinion that this court has not the power to direct a tax to be levied for the payment of these judgments. This power to impose burdens and raise money is the highest attribute of sovereignty, and is exercised, first, to raise money for public purposes only; second, by the power of legislative authority only. It is a power that has not been extended to the judiciary. Especially is it beyond the power of the Federal judiciary to assume the place of a State in the exercise of this authority at once so delicate and so important."

And, after referring to the statute, the court said:

> "But independently of this statute, upon the general principles of law and of equity jurisprudence, we are of opinion that we cannot grant the relief asked for. The plaintiff invokes the aid of the principle that all legal remedies having failed, the court of chancery must give him a remedy; that there is a wrong which cannot be righted elsewhere, and hence the right must be sustained in chancery. The difficulty arises from too broad an application of a general principle. The great advantage possessed by the court of chancery is not so much in its enlarged jurisdiction as in the extent and adaptability of its remedial powers. Generally this jurisdiction is as well defined and limited as is that of a court of law. It cannot exercise jurisdiction when there is an adequate and complete remedy at law. It cannot assume control over that large class of obligations called imperfect obligations, resting upon conscience and moral duty only, unconnected with legal obligations. Judge Story says: 'There are cases of fraud, of accident, and of trust which neither courts of law nor of equity presume to relieve or to mitigate,' of which he cites many instances. Lord Talbot says: 'There are cases, indeed, in which a court of equity gives a remedy where the law gives none, but where a particular remedy is given by law, and that remedy > bounded and circumscribed by particular rules, it would be very improper for this court to take it up where the law leaves it, and extend it further than the law allows.' "

Again the court said:

> "A court of equity cannot, by avowing that there is a wrong and no remedy known to the law, create a remedy in violation of law, or even without the authority of law. It acts upon established principles not only, but through established channels. Thus, assume that the plaintiff is entitled to the payment of his judgment, and that the defendant neglects its duty in refusing to raise the amount by taxation, it does not follow that this court may order the amount to be made from the private estate of one of its citizens."

Again the court said, in the course of its opinion:

> "The want of a remedy and the inability to obtain the fruits of a remedy are quite distinct, and yet they are confounded in the present proceedings."

In Heine v. The Levee Commissioners (19 Wall., 655) the court said, speaking of the right to give a party the relief demanded:

> "If sustained at all it must be on the very broad ground that because the plaintiff finds himself unable to collect his debt by proceedings at law, it is the duty of a court of equity to devise some mode by which it can be done. It is, however, the experience of every day and of all men, that debts are created which are never paid, though the creditor has exhausted all the resources of the law. It is a misfortune which in the imperfection of human nature often admits of no redress. The holder of a corporation bond must in common with other men submit to this calamity, and the law affords no relief.
> "The power we are here asked to exercise is the very delicate one of taxation. This power belongs in this country to the legislative sovereignty, State or national. In the case before us the national sovereignty has nothing to do with it. The power must be derived from the legislature of the State. So far as the present case is concerned, the State has delegated the power to the levee commissioners. If that body has ceased to exist, the remedy is in the legislature either to assess the tax by special statute or to vest the power in some other tribunal. It certainly is not vested, as in the exercise of an original jurisdiction, in any federal court. It is unreasonable to suppose that the legislature would ever select a federal court for that purpose. It is not only not one of the inherent powers of the court to levy and collect taxes, but it is an evasion by the judiciary of the federal government of the legislative functions of the State government. It is a most extraordinary request, and a compliance with it would involve consequences no less out of the way of judicial procedure, the end of which no wisdom can foresee."

In The State Railroad Tax Cases (92 U. S., 575), speaking of the want of authority in judicial tribunals to interfere with the process of collecting taxes, the court said:

"It is a wise policy. It is founded in the simple policy derived from experience of ages that the payment of taxes has to be enforced by summary and stringent means against a reluctant and often adverse sentiment; and to do this successfully other instrumentalities and other modes of enforcing it are necessary than those which belong to courts of justice. See Cheatham v. Norvell, decided at this term; Nickoll v. United States (7 Wall., 122); Dow v. Chicago (11 Ill., 108)."

In Merriweather v. Garrett (102 U. S., 472), the court said, on page 501:

"The power of taxation is legislative and cannot be exercised otherwise than by the authority of the legislature. * * * Taxes can only be collected under authority of the legislature. If no such authority exists the remedy is by appeal to the legislature which alone can grant relief."

And Mr. Justice Field, for himself and Mr. Justice Miller and Mr. Justice Bradley, in a concurring opinion, said, on page 515:

> "The courts cannot continue in force the taxes levied, nor levy new taxes for the payment of the debts of the corporation. Levying taxes is not a judicial act. It has no elements of one. It is a high act of sovereignty, to be performed only by the legislature upon considerations of policy, necessity and the public welfare. In a distribution of the powers of government in this country into three departments, the power of taxation falls to the legislative. It belongs to that department to determine what measures shall be taken for the public welfare and to provide the revenues for the support and due administration of the government throughout the State in all its subdivisions. Having the sole power to authorize the taxation, it must equally possess the sole power to prescribe the means by which the tax shall be collected and to designate the officers through whom its will shall be enforced.
>
> "It is the province of the courts to decide cases between parties and in so doing to construe the constitution and statutes of the United States and of the sovereign States and to declare the law, and when their judgments are rendered, to enforce them by such remedies as legislation has prescribed or as are allowed by the established practice. When they go beyond this, they go outside of their legitimate domain and encroach upon the other departments of the government, and all will admit that a strict confinement of each department within its own proper sphere was designed by the founders of the government, and is essential to its successful administration."

In Heine v. The Levee Commissioners (1 Wood, 247), in the United States circuit court, the opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Bradley, and, speaking of taxation, he said:

> "The judicial department has no power over the subject. If the officers who are charged with the duty of laying or collecting taxes refuse to perform their functions, the court, in a clear case of failure, and at the instance of a party directly interested, can, by the prerogative of the writ of mandamus, compel them to perform acts which are ministerial as distinguished from those which are judicial or discretionary. This is all that the judicial department can do on the subject unless the legislation has expressly conferred upon it further powers."

Louisiana v. Jumel (107 U. S., 711) was a bondholders' bill against the State board of liquidation, alleging that the State had impaired the obligation of an express contract, and there was also a petition for a mandamus against the board and the State auditor and treasurer. The object of the proceedings was to compel the State officers to pay from the general funds of the State the repudiated bonds and coupons held by the complainants. The court said:

"In neither of the suits was any inquiry to be instituted in respect to the particular bonds and coupons held by the plaintiffs, or any special relief afforded as to them. All that is asked will inure as much to the benefit of the other holders of similar obligations as to the particular parties to these suits. So that the remedy sought implies power in the judiciary to compel the State to abide by and perform its contracts for the payment of money, not by rendering and enforcing a judgment in the ordinary form of judicial procedure, but by assuming the control of the administration of the fiscal affairs of the State to the extent that may be necessary to accomplish the end in view.

"In United States v. Lee, 106 U. S., 196, it was held that the officers of the United States, holding in their official capacity the possession of lands to which the United States had no title, could be required to surrender their possession to the rightful owner even though the United States were not a party to the judgment under which the eviction was to be had. Here, however, the money in question is lawfully the property of the State. It is in the manual possession of an officer of the State. The bondholders never owned it. The most they can claim is that the State ought to use it to pay their coupons, but until so used it is in no sense theirs.

"Little need be said with special reference to the suit for mandamus. In this no trust is involved; but the simple question presented is, whether a single bondholder, or a committee of bondholders, can, by the judicial writ of mandamus, compel the executive officers of the State to perform generally their several duties under the law. The relators do not occupy the position of creditors of the State demanding payment from an executive officer charged with the ministerial duty of taking the money from the public treasury and handing it over to them, and, on his refusal, seeking to compel him to perform that specific duty. What they ask is that the auditor of State, the treasurer of State, and the board of liquidation may be required to enforce the act of 1874, and 'carry out, perform, and discharge each and every one of the ministerial acts, things, and duties respectively required of them, * * * according to the full and true intent and purport of that act.' Certainly no suit begun in the circuit court for such relief would be entertained, for that court can ordinarily grant a writ of mandamus only in aid of some existing jurisdiction. Bath County v. Amy, 13 Wall., 244; Davenport v. County of Dodge, 105 U. S., 237. Our attention has been called to no case in the courts of Louisiana in which such general relief has been afforded; and the jurisdiction of the circuit court was, therefore, in no way enlarged through the operation of the removal acts, even if this is a case which was properly removed,—a question we do not deem it necessary to now decide. The remedy sought, in order to be complete, would require the court to assume all the executive authority of the State, so far as it related to the enforcement of this law, and to supervise the conduct of all persons charged with any official duty in respect to the levy, collection, and disbursement of the tax in question until the bonds, principal and interest, were paid in full, and that, too, in a proceeding in which the State, as a State, was not and could not be made a party. It needs no argument to show that the political power cannot be thus ousted of its jurisdiction and the judiciary set in its place. When a State submits itself, without reservation, to the jurisdiction of a court in a particular case, that jurisdiction may be used to give full effect to what the State has by its act of submission allowed to be done; and if the law permits coercion of the public officers to enforce any judgment that may be rendered, then such coercion may be employed for that purpose. But this is very far from authorizing the courts, when a State cannot be sued, to set up its jurisdiction over the officers in charge of the public moneys, so as to control them as against the political power in their administration of the finances of the State. In our opinion, to grant the relief asked for in either of these cases would be to exercise such a power."

And in the case of Thompson v. Allen County, etc. (115 U. S., 550), the whole subject was again reviewed by this court, upon a certificate of division from the circuit court. Two of the questions certified were:

1. Whether taxes levied under judicial direction can be collected through a receiver appointed by the court of chancery, if there is no public officer with authority from the legislature to perform the duty.

2. Whether taxes levied by State officers under judicial direction can be collected through a receiver appointed by the United States court where the legislature has provided an officer to collect, but there is a vacancy in office and no one can be found willing to accept the office.

This court answered these questions in the negative. (See also the same case reported in 13 Fed. Rep., 97, Mr. Justice Matthews delivering the opinion.)

It is evident that a judgment or decree in this case must be for money only and must be enforced, if enforced at all, either by a sale of the State's property or by taking control of its legislative and executive authorities and compelling them, by some process not heretofore known to our jurisprudence, to appropriate money from the State treasury for the satisfaction of the debt, or to levy taxes or issue and sell bonds for that purpose. The question whether any of these remedies can be afforded must, it seems, be directly met and finally settled in the present case if there is any good cause of action shown; for, as before said, there is no allegation that there is a lien or trust or any other element involved in either of the alleged causes of action to require the application of any remedy except a judgment or decree for money.

The jurisdiction of this court in an action brought by one State against another to settle a question of boundary, or to secure redress for wrongs and injuries perpetrated by another State upon the territorial rights of the complaining State, or upon the rights of large communities of its people, has been definitely settled by a long series of cases, beginning with Rhode Island v. Massachusetts (12 Peters, 657) in one class, and ending with the other class in the two cases of Kansas v. Colorado (185 U. S., 125) and Missouri v. Illinois (180 U. S., 208, and 200 U. S., 496). But when this court decides a question of boundary between two States, or the boundary between a State and a Territory of the United States, no judicial process is necessary to carry its judgment or decree into effect. When the fact as to the true location of the line of separation has been found by the court, the political departments of the Government, as well as the courts of the States concerned, are bound to recognize its adjudication as conclusive of the question, and the territory formerly in dispute must be thereafter treated as part of the State to which it has been awarded. It will be included by the legislative department of the United States in the congressional and judicial districts of that State, and its people will be recognized as qualified electors in the choice of members of the House of Representatives, and their representatives in the State legislature will be recognized as qualified electors in the choice of members of the United States Senate for that State. The executive department of the United States, in the exercise of its authority under the Constitution, in the execution of its powers concerning the constitutional and legal relations between the State and the general government, will also treat the territory as part of the State to which it has been adjudged to belong. No State which has lost part of its territory by such adjudication could, therefore, prevent the practical execution of the judgment or decree by legislation or otherwise; for every attempt to continue the exercise of its own jurisdiction over it would be defeated, not only by the political departments, but by the courts as well. So far as we have been able to ascertain, no judicial process has ever been issued or applied for to carry such judgments or decrees into effect, except an order directing the established line to be surveyed and properly marked.

In the other class of cases, where trespasses or nuisances are complained of, and where the acts complained of are done by or under the authority of the defendant State, a decree of this court enjoining the continuance of the wrongs would be binding upon all the officers and agencies of the State, and upon all other persons who might thereafter knowingly participate in the violation of the decree, and they could all be punished for contempt. A power to make and enforce a decree in such a case is very different from the power to make and enforce a decree requiring the legislative or executive authorities of the State to take affirmative action in regard to matters which their own constitution and laws, and the plan and theory of our dual system of government, have committed to their own exclusive judgment and discretion.

There is no fact alleged that would authorize a court of equity to take jurisdiction for the enforcement of such claims as are set up in this case. But, waiving, that subject for the present, we propose to confine ourselves in this part of the argument to the question whether this court, under that provision of the constitution which confers upon it jurisdiction over cases in which a State shall be a party, has the power, either in equity or at law, to hear and determine a case in which the final relief demanded is the rendition and enforcement of a simple judgment for money against a State. In United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S., 217, which is one of the cases relied upon to show the jurisdiction of this court in an action against a State for the recovery of money, not only was there no objection made to the jurisdiction at any stage of the proceedings, but the whole case, which involved no question of fact and only a single question of law, was, by the written consent of the parties, submitted to the court for its decision. It has been decided by this court that a State may waive its privilege and submit itself to the jurisdiction of any court at the suit of another State, or at the suit of an individual.

Beers v. Arkansas, 20 How., 527.
Clark v. Bernhard, 108 U. S., 115.

In the case last cited the court said:

> "The immunity from suit belonging to a State which is respected and protected by the Constitution within the limits of the judicial power of the United States, is a personal privilege which it may waive at pleasure; so that a suit otherwise well brought, in which a State had sufficient interest to entitle it to become a party defendant, its appearance in a court of the United States would be a voluntary submission to its jurisdiction; while of course those courts are always open to it as a suitor in controversies between it and citizens of other States."

We do not think, therefore, that the case relied upon can be properly considered as a conclusive adjudication that this court has jurisdiction of an action against a State for the recovery of a money judgment when the State has not consented to be sued, but is protesting. Besides, the court, after considering the question submitted by consent of the parties, found that nothing was due from the State and therefore was not required to render a judgment against it. What it would have done if it had found against the State, whether it would have decided that it had power to render and enforce a judgment for the payment of the money, cannot, of course, be known; but from what was subsequently said and done in the case of South Dakota v. North Carolina, 192 U. S., 286, we are at liberty to say that the question of power in the court to render and enforce such a judgment is at least still open.

In the case last referred to the court said:

> "But we are confronted with the contention that there is no power in this court to enforce such a judgment, and such lack of power is conclusive evidence that, notwithstanding the general language of the constitution, there is an implied exception of actions brought to recover money. The public property held by any municipality, city, county or State, is exempt from seizure upon execution because it is held by such corporation, not as a part of its private assets, but as a trustee for public purposes. Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S., 472, 513. As a rule, no such municipality has any private property subject to be taken upon execution. A levy of taxes is not within the scope of the judicial power except as it commands an inferior municipality to execute the power granted by the legislature."

The court then refers to the cases of Rees v. City of Watertown (19 Wall., 107) and Heine v. The Levee Commissioners (19 Wall., 655) and says:

> "In this connection reference may be made to United States v. Guthrie, 17 How., 284, in which an application was made for a mandamus against the Secretary of the Treasury to compel the payment of an official salary, and in which we said (p. 303):

"'The only legitimate inquiry for our determination upon the case before us is this: Whether, under the organization of the federal government, or by any known principle of law, there can be asserted a power in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, or in this court, to command the withdrawal of a sum or sums of money from the Treasury of the United States, to be applied in satisfaction of disputed or controverted claims against the United States? This is the question, the very question presented for our determination; and its simple statement would seem to carry with it the most startling considerations—nay, its unavoidable negation, unless this should be prevented by some positive and controlling command; for it would occur, a priori, to every mind, that a treasury, not fenced round or shielded by fixed and established modes and rules of administration, but which could be subjected to any number or description of demands, asserted and sustained through the undefined and undefinable discretion of the courts, would constitute a feeble and inadequate provision for the great and inevitable necessities of the nation. The government under such a regime, or, rather, under such an absence of all rule, would, if practicable at all, be administered, not by the great departments ordained by the constitution and laws, and guided by the modes therein prescribed, but by the uncertain and perhaps contradictory action of the courts, in the enforcement of their views of private interests.'

"Further, in this connection may be noticed Gordon v. United States, 117 U. S., 697, in which this court declined to take jurisdiction of an appeal from the Court of Claims, under the statute as it stood at the time of the decision, on the ground that there was not vested by the act of Congress power to enforce its judgment. We quote the following from the opinion, which was the last prepared by Chief Justice Taney (pp. 702, 704):

"'The award of execution is a part, and an essen> tial part, of every judgment passed by a court exercising judicial power. It is no judgment, in the legal sense of the term, without it. Without such an award the judgment would be inoperative and nugatory, leaving the aggrieved party without a remedy. * * * Indeed, no principle of constitutional law has been more firmly established or constantly adhered to, than the one above stated—that is, that this court has no jurisdiction in any case where it cannot render judgment in the legal sense of the term; and when it depends upon the legislature to carry its opinion into effect or not, at the pleasure of Congress.'"

The court also cited In re Sanborn, 148 U. S., 222, and La Abra Silver Mining Company v. United States, 175 U. S., 423, 456, and proceeded to say:

> "We have, then, on the one hand the general language of the constitution vesting jurisdiction in this court over 'controversies between two or more States,' the history of that jurisdictional clause in the convention, the cases of Chisolm v. Georgia, United States v. North Carolina, and United States v. Michigan (in which this court sustained jurisdiction over actions to recover money from a State), the manifest trend of other decisions, the necessity of some way of ending controversies between States, and the fact that this claim for the payment of money is one justiciable in its nature; on the other, certain expressions of individual opinions of justices of this court, the difficulty of enforcing a judgment for money against a State, by reason of its ordinary lack of private property subject to seizure upon execution, and the absolute inability of a court to compel a levy of taxes by the legislature. Notwithstanding the embarrassments which surround the question, it is directly presented and may have to be determined before the case is finally concluded, but for the present it is sufficient to state the question with its difficulties."

The decision of the question never became necessary, for the reason that the parties afterwards settled the matter between themselves, so that all that the court actually did in that case was to enforce a lien.

In United States v. Michigan, 190 U. S., 379, the opinion of the court was delivered upon a demurrer which, of course, admitted all the material allegations of the bill, and the court decided that the State of Michigan held certain funds and certain tools and machinery appertaining to the Saint Mary's River canal in trust for the United States, and that on the face of the bill the United States had a right to demand an accounting and a payment of the sum found due.

In the opinion it was said:

> "In the consideration of this case, the controlling thought must of course be to arrive at the meaning of the parties, as expressed in the various statutes set forth in the bill. While that meaning is to be sought from the language used, yet its construction need not be of a narrow or technical nature, but in view of the character of the subject, the language should have its ordinary and usual meaning.
>
> "Whether, under these circumstances, technical words were used to express the thought that the State was to be trustee, is not important if, upon a reading of the statutes and a survey of the condition of the country when the acts were passed, it is apparent that the intent was that the State should occupy the position of trustee in the construction and operation of the canal. Winona &c. R. R. Co. v. Barney, 113 U. S,. 618, 625."

And after an examination of the question the court held that the State was a trustee for the United States as to the money and property in its possession, and it overruled the demurrer and gave the defendant leave to answer.

In Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 Howard, 66, where a law had been constitutionally enacted by Congress making it the duty of the governor of a State to surrender fugitives from the justice of other States, the court held that the suit was against the State, although the governor was the only party made defendant on the record, and in the course of the opinion it said:

> "But the language of the act of 1793 is very different. It does not purport to give authority to the State executive to arrest and deliver the fugitive, but requires it to be done, and the language of the law implies an absolute obligation which the State authority is bound to perform. And when it speaks of the duty of the governor, it evidently points to the duty imposed by the constitution in the clause we are now considering. The performance of this duty, however, is left to depend on the fidelity of the State executive to the compact entered into with the other States when it adopted the Constitution of the United States and became a member of the Union. It was so left by the constitution, and necessarily so left by the act of 1793.
>
> "And it would seem that when the constitution was framed, and when this law was passed, it was confidently believed that a sense of justice and of mutual interest would insure a faithful execution of this constitutional provision by the executive of every State, for every State had an equal interest in the execution of a compact absolutely essential to their peace and well being in their internal concerns, as well as members of the Union. Hence, the use of the words ordinarily employed when an undoubted obligation is required to be performed, 'it shall be his duty.'
>
> "But if the governor of Ohio refuses to discharge this duty, there is no power delegated to the general government, either through the judicial department or any other department, to use any coercive means to compel him" (pp. 109, 110).

In Missouri v. Illinois, 200 U. S., 496, in which no judgment or decree for money was demanded, the court said:

> "In the case at bar, whether Congress could act or not, there is no suggestion that it has forbidden the action of Illinois. The only ground on which that State's conduct can be called in question is one which must be implied from the words of the constitution. The constitution extends the judicial power of the United States to controversies between two or more States and between a State and citizen of another State, and gives this court original jurisdiction in cases in which a State shall be a party. Therefore, if one State raises a controversy with another, this court must determine whether there is any principle of law, and, if so, what, on which the plaintiff can recover. But the fact that this court must decide does not mean, of course, that it takes the place of a legislature. Some principle it must have power to declare. For instance, when a dispute arises about boundaries, this court must determine the line and in so doing must be governed by rules explicitly or implicitly recognized (Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet., 657–733). It must follow and apply those rules even if legislation of one or both of the States seems to stand in the way. But the words of the constitution would be a narrow ground upon which to construct and apply to the relations between States the same system and municipal law in all its details which would apply between individuals. If we suppose a case which did not fall in the power of Congress to regulate, the result of a denial of rights by this court would be the establishment of a rule which would be irrevocable by any power except that of this court to reverse its own decision, an amendment of the constitution, or possibly an agreement between the States sanctioned by the legislature of the United States.

"The difficulties in the way of establishing such a system of law might not be insuperable, but they would be great and new."

In every case since the adoption of the eleventh amendment to the Constitution where the court has found that the effect of granting the relief sought by the plaintiff would be to enforce the claim of an individual, whatever may be its nature, against a State, it has denied its power, or the power of any other court of the United States, to do so. It can make no difference what means or devices the parties may have resorted to for the purpose of getting the case into the court, if it appears that the real object of the action and the effect of the judgment or decree would be to conclude the State itself, and not merely its ministerial officers or agents, the court has refused to exercise jurisdiction for that purpose.

> See Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall., 378; Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat., 738; Briscoe v. Bank, 11 Pet., 257; Jumel v. Louisiana, 107 U. S., 710; N. H. v. Louisiana, 108 U. S., 726; Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S., 270; Marye v. Parsons, 114 U. S., 325; Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S., 52; In re Ayres, 123 U. S., 443; Christian v. Atlantic & N. C. R. R. Co., 133 U. S., 233; Louisiana, etc., v. Steele, 134 U. S., 230; Penoyer v. McConnaughy, 140 U. S., 1; In re Tyler, 149 U. S., 164; Reagon v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co., 144 U. S., 362; Scott v. Donald, 165 U. S., 58; Tindel v. Wesley, 167 U. S., 204; Smith v. Ames, 169 U. S., 466; Fitz v. McGhee, 172 U. S., 516.

This being the law, it is not possible to see how the State of Virginia can maintain an original action as trustee in this court for the avowed use and benefit of individuals on claims in which she as a State has no interest. To sustain such a proceeding would be a palpable evasion of the eleventh amendment, and would establish a precedent which would practically nullify that provision of the organic law by conferring original jurisdiction upon the court in every case where an individual might choose to transfer his real property or his goods and chattels, or choses in action, to a State as trustee, even if it were done, as in this case, for the sole purpose of conferring jurisdiction on this court. Certainly it cannot be held that a controversy between two States, justiciable in this court, can be created by the transfer of a claim on behalf of an individual to one of the States as a mere trustee to sue and collect it, whatever may be the law in a case where the complaining State is itself the real and beneficial owner of the claim sued on. But this precise question was presented in the case of Kansas v. United States, decided February 25, 1907, and not yet reported, and the court disposed of it in a single sentence. After finding that the State was suing as trustee for the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company, the court said:

"In these circumstances we think it apparent that the name of the State is being used simply for the prosecution in this court of a claim of the railroad, and our original jurisdiction can not be maintained;" and the court held that as the United States has not consented to be sued the bill must be dismissed.

We cannot see how the provision of the Constitution which confers upon this court jurisdiction in cases in which a State shall be a party can be properly so construed and applied as to destroy, or disarrange, the distribution of powers between the federal government and the States, which that instrument establishes. To hold that the judicial tribunals of the United States, whether the case be in equity or at law, can seize and sell the property of a State or direct money to be paid out of its treasury, or assume control over its legislative and executive departments and decree when and how, and for what purpose, they shall exercise their constitutional authority, would be destructive of the independence of the several States in the management and control of their own internal affairs. Yet it is indisputable that if such tribunals possess the power to render valid judgments and decrees in such cases, they must be enforced by some one of the means we have stated.

Some other interpretation must therefore be given to the constitutional provision, some interpretation which will be consistent with the character of our political institutions and at the same time invest this court with original jurisdiction to hear and determine all controversies between States which affect their rights as States—that is, as political organizations clothed with the authority and charged with the duties of government. It is the duty of a State as such to preserve and protect its territorial area against the encroachments of another State; to see that the lives, health, and safety of its citizens are not impaired or endangered by the action of another State or by its authority; and when controversies arise concerning these matters, or others of like character, this court has original jurisdiction to hear and determine them. There is, in fact, no other way to settle them except by negotiations or war, and the latter is prohibited by the constitution. To confine the jurisdiction to controversies of the character indicated and decline its exercise in cases where the enforcement of a judgment or decree would destroy or impair the sovereign authority of the States, would establish a reasonable construction of the constitution and accomplish all its real beneficial purposes.

There are many controversies between individuals which no judicial tribunal can take cognizance of, notwithstanding the comprehensive terms in which their jurisdiction is conferred, many rights which cannot be enforced, and many wrongs which cannot be redressed by the courts. Although they were established for the purpose of administering justice, it often happens that they are incapable of doing so by reason of the character of the questions involved or the character of the remedies required.

It is safe to say that if the framers of the constitution had expressly provided that this, or any other tribunal of the United States, should have power to seize and sell the property of a State or control the legislative and executive authorities of a State in any matter concerning its financial or other internal affairs, their work would have been rejected, and we do not think such an extraordinary power should be now implied from the general grant of original jurisdiction to this court in cases where a State is a party.

While it appears from the quotations made from the opinion in South Dakota v. North Carolina that in the judgment of this court the question as to its jurisdiction to render and enforce a judgment or decree against a State in a suit on a contract for the payment of money, where no lien or trust exists, is still an open one, yet, in view of the facts that it has been elaborately discussed at the bar and much considered by the court in previous cases, we do not propose in this brief to repeat the arguments or cite further authorities. Some questions have been, we think, definitely settled by former adjudications. They are:

1. That the public property of a State cannot be seized and sold to satisfy a judgment or decree.

2. That a court has power in a case properly made to compel the municipal authorities or ministerial officers of a State to comply with the laws of the State in the matter of imposing and collecting taxes.

3. That no court can appoint a receiver, commissioner, or other official with power to collect taxes and apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of a judgment or decree, even after they have been imposed by the proper authorities of the State.

4. That no court can by its judgment or decree order the payment of money out of the State or national treasury when it has not been appropriated by the proper legislative authority.

5. That no court can compel the legislature or executive authorities of a State to impose a tax or issue bonds or appropriate money for any purpose, or to exercise any other authority vested in them by the constitution of the State. Unless the numerous cases establishing these propositions shall be overruled in whole or in part, or unless the present case can be in some way distinguished from them, it is plain that no enforceable judgment or decree can be rendered by the court on any one of the alleged causes of action; and if that is so, it has, according to all the authorities on the subject, no jurisdiction to hear and determine the controversy.

We confidently submit that the outline of the bill heretofore given and the exhibits made part of it shows conclusively that it is multifarious, and that the demurrer ought to be sustained on that ground, if any good cause of action is shown over which this court has jurisdiction.

Virginia suing in her own right upon a separate and independent cause of action alleged to belong exclusively to her is not the same party as Virginia suing as trustee upon a different cause of action for the use and benefit of others who have no interest in her claim. Moreover, the State could not sue in equity in her own right, in one bill, upon two causes of action so entirely separate and distinct from each other as the claim for money and property alleged to have been delivered to the defendant under the acts of the legislature, and the claim founded upon the compact for the defendant's just proportion of the old public debt, even if she had paid that debt and was entitled to contribution. The foundations of the two causes of action are wholly different, and they are of a wholly different nature and require different judgments or decrees. They involve different questions of law and fact, and a defense which would be good against one would be wholly inapplicable to the other.

"Multifariousness," says Foster, "consists in the joinder of two or more distinct and unconnected grounds for equitable relief each of which might be the foundation for a separate bill. This may occur in three ways—by misjoinder of plaintiffs; by misjoinder of defendants, and by misjoinder of grounds for equitable relief held by and against the same parties."

Foster, Fed. Prac., sec. 71; Calvert on Parties, Book I, ch. VII.

Story says:

> "By multifariousness in a bill is meant the improperly joining in one bill distinct and independent matters, and thereby confounding them; as, for example, the uniting in one bill of several matters perfectly distinct and unconnected, against one defendant, or the demand of several of a distinct and independent nature against several defendants in the same bill."
>
> Story's Equity Pl., sec. 271.

Again, it is stated by Story:

> "The result of the principles to be extracted from the cases on this subject seems to be that where there is a common liability and a common interest, a common liability in the defendants, and a common interest in the plaintiffs, different claims to property, at least if the subjects are such as may without inconvenience be joined, may be united in one and the same suit" (sec. 533).

In Daniel's Chancery Practice, page 335, it is said:

> "It may be that the plaintiffs and defendants are parties to the whole of the transactions which forms the subject of the suit and nevertheless those transactions may be so dissimilar that the court will not allow them to be joined together, but will require distinct records."

In Brown v. Guarantee Trust Co. (128 U. S., 404) this court said:

> "To support the objection of multifariousness because the bill contains different causes of suit against the same person, two things must occur: First, the ground of suit must be different; second, each ground must be sufficient as stated to sustain a bill. Bedsole v. Monroe (5 Iredell Eq., 313); Larkins v. Biddle (21 Ala., 252; Nail v. Mobley (9 Ga., 278; Robinson v. Cross (22 Conn., 171)."
> See also Shields v. Thomas, 59 U. S., 253 (18 How.).

In Walker v. Powers (104 U. S., 245), a case analogous to the present, there was a misjoinder of plaintiffs and a misjoinder of causes of action. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, and the cases of Emals v. Emals (14 McArthur [N. J. Eq.], 114) and Sawyer v. Noble (55 Me., 273) were cited and approved.

Doggett, etc., v. Florida R. R. Co. (99 U. S., 72).

In Salvidge v. Hyde (Jac., 151; 5 Mad., 158) the Vice-Chancellor said:

> "In order to determine whether a suit is multifarious, or, in other words, contains distinct matter, the inquiry is not, as this defendant supposes, whether each defendant is connected with every branch of the case, but whether the plaintiff's bill seeks relief in respect of matters which are, in their nature, separate and distinct."

In Church v. Citizens' Street Railway Company, 78 Fed., 529, the court said:

> "Multifariousness consists in stating against the same party two or more independent causes of action in the same bill; or it may consist in stating one or more causes of action against a portion of the defendants and another cause of action against another portion of the defendants."

In that action the plaintiffs, who had purchased stock in a corporation, attempted to secure relief for themselves in their own right on one cause of action, and also to secure relief against the same defendants for themselves and all other stockholders on another cause of action. The court held the bill was multifarious.

In Metropolitan Trust Co. v. Columbus & Hocking Ry. Co., 93 Fed., 689, Judge Taft said:

> "It it also true that a cause of action in favor of one in his own right is as distinct from a cause of action in favor of the same person as trustee as it is from that of a different person. And therefore that a defendant against whom a trustee attempted to unite in the same bill with a cause of action asserted by him as trustee a wholly distinct cause of action in his individual right might object on the ground of multifariousness. In the case before us the defendant railway company might therefore be heard to urge this defect in the bill, because it asks for an enforcement of two different liens held in different rights."

But the court held that the objection to the bill for multifariousness could not be taken by Zohorst and the Second National Bank, "for," said the court, "as to that issue made by the complainant as trustee the right is the same." And again the court said:

> "Upon that issue the complainant as trustee and in its own right has precisely the same interest. And the union of the two causes of action does not embarrass Zohorst or the bank in the slightest; for as to them, the causes of action raised but one narrow question" (page 691).

The difference between that case and the case at bar is obvious at a glance. In the case at bar the bill alleges two entirely separate and distinct causes of action arising out of two unconnected transactions, in one of which it alleges an interest in the plaintiff State, and in the other an interest as trustee, and thus presents two distinct series of issues to be investigated and decided. And, besides, it is perfectly clear that the State of Virginia has not the same interest in the cause of action alleged in her own right and in the one asserted as trustee; nor can the State of West Virginia make the same defense to both.

In Moss v. Cohen, 158 N. Y., 240, the plaintiff entitled the action as by himself individually and as executor, but there was only one cause of action alleged, and that was wholly for the benefit of the estate he represented. The court said:

> "There is no pretense or allegation that the plaintiff claimed more than a single right of recovery and that he brought to enforce as executor and for the benefit of the estate he represents";

and it held that there was consequently no improper joinder of parties.

In Hall v. Fisher, 20 Barb. (N. Y.), the plaintiff sued in its own name and also as administrator, alleging that he and his intestate were during the lifetime of the latter tenants in common, the intestate owning three-fourths and the plaintiff owning one-fourth of a lot of land; and his claim was that the defendants should account to him individually and to him as administrator for their shares of rents and profits. The court held that the cause of action should have been separately stated. It said:

> "How else can the defendant, if he has a defense of a different character as to each cotenant, avail himself of such defense? He might in this case have one defense against the plaintiff as to his personal claim and another defense as to the interest whose rights he claims to represent as administrator. It cannot be regular for a plaintiff to include in the same action claims in his individual right and as administrator of another. It was never allowed at common law and is not sanctioned or allowed by any statute, not even the Code."

It is evident that the State of Virginia, having been by contract with her creditors discharged from all liability for the one-third of the old debt represented by the certificates, has no pecuniary interest whatever in the alleged claim against West Virginia for which she sues as trustee; and it will not be contended, we presume, that the owners of the unfunded one-third of the ante-war debt, whether it is represented by the canceled bonds held in trust by the State or by the certificates, have any interest whatever in the claim of Virginia for money and property alleged to have been transferred to West Virginia under the acts of 1863. The unfunded one-third of the old bonds formerly held by the Virginia Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund is in the same position as that belonging to the other creditors. Virginia has solemnly and repeatedly declared that she was not liable for the one-third, has refused to pay it or any part of it, and has canceled the bonds and issued to the Sinking Fund and Literary Fund precisely the same kind of certificates issued to other creditors. The fact, if it be a fact, that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund are agencies of the State, would simply show that the State owed that part of the debt to herself. But the State has released herself from the obligation for one-third of the bonds originally held by these funds and has thereby withdrawn from them that proportion of the sum which she originally intended they should have. Unless, therefore, the two funds, as agencies of the State, now have a valid claim against West Virginia, their demands have been fully satisfied and extinguished. In any aspect, the claim is asserted by Virginia to recover from West Virginia for contribution on account of money which she (Virginia) has never paid.

The claim against West Virginia under the compact cannot be divided into separate parts, so that Virginia can sue in her own right or for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund for the part represented by the certificates held by those two funds, and also sue as trustee for another part held by different parties. The claim is an entirety and the amount is to be ascertained in solido, in the manner provided by the compact, and is to be paid in the manner provided by the compact. Whatever the amount might be, it was all payable to Virginia herself, and not to the bondholders, who never had a cause of action against West Virginia, even if the State had been suable; and they cannot create a cause of action for their own benefit, in the name of the State, by the process of having Virginia transfer the indebtedness, or a part of it, to them by the enactment of statutes or the issue of certificates or otherwise, and then transferring it back to the State as trustee. But whether the State is, or could be, legally a trustee, or whether, if she be legally a trustee, she could maintain an action in this cause in that capacity, makes no difference in the decision of the question of multifariousness, for the bill and exhibits show that for nearly, if not all, of the unfunded one-third of the debt she actually sues as trustee in this action and not otherwise; and that is sufficient to sustain the contention that there is a misjoinder of parties and a misjoinder of causes of action. Even, therefore, if it should be held that the State is suing in her own right for a judgment and recovery of the amount represented by the certificates held by the two funds, and as trustee for the holders of the other certificates, it would furnish another substantial reason for holding the bill to be multifarious. Besides, it would show that there is a conflict between the personal interests of the trustee and the interests of the cestuis que trust, for whatever the trustee might receive in her own right in the distribution of the sum recovered would, to that extent, diminish the portions of the other beneficiaries; and it is a well established rule that plaintiffs whose interests are conflicting cannot unite in the same action—a rule which ought to be rigidly enforced, especially when one of the plaintiffs sues as trustee for the others, and consequently controls the entire proceeding.

Walker v. Powers, 104 U. S., 245.

In view of her own statutes and the agreement she has exacted from the other holders of certificates, it is difficult to see how Virginia can consistently claim in this action to be suing in her own right to recover any part of the alleged indebtedness of West Virginia on account of the ante-war debt, or, for that matter, on account of any other claim. By statutes she has required her creditors to enter into contracts to defray all the expenses of this proceeding, to release her absolutely, and to accept whatever may be received from West Virginia—whether it be much or little or nothing at all—in full satisfaction and discharge of their claims, and this suit, as alleged in the bill, is being prosecuted under those statutes and agreements.

The bill wholly fails to show a case which entitles the plaintiff to an accounting against the defendant. There are no mutual accounts between the parties, no trust or lien alleged, no fraud, mistake, or concealment, no discovery asked or shown to be necessary, no multiplicity of suits to be avoided, no question as to the application of payments, and no question of apportionment or contribution except upon a basis which is expressly and plainly stated in the compact between the States, and which, therefore, calls for no exercise of the powers of a court of equity. In all its branches, the action is founded on contracts evidenced by the ordinance, and by statutes and constitutional provisions, easily interpreted and involving no question not cognizable in a court of law; and the only possible remedy is a simple judgment for money which a court of law is fully competent to award, if it can be awarded at all in such a case.

In a case where there are no mutual accounts, and no discovery is necessary, the court will not decree an accounting. Story says:

> "One of the most difficult questions arising under this head (and which has been incidentally discussed in another place) is to ascertain whether there are any, and if any, what are the true boundaries of equity jurisdiction in such matters of account as are cognizable at law; we say cognizable at law, for wher> ever the account stands upon equitable claims or has equitable trusts attached to it, there is no doubt that the jurisdiction is absolutely universal and without exception, since the party is remediless at law" (Sec. 454).

And again he says:

> "But in cases where there is a remedy at law, there is no small confusion and difficulty in the authorities. The jurisdiction in matters of this sort has been asserted to be maintainable upon two grounds, distinct in their own nature and yet often running into each other. In the first place, it has been asserted that where in a matter of account the party seeks a discovery of facts, and these appear upon his bill to be material to his right of recovery, there, if the answer does in fact make a discovery of such material facts (for it would be no ground of jurisdiction if the discovery failed), the courts have at once a rightful jurisdiction of the cause and may proceed to give relief in order to avoid multiplicity of suits" (Sec. 455).

The authorities in support of the propositions we have stated are substantially uniform.

In Russell v. Clark (7 Cranch, 89), this court said:

> "It is true that if certain facts essential to the merits of a claim, purely legal, be exclusively within the knowledge of the party against whom that claim is asserted, he may be required, in a court of chancery, to disclose those facts, and the court, being thus rightly in possession of the cause, will proceed to determine the whole matter in controversy. But this rule cannot be abused by being employed as a mere pretext for bringing causes properly from a court of law into a court of equity. If the answer of the defendant discloses nothing, and the plaintiff supports his claim by evidence in his own possession unaided by the confessions of the defendant, the established rules, limiting the jurisdiction of courts, require that he should be dismissed from the court of chancery, and permitted to assert his rights in a court of law."

See Fowle v. Lawrason, 6 Pet., 495; Dowell v. Mitchell and Mitchell v. Dowell, 105 U. S., 430 (and the authorities therein cited); Consolidated Safety Valve Co. v. Ashlan, 26 Fed., 369; Lord v. Whitehead, 24 Fed., 421; Gunn v. Brinkley, etc., 66 Fed., 382.

French v. Hay, 22 Fed., 231-237, was a bill for an accounting, and the court said:

> "And were it conceded that by the instrument through which he claims, French became the owner of the judgment, as between himself and Hay, we do not perceive how the concession could aid him in this case. If, as the bill avers, Hay collected the judgment and now holds the money for the use of the complainant, there is a complete remedy at law. This is not a bill for discovery and the aid of the court of equity is not needed."

It is shown by the bill in this case that the State of Virginia has in her own possession all the accounts, vouchers, and documents relating to the amount of the old indebtedness, and all the charges and credits that should be made against and in favor of West Virginia on the settlement provided for in the compact, and she offers to produce them before the master. The prayer of the bill asks that the defendant State "may be required to produce before such auditor or master, so to be appointed, all such official entries, documents, reports and proceedings as may be among her public records or official files and may tend to show the facts and the true and actual state of accounts growing out of the matters and things above recited and set forth," etc., etc.; but it is not alleged anywhere in the bill that the State of West Virginia has in her possession, or under her control, any such entries, documents, reports, or proceedings.

There is no semblance of a ground for the intervention of a court of equity in this case unless it be the fact that the jurisdiction of such a court can be invoked merely because the accounts necessary to be examined in deciding the controversy between the parties are voluminous or tedious; but in the case of Brown v. Chase, 94 U. S., 81, the court said:

> "If the evidence is merely voluminous or tedious, that circumstance is not sufficient cause for transferring a case from a court of law to a court of equity" (p. 824).

But it is unnecessary to discuss this question at length, for the distinction between the common law and equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under the constitution has been so often stated and explained in the decisions of this court that it would be tedious to repeat them here.

For cases in which this distinction is stated, see—

Fenn v. Holmes, 21 How., 491;
Robinson v. Campbell, 8 Wheat., 221;
Strother v. Lucas, 6 Pet., 768;
Parish v. Elkins, 16 Pet., 453;

There is no allegation in the bill that any authority has been given for the prosecution of this action on behalf of the State of Virginia, except for the single purpose of securing an adjustment of the proportion of the old debt proper to be borne by the State of West Virginia. The plaintiff State has already determined for herself what her just proportion of the debt is, and neither asks nor is willing to have that question reopened. The only authority for the institution of the suit is found in the act of March 6, 1900, which relates exclusively to the ascertainment of West Virginia's proportion of the debt represented by the certificates deposited with the commission, and provides that "the said commission shall be authorized and empowered by and with the advice and approval of the Attorney-General of Virginia to take such action and institute such proceedings in behalf of the State as may, in the judgment of said commission and Attorney-General, be needful and proper to protect the interests of the State and bring about and carry into effect a settlement as aforesaid." This is the whole extent of the authority given for the use of the name of the State in this action, and it is expressly limited to an action or proceeding on her behalf as trustee for the certificate-holders; and, as we have already shown, this court cannot entertain that part of the bill.

It was held by the court in Texas v. White (7 Wall., 700) that the governor of a State had the power to authorize the institution of an action by the State in a case where the interests of the State itself were involved; but no such rule can be applied where the suit is not for the assertion of a claim or the protection of a right belonging to the State, but is for the sole benefit of individuals, and she sues as their trustee. In such a case the legislature possesses the sole authority to direct its institution. But, whether this is the general rule or not, the fact in this case is that the legislature, the supreme authority of the State, did assume and exercise control over the subject, and by an act which was approved by the governor, specifically defined the purpose for which the name of the State might be used.

Ordinarily the objection that the suit was brought without authority from the party named as plaintiff should be taken by a plea in abatement, but where the lack of authority appears on the face of the bill or complaint, the question can be raised by demurrer. For instance, in a case where diverse citizenship is necessary to confer jurisdiction, and it appears on the face of the bill or complaint that the plaintiff and defendant are citizens of the same State, or even where it does not appear that they are citizens of different State, no plea in abatement is necessary, and a demurrer to the jurisdiction will be sustained.

The demurrer in this case calls the attention of the court to the fact that the bill contains no prayer for a judgment or decree or any other final relief. (See Equity Rule 21.) It merely asks that the principles upon which an accounting shall be had "may be ascertained and declared;" that an accounting may be had, and that the plaintiff may be granted such other and further general relief as the nature of the case may require or to equity may seem meet. We do not suppose a decree or judgment for the recovery of money or property can be rendered upon a mere prayer for general relief; but this is not a matter of great importance, because the bill might be amended in this particular.

We respectfully submit that the demurrer should be sustained and the bill dismissed.

J. G. CARLISLE,
For West Virginia.

Supreme Court of the United States,

OCTOBER TERM, 1906.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA vs. STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.	ORIGINAL NO. 7.

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF ON THE DEMURRER.

The evident purpose of the Virginia funding act of March 30, 1871, was to settle with the creditors for the full amount which the State had decided was her just share of the old public debt, and every creditor who surrendered his original bond for cancellation under the provisions of that act understood that he was being paid in the new bond all that the State recognized her obligation to pay. By presenting his bond for cancellation as required by the statute, and by accepting the certificate representing the remaining one-third, he necessarily released the State from any further pecuniary liability to him; for all the State agreed to do—if the language of the certificate constitutes an agreement—was, that the unfunded one-third "will be provided for in accordance "with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between "the States of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to "the public debt of the State of Virginia at the time of "its dismemberment." Both the act and the certificate issued under it provided that the State should hold the cancelled bonds in trust for the owners of the certificate (Record, pp. 15; 47-48).

The settlement referred to was to be made between the two States alone, and the essence of the agreement was that if anything should be received from West Virginia the holders of the certificates should have the benefit of it to the extent of their ratable shares. If Virginia had been suable, no action could have been thereafter maintained against her on this agreement unless she had actually received money in a settlement with West Virgina. Money so received would have been held in trust by the State for the certificate holders; and she now sues in that capacity for their exclusive benefit.

Unless Virginia has a valid claim in her own right against West Virginia for contribution independently of her transactions with the creditors, she cannot maintain this action. It certainly cannot be said that the issue of certificates to which West Virginia was not a party could confer upon Virginia a greater or more perfect right with respect to the unfunded one-third than she would have otherwise possessed; and, in fact, it is conceded by counsel that the liability of West Virginia is in no way affected by the issuance of the certificates. Although counsel insist that Virginia was not released from pecuniary liability under the act of 1871, yet the Attorney General, in his reply brief, says:

> "While the creditor, as the result of this arrange> "ment, took the risk of such a settlement ever being > "made, it was none the less the duty of Virginia to > "do all that she could, or all that could be reasonable > "and fairly expected of her, to bring about and effect
> "such a settlement; and, her repeated efforts to that > "end having proved abortive by reason of the failure
> "of West Virginia to meet her overtures, this suit
> "has become necessary."

The next funding act was passed March 28, 1879. It provided for the surrender and cancellation of the outstanding bonds and for the issue of certificates, and expressly declared that "The acceptance of said certificates "for West Virginia's one-third issued under this act shall "be taken and held as a full and absolute release of the "State of Virginia for all liability on account of said "certificates" (Record, p. 19). Notwithstanding this plain provision of the act, it is contended in one of the reply briefs that Virginia was not released from liability for the sums represented by the certificates issued under it. Of course, it was not necessary to provide that the State should be released from any part of the old bonds, because they had all been surrendered to her and cancelled, and no longer constituted, even apparently, an obligation upon her part.

The next act, which was passed February 14, 1882, also provided for the surrender and cancellation of the outstanding bonds, and for the issue of certificates for the unfunded one-third, "to be accounted for by the State of "West Virginia without recourse upon this commonwealth" (Record, pp. 28-29).

The next and last funding act was passed February 20, 1892, and it also required the surrender and cancellation of the outstanding bonds and the issue of certificates for the unfunded portion "to be accounted for to the holder "of this certificate by the State of West Virginia without "recourse upon this commonwealth" (Record, p. 30).

The foregoing references to the statutes show the relation which the State of Virginia bore to the unfunded part of the debt when the joint resolution of March 6, 1894, was passed constituting a commission to negotiate with West Virginia, upon the express condition, however, that it should "in no event enter into any negotiations "thereunder except upon the basis that Virginia is bound "only for two-thirds of the debt of the original State, "which she has already provided for as her equitable pro-"portion thereof" (Record, p. 40).

This was followed by the act of March 6, 1900, which authorized the commission to take the certificates on deposit "upon an agreement and contract on the part of the "holders of said certificates that if the said commission "would secure a settlement with West Virginia with respect to said certificates, the holders of said certificates "so deposited will accept the amount realized on such "settlement from West Virginia on said certificates as a "full settlement of all their claims thereunder" (Record, p. 42). And it was further provided that the commission, with the advice and approval of the Attorney General, might take such action and institute such proceedings "on behalf of the State" as might in their judgment be needful and proper to "bring about and carry into effect a settlement as aforesaid;" but it was expressly provided that the owners of the certificates should defray all the expenses involved in connection with the proceedings "and the State shall not be subject to any expense on that account" (Record, .pp. 42).

The contracts exhibited with the bill, which are set forth in full in our original brief, show that the holders of the certificates which were deposited with the commission agreed to all the terms and conditions of the acts last referred to; and the record shows that before the institution of this suit certificates to the amount of $13,-173,435.41 had been deposited with the commission. Of this amount $10,851,294.09 were issued under the act of 1871 (Record, p. 89). Certificates held by the State of Virginia or by the commissioners of the sinking fund and literary fund amounting to $2,745,462.01 have not been deposited, of which $2,578,518.68 were issued under the act of 1871 (Record, p. 90). If Virginia owes any part of the debt represented by these certificates, she owes it to herself on acount of obligations created for her own exclusive benefit, and West Virginia could in no event be responsible for any part of it.

The dissenting opinion of Judge Staples in the case of Antoni vs. Wright, 22 Grattan (62 Va.), p. 838, and the cases of Higginbotham vs. Commonwealth, 25 Grattan (66 Va.), p. 628, and Greenhow vs. Vashon, 81 Va., 341 are cited by counsel in support of their contention that Virginia was not released by the act of 1871 from the obligation to pay the unfunded one-third of the debt. But an examination of the cases shows that no such question was involved, or could have been involved, in either of them.

In Antoni vs. Wright, decided in 1872, the question was as to the constitutionality of the Virginia act of 1872, repealing the provision of the act of March 30, 1871, which made the coupons receivable for taxes. The court, in a very able opinion, held that the repealing act was unconstitutional. Anderson, J., in delivering a concurring opinion, said:

> "It matters not whether the State is released from "the one-third of the debt or not; if a new bond had "been given for the whole of the debt, it would have "been a valid obligation for a valuable consideration. "Whether the State is released or not for one-third "of the debt, it is very clear that in this transaction "she has only assumed to pay two-thirds of it. And "I could not say that she is bound for any more. "That question, though one of great interest to the "State, is not involved in this case" (p. 873).

We call the attention of the court also to what was said by the court on page 840 of the report.

In Higginbotham vs. Commonwealth, decided in 1874, the question was whether the State was bound under certain acts of the legislature to pay dividends on the stock of the James River & Kanawha Company. It was contended by the Attorney General for the State that the two States were bound ratably to the stockholders for the dividends agreed to be paid, and that Virginia was, therefore, released from one-third of it by the dismemberment. The court expressed the opinion that they were bound ratably, but that Virginia was not released, and, speaking of the State's attitude, said:

> "By the payment of the whole debt, an equity at "once arises in her favor to demand contribution "from the other State which she may enforce in the "United States Courts; a right secured to States but "denied to individuals. She cannot suffer, there- "fore, by doing right. Virginia has not lost her "identity by the loss of forty-eight counties and the "inhabitants thereof."

In the course of its opinion, the court further said:

> "It is scarcely necessary to add that in what has "been said above it had not been my purpose to ex- "press or intimate any opinion as to the respective "rights and liabilities of the State and those of her "creditors who have accepted the provisions of the "act of March 30, 1871, commonly called the funding "act. That question is not before us, even inci- "dentally, and no opinion is expressed thereon." (p. 636.)

There had been no adjustment between the State and the stockholders who sued in that action, as there had been with the holders of the old public debt, and therefore there was no foundation for the claim that the State had been released from any part of the liability for dividends. The position assumed by the court that West Virginia was liable directly to the creditors for her just proportion of the debt is not insisted upon by counsel in this case. On the contrary, it is conceded that if West Virginia is liable for contribution, it is to Virginia alone.

In 1886, when the case of Greenhow vs. Vashon was decided, the entire personnel of the court had been changed as a result of the controversy over the readjustment of the public debt. It was a proceeding to compel the treasurer of the State to receive coupons in payment of taxes, and the court held that he could not be compelled to do so because the funding act of March 30, 1871, was unconstitutional and void!

We think it is clear that Virginia has been released by the provisions contained in the various funding acts, by the surrender and cancellation of the bonds, by the acceptance of certificates under the acts, and by the contracts entered into between the creditors and the commissions; but, even if there had been no formal or voluntary release, the State has repeatedly declared in the funding acts and in the joint resolution of March 6, 1894, and the act of March 6, 1900, under which this action is brought, that she is not liable for the unfunded one-third of the debt. These declarations amount to a positive refusal to pay, or to fund, that part of the debt, and are therefore equivalent to a direct repudiation of the State's obligation to that extent.

Under these circumstances, what possible pecuniary interest can the State have in the claims alleged against West Virginia? But, no matter whether Virginia has been released or not, and no matter whether she has repudiated the one-third or not, she sues in this action for contribution, and no such suit can be maintained until she has actually paid, or in some way settled, more than her share of what her counsel call the "common indebtedness." She has decided for herself, with the consent of her creditors, what her just share was, and she has neither paid nor extended anything in addition. No authority has been cited, and we are not aware that any exists, showing that one co-obligor—and the States are not co-obligors—can maintain an action against another, either at law or in equity, for contribution, before he has paid more than his own just proportion of the joint indebtedness. The only authority relied upon by counsel on the other side in support of their contention on this point is 1 Spence, Equity Jurisprudence, p. 662; but that citation has no bearing upon the question.

Speaking of the right to sue for contribution, the author says:

> "If one of several sureties paid the whole or more "than his proportion of the debt, he might compel "his co-surety to contribute proportionately to the "amount so paid. So if the original debtor, or one "of the parties liable, becomes insolvent, each of the "solvent parties was made to contribute to the obli- "gation thrown upon them."

He then states what the Roman law was upon the subject of contribution, and, still speaking of that law, he makes the following statement, which is the only quotation made by counsel on their brief:

> "It was not necessary to wait till some one was "damnified by having paid or having claim made "against him for the whole; a bill might be filed to "settle the amount due from each individual of a "body liable to a common burden, and to compel the "payment by each, of his share." (Original brief, p. 18.)

We have said that there are no co-obligors in this case, and that is conceded by counsel on the other side. The bill is not framed upon the theory that West Virginia was ever bound to the holders of the old bonds, or that she is now bound to the holders of the certificates issued by the State of Virginia, either as a co-obligor or otherwise. The claim is made against her by Virginia alone, and it has been argued throughout the case that the indebtedness is to her. If the old bonds had been secured by a lien upon the public property situated in the new State, or by a pledge of the revenues to be derived from the people or territory embraced in the new State, it might have been contended that there was a direct liability to the creditors upon the part of West Virginia; but such was not the case. The bonds of a State, as this court has often said, are secured only by a pledge of its honor and good faith; and Virginia is still the same State that issued and sold the bonds. It cannot be necessary to make an argument to show that neither this court nor any other has power to exonerate her from any part of her liability. Even if such a power existed in any court, the creditors whose claims would be extinguished by the exoneration would be indispensable parties.

It is now contended by counsel for the plaintiff that there never was a compact between the two States with reference to the old public debt, and that no consent to the formation of the new State was ever given by the legislature of Virginia; and it is said that the question as to the existence of the compact cannot be relied upon by the defendant State in this argument because it is not specifically stated as one of the grounds of demurrer. The compact is set forth in the bill (pp. 4–6), and one of the separate grounds of demurrer is that the court has no jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause, which necessarily requires it to ascertain the foundation and character of the claim asserted and the nature and extent of the remedy sought by the plaintiff. The office of a demurrer is to present to the court the legal and equitable questions arising upon the face of the pleading—not to argue them—and one of the questions presented by the demurrer in this case is whether, if the compact is valid, the court has power to enforce it according to its terms.

We do not propose to reargue the question as to the existence of the compact or to discuss the validity of the Virginia act of May 13, 1862, consenting to the formation of the new State and asking its admission into the union under the constitution which had then been framed. The compact itself was entered into by the sovereignty conventions of the two States and consented to by Congress in accordance with the provisions of Clause 3 of Section 10 of Art. 1 of the constitution of the United States, and all that was required of the legislature of Virginia by Clause 1 of Section 3 of Art. 10 of the constitution was that it should give its consent, not to the compact, but to the formation of the new State out of a part of the territory of the old State.

Counsel claim in the reply briefs that the ordinance of the Wheeling Convention requiring West Virginia to assume a just proportion of the debt and prescribing the method of ascertaining it is binding upon that State, but deny that the conditions upon which the proposition was accepted are binding upon Virginia (Mr. Conrad's brief, pp. 22–23). We insist that the compact is binding as a whole or it is not binding at all, and that the act of the Virginia legislature, passed May 13, 1862, while it was not necessary to the validity of the compact, constituted a ratification of it by that body. Without this act the State of West Virginia could not have been constitutionally formed or admitted into the union, whether there was a compact or not.

Congress never passed but one act providing for the admission of the State into the union, and when it was afterwards actually admitted by the proclamation of the President, the constitution which Congress had already approved had not been altered in the slightest respect so far as it related to the compact between the two States. The only change that had been made, or that was required to be made, by Congress, was in relation to the institution of slavery.

But it is now argued that the compact between the two States has been abrogated by the omission of the State of West Virginia to include in the constitution of 1872 the same provision in regard to the old public debt that was contained in the constitution of 1862 under which the State was admitted into the union; but, notwithstanding this contention, it is still insisted by counsel that West Virginia became liable and is now liable for a just proportion of the debt as provided in the Wheeling ordinance, and which it is claimed constituted a part of the compact. The entire compact was that the new State should take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt, to be ascertained by charging to it all the State expenditures within its limits, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State Government since any part of the debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of Virginia from the counties included within the new State during that period, and that the legislature of West Virginia should ascertain the same as soon as practicable and provide for its liquidation by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and to redeem the principal within thirty-four years.

This compact was entered into by the sovereignty conventions of the two States. In one the proposition was made in the form of an ordinance, and in the other it was accepted in the form of a constitutional provision; and then it was consented to by Congress, and thus became an absolute and permanent obligation of the two States, which neither of them conld thereafter abrogate or alter. It was not necessary for West Virginia to repeat in a subsequent constitution the terms upon which she had accepted Virginia's proposition, and upon which the compact had been concluded with the consent of Congress. The compact itself provides that the new State shall assume a just and equitable proportion of the debt, and that the Legislature of that State shall ascertain what that proportion is, and establish a sinking fund sufficient to pay the interest and redeem the principal in thirty-four years. The latter part of the compact is as binding upon the two States now as it ever was. The legislature of West Virginia has not been abolished; it still exists and possesses full power to provide for the ascertainment and payment of the State's just proportion of the debt in accordance with the stipulations of the compact between the parties. The State of Viriginia has not heretofore supposed that West Virginia had extinguished her obligation to assume and pay a just property of the debt, or that she could do so; but if the argument now made is sound, she has done so by merely omitting a part of the compact from her constitution.

The act of Congress admitting the State into the union and thereby, as this court has held, giving the consent of that body to the compact, is a law of the United States enacted in pursuance of the constitution, and is therefore the supreme law of the land; and the compact itself constitutes a part of that law. Penna. vs. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How. 185. No State can abolish it or change it, even by an affirmative act, much less by a mere omission to repeat it in her constitution or statutes.

It is true, as stated in one of the reply briefs, that nearly forty-four years have passed since the compact was made, but it is also true that Virginia has repudiated it ever since 1871; and, although she has in her own exclusive possession all the accounts and vouchers necessary to effect a settlement, she has never presented to West Virginia any account, or even part of an account, which would enable the Legislature of that State to take any action in accordance with the Wheeling ordinance. It will be time enough for Virginia to make complaint against West Virginia when she has furnished that State with such an account or statement as will enable her Legislature, or a commission appointed by it, to ascertain the amount claimed, in the manner prescribed by the Wheeling ordinance, which was Virginia's own chosen method of adjustment.

The reference to the fact that this court entertains jurisdiction of appeals from the Court of Claims involving demands for money, and renders judgments in such cases, is of no consequence in this discussion, because Congress has by statute not only consented that the United States might be sued on such claims, but has expressly authorized judgments to be rendered and directed their payment by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the general appropriations.

Act of March 3, 1863, Ch. 92, sec. 7; 12th, Stat. 766; Act of September 30, 1890, Ch. 1126, sec. 1.

The case of Carter vs. State, 42 La. Ann., 930, quoted from in the original brief of counsel for plaintiff, is not at all in conflict with our contention in the case at bar. That was a proceeding to subject money belonging to the State to the satisfaction of a judgment previously obtained, and the court decided that it had no power to do so, although the legislative had authorized the institution of the action in which the judgment was rendered. In the course of its opinion, the court said:

> "The incidents and appurtenances of ordinary ju> " risdiction have no application to a case like this.
> " Undoubtedly jurisdiction granted to render judg> " ments between parties subject to judicial power
> " and control implies power to execute such judg> " ment. But the sovereign is not subject to judicial > " power and control except just so far as is consented > " thereto; the moment the limit of that consent is > " reached, the judiciary must instantly halt."

But it is said by counsel that this court can afford adequate relief because it can ascertain and declare West Virginia's proportion of the debt, and that this will operate to exonerate Virginia from any further liability on account of the indebtedness. The adjudication would have no such effect; on the contrary, if Virginia is now liable, as her counsel contend, the effect of such adjudication would be simply to fix the amount of her liability, but with no judgment or decree for its payment. How that could afford any relief to Virginia in any respect, or to her creditors, we are unable to see.

While we do not consider it necessary to add anything to the argument heretofore made on that part of the demurrer which raises the question of multifariousness, it is proper to say that we do not controvert any of the propositious stated in Hogg's Eq. Proc., which is relied upon by counsel for plaintiff. They are in accord with the authorities cited by us.

Counsel quote from Mitford's Pl., p. 399, to show that there can be no misjoinder unless the parties have, or may have, conflicting interests in the suit, or unless some of them have no interest in the suit. What the author says, is:

> "If the plaintiffs actually have, or may have, con> "flicting interests in regard to the object of the suit,
> "or if any or either of them have no interest in the > "subject-matter of the suit, there is a misjoinder.
> "But to be free from the objection of misjoinder it > "is not necessary that a co-plaintiff should have an
> "identity of interest."

They also refer to Daniels' Chancery, pp. 301–2, to show that an auctioneer may be joined with the vendor in a suit against the purchaser, but they omit to state, or quote, the reason given by the author, which is—

> "because the auctioneer has an interest in the con> "tract, and may bring an action upon it; he is also > "interested in being protected against the legal lia> "bility he has incurred in an action by the purchaser > "to recover the deposit" (pp. 301–2).

He then says:

> "Upon a similar principle in cases where all the > "plaintiffs have an interest in the subject of the suit
> "but their interests are distinct and several, they > "will not be allowed to sue together as co-plaintiffs" > (p. 302).

It is not usual to embody the speech of an advocate in a bill in chancery, and thus require the defendant to admit on demurrer the truth of the statements contained in it; yet that course has been pursued in the present case, and counsel on the other side quote from the speech of Mr. Harrison to show that the ultimatum contained in the joint resolution of March 6, 1894, had been abandoned by Virginia in 1900. All that we can say in response to this is that the gentleman who made the speech had no authority from the State of Virginia to propose or agree to any settlement except upon the basis that the share of the State was only-two thirds of the debt. An examination of the act of March 6, 1900, will show that its preamble reaffirms the position which the State of Virginia had previously taken with respect to the extent of West Virginia's obligation for one-third of the debt, and that it does not repeal or modify any part of the joint resolution of March 4, 1894, but merely authorizes the commission to receive the certificates on deposit and to "take such action and institute such proceedings on behalf of the State as may in the judgment of the Commission and the Attorney General be needful and proper to protect the interests of the State and bring about and carry into effect a settlement as aforesaid." Under this act the commission had no power to settle by negotiation except upon the basis that Virginia had paid her full share—two-thirds—but it was authorized to sue for a settlement for the benefit of the certificate holders, and, of course, if less than one-third should be recovered from West Virginia in the suit, they had the power to receive it for distribution among the beneficiaries under the contract made with them.

OCTOBER TERM, 1907.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, Complainant, AGAINST WEST VIRGINIA, Defendant.	Original No. 4. In Equity.

Brief for Defendant on Complainant's Motion to Refer Cause to Master.

The complainant proposes an interlocutory decree referring the cause to a master with a direction to the master to take an account ascertaining:

I.

"The amount of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia as of the First day of January, 1861, stating specifically how and in what form the same was evidenced and by what authority of law and for what purposes the same was created and the dates and nature of bonds or other evidences of said indebtedness."

This paragraph was adopted in the decree proposed by the defendant, although in our view entirely unnecessary; but, upon reflection, it seems to require amendment in order to conform it to the allegations of the bill and the admission of the Answer. The words "for what purposes the same was created" imply that the debt was created for diverse purposes. The bill alleges that "on the first day of January, 1861, your Oratrix was indebted in about the sum of $33,000,000 upon obligations and contracts made in connection with the construction of works of internal improvement throughout her then territory."

The bill is burdened with allegations as to the internal improvements, the motive which led the Commonwealth of Virginia to enter upon the policy, etc. The first sentence of paragraph I. of the Answer is as follows:

> "That she believes it is true as alleged that on the first day of January, 1861, plaintiff was indebted in 'about' the sum of $33,000,000, upon obligations and contracts made in connection with the construction of works of internal improvements within her then territory."

Then, upon the allegation of the bill that the indebtedness of about $33,000,000, as it existed prior to January 1st, 1861, was incurred in connection with the construction of works of internal improvement, both parties are by bill and Answer in accord. In so far, therefore, as paragraph I of the proposed decree calls for an investigation into the purposes for which the same was created, if by "purposes" it means for the accomplishment of objects other than the construction of works of internal improvement, it is a departure from the fact established by the pleadings. Unless that is admissible, which we deny, the paragraph is objectionable for its uncertainty of expression. It would be better in accord with the Bill and Answer, and more useful to the court and to the parties, if the words were stricken out and there were inserted in their place: "for what particular works of internal improvement the same was created and its proceeds expended and where the same were located."

II.

"What amount and proportion of said indebtedness and what interest accruing thereon should in equity be apportioned to and be now paid by the State of West Virginia."

The defendant's objection to Paragraph two is radical and will fully appear in the argument submitted herein in support of its proposed Paragraph two.

The remaining paragraphs of the decree proposed by the complainant need not here be set forth.

On the other hand, the defendant proposes a decree which directs the master to ascertain:

II.

(a) "The amount of State expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the First day of January, 1861, within the territory now included within the State of West Virginia, since any part of said indebtedness was contracted, as provided by the ordinance adopted by the Commonwealth of Virginia at Wheeling, August 20th, 1861."

(b) "The aggregate ordinary expenses of the State government of the Commonwealth prior to January 1st, 1861, and since any part of said indebtedness was contracted."

(c) "All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth of Virginia from the Counties included in the State of West Virginia during said period."

Paragraph III. of the complainant's proposed decree directs that the master:

> "III. Will make and return with his report any special or alternative statement of the account between the complainant and defendant in the premises which either may desire him to state or which he may deem to be desirable to present to the Court."

The difference between the two proposed decrees above quoted is radical, and presents to the Court a question which in our view is fundamental and which West Virginia contends, respectfully and very earnestly, should be decided before any reference to a master to state the account between the parties.

The jurisdiction of the Court over this case is settled by the decision overruling the demurrer. We are quite aware that the Court has recognized a distinction between suits by private parties in respect of the application of the rules of pleading and of practice, and suits between States. Thus it was held, in Rhode Island vs. Massachusetts (13 Peters, 23), that:

> "From the character of the parties, and the nature of the controversy, we cannot, without committing great injustice, apply to this case the rules as to time, which govern Courts of Equity in suits between individuals. In the last-mentioned cases, the material allegations in the bill are comparatively few in number, and rest in the personal knowledge of the individual who is to put in his answer. But a case like this, and one, too, of so many years' standing, the parties, in the nature of things, must be incapable of acting with the promptness of an individual."

In Rhode Island vs. Massachusetts (14 Peters, 256), the Court, through Mr. Chief Justice TANEY, says:

"The case to be determined is one of peculiar character, and altogether unknown in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. It is a question of boundary between two sovereign states, litigated in a Court of justice; and we have no precedents to guide us in the forms and modes of proceeding, by which a controversy of this description can most conveniently, and with justice to the parties, be brought to a final hearing. The subject was, however, fully considered at January term, 1838, when a motion was made by the defendant to dismiss this bill. Upon that occasion the Court determined to frame their proceedings according to those which had been adopted in the English Courts, in cases most analogous to this, where the boundaries of great political bodies had been brought into question. And acting upon this principle, it was then decided, that the rules and practice of the Court of Chancery should govern in conducting this suit to a final issue. The reasoning upon which that decision was founded is fully stated in the opinion then delivered; and upon re-examining the subject, we are quite satisfied as to the correctness of this decision (12 Peters, 735, 739).

"The proceedings in this case will therefore be regulated by the rules and usages of the Court of Chancery. Yet, in a controversy where two sovereign states are contesting the boundary between them, it will be the duty of the Court to mould the rules of Chancery practice and pleading in such a manner as to bring this case to a final hearing on its real merits. It is too important in its character, and the interests concerned too great, to be decided upon the mere technical principles of Chancery pleading. And if it appears that the plea put in by the defendant may in any degree embarrass the complainant in bringing out the proofs of her claim, on which she relies, the case ought not to be disposed of on such an issue. Undoubtedly the defendant must have the full benefit of the defense which the plea discloses; but at the same time, the proceedings ought to be so ordered as to give the complainant a full hearing upon the whole of her case. In ordinary cases between individuals the Court of > Chancery has always exercised an equitable discretion in relation to its rules of pleading whenever it has been found necessary to do so for the purposes of justice. And in a case like the present, the most liberal principles of practice and pleading ought unquestionably to be adopted, in order to enable both parties to present their respective claims in their full strength."

West Virginia does not and could not successfully here contest the principles thus laid down, but the principles of equity and the rules of chancery procedure so far as essential to protect the rights of parties litigating in this tribunal will, of course, be substantially enforced. The application of some of the rules of procedure are certainly essential to substantial justice. Mr. Bates, in his work on Federal Equity Procedure (Vol. II., p. 802), says (section 753):

> " Before a cause is referred to a master to take and state an account between the parties, the following preliminary steps should be taken, as conditions precedent to the reference, viz: (1) The pleadings should be perfected and the cause put at issue; (2) the parties should take the proofs upon the issues made by the pleadings, as fully as the nature of the case will allow; (3) the cause should be regularly set down for hearing; (4) the cause should be regularly heard upon the pleadings and the evidence by the court; (5) upon such hearing the court should pass upon all the issues made by the pleadings, and should enter an interlocutory decree declaring the rights of the parties, and also settling and declaring the principles upon which the account is to be taken: (6) the decree should refer the cause to a master to take and state the account in accordance therewith and report to the court, and all other matters should be reserved until the coming in of the report. * * *"

While the foregoing quotation refers to the equity practice which obtains in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, so far as the practice is based upon substantial justice and is necessary for the protection of the rights of parties litigant, we suppose it will be pursued by this Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction. If there were two bases of accounting in this case, both equally open to adoption by the Court, the objection of West Virginia to paragraph II. of the decree propcsed by the complainant, would be perhaps without force, but from our standpoint, it is conclusively apparent that there is but one basis upon which an accounting in this case for West Virginia's Equitable proportion of the Virginia debt can be decreed. The bill alleges, in paragraph VI., that on the 20th day of August, 1861.

> " The Restored State of Virginia in convention assembled in the City of Wheeling, Virginia adopted an ordinance to 'provide for the formation of a new State out of portion of the territory of this State,' section 9 of which ordinance was as follows, to wit: '9. The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all the State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government, since any part of said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the Counties included within said new State during such period. All private rights and interests in lands within the proposed State, derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in the State of Virginia.'"

The bill also alleges, paragraph VII., that:

> " On the 31st day of December, 1862, an Act was passed by the 37th Congress of the United States providing that the new State thus formed in pursuance of the ordinance of the Wheeling convention above referred to, should, upon certain conditions, be admitted into the Union by the name of West Virginia with a constitution which had theretofore been adopted for the new State by the people thereof, such conditions being that a change should be made in the proposed Constitution with regard to the liberation of slaves therein."

Also that it was provided by the Act of Congress that whenever the President should issue a proclamation stating that such change had been made and ratified, the Act admitting such new State should be effective sixty days after the date of such proclamation.

The bill also alleges that a proclamation was issued by President Lincoln on April 20th, 1863 and that West Virginia in conformity therewith, and by the operation of said Act of Congress, was admitted into the Union as a State on the 20th day of June, 1863.

The bill also alleges, in paragraph X. inter alia, that

> " 'By section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution of West Virginia it is provided:
>
> " An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the First day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years.'"

The bill in paragraph XVIII. alleges the second of four grounds upon which the liability of West Virginia in this suit is asserted, as follows :

"II. The liability of West Virginia for a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia as it existed prior to the creation and erection of the State of West Virginia, forms part of her very political existence, and is an essential constituent of her fundamental law as shown in the said ordinance adopted at Wheeling on the 20th day of August, 1861, in which the method of ascertaining her liability on account of said debt is prescribed, and this liability is embedded in the Constitution under which she was admitted as a State into the Federal Union, and was one of the conditions under which she was created a State and admitted into the Union."

This is rhetorical, but it is none the less accurate and true.

The answer admits (paragraph VI.) the allegations of the bill as to the adoption and terms of the ordinance, including Section 9. It also admits the allegations of the bill averring the assumption of a liability and making provision for its ascertainment and payment by the constitutional provision quoted in the bill.

Paragraph XVIII. of the answer is as follows :

"This respondent for further answer to said bill says : that she denies that the alleged liability of the State of Virginia for a just and equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia rests upon any ground specified in Paragraph XVIII. of said bill except the second, upon which, as hereinbefore averred in this answer, the State of West Virginia has always been ready and willing and is now ready and willing to adjust her liability."

Thus it stands alleged in the bill and admitted by the answer, and if it were not admitted by the answer, it is conclusively estab- lished by the bill and its exhibits, that there was a solemn agreement entered into in 1861 between the State of Virginia and the new State of West Virginia, with the consent of the Congress, by which the latter State assumed (as one of the conditions of the assent of Virginia to her becoming a State) a just proportion of the indebtness of that Commonwealth as it existed prior to January 1st, 1861, the manner of ascertaining which proportion was defined by the ordinance itself.

The ordinance was, as treated by this Court in the case of Virginia vs. West Virginia (11 Wallace, 39), a proposition by the Commonwealth of Virginia to the people of the proposed new State. It was accepted by the constitutional convention of the proposed new State, carried into its Constitution and adopted by the people; and when the State was admitted into the Union by the Congress, with the assent of Virginia, it became a completed compact between competent parties, upon adequate consideration, protected by the Constitution of the United States from impairment by either party.

We say the ordinance defines what would be a just proportion. This is an accurate statement; for the ordinance provided not only for the assumption of a just proportion, but provided specifically in what manner that proportion shall be ascertained. We do not understand the suggestion which appears to have been made at the argument, that the continued obligation of the compact depends upon the continued assent to it by both States. A compact between States, entered into with the consent of Congress, has always been treated by this Court as irrevocable by either of the parties, and where the legislation of either has attempted to impair the obligation of a compact, it has been held void under the Constitution of the United States (See Greene vs. Biddle, 8th Wheaton, 1).

The obligation of a lawful compact between two States, justiciable in its nature, certainly is as binding in law upon both until abrogated by both in a constitutional way, as a contract between a State and an individual, or between two individuals, and a disregard or violation of it by one, certainly cannot thereby release it from its obligation.

It is difficult to understand how, from the averments of the bill and the admissions in the answer, and the argument at the Bar, it can be an open question in this case that the only liability of West Virginia for an Equitable proportion of the ante-bellum debt of Virginia is upon the basis of the ordinance.

The bill, in paragraph XVIII, summing up the grounds upon which it rests the liability of Virginia to account, says:

> "FIRST. The area of the territory now known as the State of West Virginia, formed about one-third of the territory of the Commonwealth of Virginia when this public debt was created, and its population included about one-third of that of the original state at the time of its dismemberment, and the State of West Virginia by the acquisition and appropriation of said territory, with the population thereof, assumed therewith liability for a just and equitable portion of the public debt created prior to the partition of said territory."

This is followed by the second ground, hereinbefore quoted, which is based upon the ordinance and Section 8 of the Constitution.

The third ground is as follows:

> "The State of West Virginia has further by repeated enactments and joint resolutions of her legislature recognized her liability for a just proportion of this debt."

The first ground invokes the application of what is assumed to be the rule of international law that "debt follows territory," and that the debt as between West Virginia and Virginia is to be "ratably apportioned" on the basis of population and territory at the time of the separation.

In support of this theory of liability, which is absolutely incompatible with the theory of liability based upon the compact, one of the learned counsel for the complainant read, on the argument, from the opinion of Mr. Justice FIELD, who wrote for the court in Hartman vs. Greenhow (102 U. S., 672) this sentence:

> "Where a state is divided into two or more states, in the adjustment of liabilities between each other, the debts of the parent state should be ratably apportioned among them."

counsel added, "That is in Hartman vs. Greenhow."

JUSTICE HARLAN: "Please read that again."

MR. CONRAD: "Where a state is divided into two or more states in the adjustment of liabilities between each other, the debts of the parent state should be ratably apportioned among them."

Counsel added: "That is an opinion of this court that has received no dissent."

With the greatest veneration for the learning and just fame of Mr. Justice FIELD as a jurist, we venture the observation that the subject was not at all involved in the case. The question there was solely as to the receivability of coupons, of bonds representing the funded debt of Virginia, for taxes. West Virginia was not a party; nor was Virginia. But aside from this the quotation read from Mr. Justice FIELD did not in the slightest degree correctly put before the Court the view which he must be deemed to have entertained. We supply the deficiency, quoting all that he said:

> "Writers on public law speak of the principle as well established that, where a State is divided into two or more states, in the adjustment of liabilities between each other, the debts of the parent state should be ratably apportioned among them. On this subject Kent says: 'If a State should be divided in respect of territory, its rights and obligations are not impaired; and, if they have not been apportioned by special agreement, their rights are to be enjoyed and their obligations fulfilled by all the parties in common' (1 Com., 26); and Halleck, speaking of a State divided into two or more distinct and independent sovereignties, says: 'In that case, the obligations which have accrued to the whole before the division are, unless they have been the subject of a special agreement, ratably binding upon the different parts. This principle is established by the concurrent opinions of text writers, the decisions of courts, and the practice of nations' (International Law, c. 3, Sect. 27)."

Mr. Justice FIELD continues:

> "In conformity with the doctrine thus stated by Halleck, both States—Virginia and West Virginia—have recognized in their constitution their respective liability for an equitable proportion of the old debt of the state, and have provided that measures should be taken for its settlement."

It is apparent that Mr. Justice FIELD, in the clause last above quoted, referred to the special agreement evidenced by Section 9 of the Ordinance and to the first clause of Section 8 of Article VIII. of the West Virginia Constitution.

It is worth noting that, in Antoni vs. Greenhow (107 U. S., 769), which also involved the same Funding Act, Mr. Justice FIELD, in his dissenting opinion, in which Mr. Justice HARLAN concurred, said, referring to the same subject :

> " It is a well-settled doctrine of public law that, upon the division of a state into two or more states, the debt shall be ratably apportioned among them (See authorities upon this subject in Hartman v. Greenhow (102 U. S., 672, 677)."

Phillimore, after quoting both Grotius and Kent, says :

> " If a nation be divided into various distinct societies, the obligations which had accrued to the whole before the division are, unless they have been the subject of a special agreement, ratably binding upon the different parts " ;

and Sir Sherston Baker in " First Steps of International Law," page 36, says :

> " The case is slightly different where one state is divided into two or three distinct and independent sovereignties. In that case the obligations which had accrued to the whole before the division are (unless they have been the subject of a special agreement) ratably binding upon the different parts. This principle is established by the concurrent opinions of text writers, the decisions of courts and the practice of nations. It is incorporated into the treaty by which the modern Kingdom of Belgium was established."

Thus it will be seen that the general rule as quoted from Mr. Justice FIELD, is essentially qualified by the authorities which he quotes, in this, that a special agreement between the two states in respect of the assumption of a proportion of the debt as it existed before the separation, takes the case out of the general rule ; so that the second ground alleged in the bill, which specifically avers a special agreement, destroys the applicability of the rule to this case. Upon what theory is this special agreement, consisting of a proposition by Virginia, its acceptance by the constitutional convention, its embodiment in the Constitution, the ratification of the latter by the people, and the admission of the State into the Union by the Congress, to be so cavalierly dismissed from this case as the decree proposed on behalf of Virginia would do? This Court had occasion to consider the validity of this ordinance in the case of Virginia vs. West Virginia, 11 Wallace, 39, in respect of the provision contained in it for the incorporation of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson in the latter State conditioned upon a popular vote therefor; and the Court said:

> "There was then a valid agreement between the two states consented to by Congress, which agreement made the accession of these counties dependent on the result of a popular vote in favor of that proposition."

If the ordinance was valid then in respect of the incorporation of the two counties, upon what theory can it be held to be invalid as to the specific provision contained in Section 9 for the assumption by the new State of a just proportion of the indebtedness to be ascertained in the manner defined, clearly carried into the Constitution of the new State and assented to by Congress by the admission of West Virginia into the Union? It does not impeach or even belittle the "Restored State of Virginia" or the validity of its acts to refer to it as a "revolutionary government" or to the ordinance as a "revolutionary proceeding." Whether it was or was not the lawful government of Virginia was a political question. When the House of Representatives admitted the members of Congress from that State and the Senate admitted the senators elected by the legislature of the "Restored State," and the President recognized that government as the true government of Virginia, that forever settled its legality and regularity beyond the power of judicial review and made valid its acts ab initio. But for that "Restored State of Virginia," and its recognition by the political departments of the Federal Government, there would have been no government of Virginia under the Constitution of the United States from April, 1861, to the close of the war. The ordinance of the Wheeling convention of '61, which was the genesis of the State of West Virginia, and the adoption of its Constitution, are, from the standpoint of law, as clearly acts of the Commonwealth of Virginia as if they had taken place in 1851 instead of in 1861.

The suggestion so often made in oral and printed argument that West Virginia is the "daughter of Virginia," is sentimental, but inaccurate. When admitted into the Union she came in on an equality with the original states and became a member of the sisterhood of states, equal in sovereignty and personality to the older commonwealth of which her territory had once been a part, and of which her people had once been citizens.

May it not be that this misconception of the real relation of West Virginia as a State of the Union to old Virginia has played an unconscious part in the disregard by the latter of the special agreement which has operated to delay an adjustment under its provisions? If this special agreement in respect of the proportion of the debt of Virginia which was to be assumed by the State of West Virginia constituted a valid compact between the two states, when it did cease to be valid, and for what reason, at the suit of Virginia, is it to be ignored? It was said, by Mr. Justice BALDWIN, in Rhode Island vs. Massachusetts (12 Peters, 748), speaking for the Court:

> "In Poole vs. Fleeger, this Court declared that an agreement between States, consented to by Congress, bound the citizens of each State."

Greene vs. Biddle, supra, involved the validity of the compact between Virginia and Kentucky, entered into at the time she separated from the former and was admitted into the Union as a State, and the compact in that case in respect of the assent of Congress to it, is not unlike the compact in the present case. The Court said:

> "The compact was entered into between Virginia and the people of Kentucky, upon the express condition that the general government should, prior to a certain day, assent to the erection of the District of Kentucky into an independent State, and agree, that the proposed State should immediately, after a certain day, or at some convenient time future thereto, be admitted into the federal Union. On the 28th of July, 1790, the convention the District assembled under the provisions of the law of Virginia, and declared its assent to the terms and conditions prescribed by the proposed compact; and that the same was accepted as a solemn compact, and that the said District should become a separate State on the 1st of June, 1792. These resolutions, accompanied by a memorial from the convention, being communicated by the President of the United States to Congress, a report was made by a committee, to whom the subject was referred, setting forth the agreement of Virginia, that Kentucky should be erected into a State, upon certain terms and con- ditions, and the acceptance by Kentucky upon the terms and conditions so prescribed; and, on the 4th of February, 1791, Congress passed an act, which, after referring to the compact, and the acceptance of it by Kentucky declares the consent of that body to the erecting of the said District into a separate and independent State, upon a certain day, and receiving her into the Union.

"Now, it is perfectly clear, that, although Congress might have refused their consent to the proposed separation, yet they had no authority to declare Kentucky a separate and independent State, without the assent of Virginia, or upon terms variant from those which Virginia had prescribed. But Congress, after recognizing the conditions upon which alone Virginia agreed to the separation, expressed, by a solemn act, the consent of that body to the separation. The terms and conditions, then, on which alone the separation could take place, or the act of Congress become a valid one, were necessarily assented to; not by a mere tacit acquiescence, but by an express declaration of the legislative mind, resulting from the manifest construction of the act itself. To deny this, is to deny the validity of the act of Congress, without which, Kentucky could not have become an independent State, and then it would follow, that she is at this moment a part of the State of Virginia, and all her laws are acts of usurpation."

It was held that the act passed by the Legislature of Kentucky in violation of the compact was void.

The suggestion that Virginia never assented to the compact with West Virginia because of the amendment which Congress proposed to the Constitution, is without weight.

The conditions imposed by Virginia upon West Virginia were embodied in the Ordinance. It may be admitted that any amendment proposed by Congress which would vary the terms of the Ordinance might have been operative to destroy the consent of Virginia to the erection of a new State out of her territory, but her General Assembly was content with the Constitution as not being in violation of the ordinance, and the amendment proposed by Congress to the Constitution, relative to slavery, was a matter with which Virginia could have no concern, it being purely local to the the State of West Virginia, as affecting the status of property and persons within her borders and under her sovereignty. It sustained no relation whatever to the Ordinance or to the conditions upon which Virginia had given her assent. It is almost an evidence of desperation that, at this day, it should be solemnly argued in this Forum in behalf of Virginia that West Virginia did not become a

State with the assent of Virginia, because Congress decided, in response to representations from West Virginia, to require, as a condition of admission, an amendment to the Constitution providing for the gradual extinction, within her borders, of slave ownership.

We have asserted that the Ordinance was carried into the Constitution. The provision is as follows:

> "ARTICLE VIII. Section 8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and to redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

It will be noted that this language of assumption is the language of the ordinance except that the word "equitable" is used in the Constitution, while the word "just" is used in the ordinance. As a qualifying word, used in such a connection, "equitable" and "just" are synonymous. An equitable proportion could not be other than a "just" proportion, and a just proportion would be an "equitable" proportion. The ordinance and the Constitution are the constating instruments upon which the State was erected and they are to be read in pari materia, and it is not susceptible of doubt that the word "ascertain" as used in Section 8 of the Constitution is an adaptation of the word "ascertained" in section 9 of the Ordinance. It will be remembered that this convention assembled within ninety days after the adoption of the Ordinance. Its sole warrant for assembling was the ordinance. Its authority to frame the Constitution was derived from the ordinance. The ordinance as a whole was a proposition to that Convention and, as a whole, was accepted by the Convention. The Convention complied with all the provisions of the Ordinance. The Constitution was framed to meet all the requirements of the Ordinance. It was the basis of the Constitution.

It is difficult to consider with equanimity, the studied and inconsistent attempt to eliminate the Ordinance from the case. This is apparently the present posture of counsel for Virginia. If section 8 of the Constitution is not read in connection with the Ordinance, and, therefore, as an assumption of an equitable proportion of the debt to be ascertained as provided in the Ordinance, the Ordinance is eliminated, and section 8 of the first Constitution is to be construed as the assumption by the new State of an equitable proportion of the public indebtedness of Virginia prior to January 1st, 1861, upon the basis of population and territory. It is inconceivable that such can be the law of this case. The assembling of the Convention was an acceptance of Section 9 of the Ordinance. The Ordinance embodied the conditions, and section 9 by no means the least important of them, of Virginia's consent to the erection of the new State out of her territory.

If the Convention had failed to comply, in the Constitution, with the requirements of the Ordinance, or had departed in any way from the conditions of Virginia's assent, as stated in the Ordinance, its work would have been nugatory. It was bound by the ordinance to carry into the Constitution the assumption by the new State of an equitable proportion of the indebtedness of Virginia prior to January 1st, 1861, to be ascertained as provided in the Ordinance.

It could no more disregard the terms of Section 9 than it could the other conditions of the ordinance. It was for Virginia to fix the terms of her consent. It was not for the convention to depart therefrom. It could only accept or reject. If it rejected it, it must have adjourned. Its work would have been done. Although we take it that nothing is finally decided in this case except the question of jurisdiction, we note that the court was impressed, as shown by the opinion of the Chief Justice with the relation of the ordinance to the Constitution. In the opinion it is said:

> "Reading the Virginia ordinance and the West Virginia constitutional provision in pari materia, it follows that what was meant by the expression 'that the legislature shall ascertain' was that the legislature should ascertain as soon as practicable the result of the pursuit of the method prescribed and provide for the liquidation of the amount so ascertained."

The attempt to dislocate the first clause of section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution of West Virginia "an equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State" from section 9 of the Ordinance, is subversive of fundamental principles of Constitutional construction and is indefensible from every standpoint of law or equity. It is beyond all reason to suppose that the plain language of the first clause of Article VIII., general in its terms, was anything more or less than an acceptance of the proposition theretofore specifically made in section 9 of the Ordinance in order that the first clause of section 8 and section 9, would together make plain the compact.

The suggestion that section 8 of Article 8 of the Constitution had no reference to section 9 of the Ordinance, assumes that the new state was taking upon herself an equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, without definition or understanding as to the basis upon which it was to be ascertained, therefore leaving open the vital question as to what would constitute an equitable proportion, for future adjustment between the two states. This is not to be believed.

The debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia on January 1st, 1861, was doubtless well known throughout the State of Virginia. It was a matter of public record and reduced to a certainty. It is alleged in the bill that about $33,000,000 of it were incurred in connection with the construction of works of internal improvement—an enormous sum " in those days." If it had been the purpose of Virginia, in requiring as a condition of her assent, the assumption by the proposed new state of an equitable proportion of the public debt without specification as to the manner in which, and the basis upon which that proportion should be ascertained, it is inconceivable that the language of section 9 of the Ordinance would have been what it was, and that the language of section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution would have been what it was. It was entirely for Virginia to dictate the terms, and if it had been her purpose to require an assumption of the debt upon the basis of territory and population, West Virginia would have been required to assume " one-third of the debt as it existed prior to the first day of January, 1861," or " an equitable proportion to be ascertained upon the basis of territory and population." If she had so provided in Section 9 of the Ordinance, the first clause of Section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution would have adequately assumed liability upon that basis. But no such proposition was made to her. No such condition of assent to her statehood was imposed upon her and there is no reason to believe that in her then condition in respect of financial ability, her people would have been willing to enter upon the status of statehood burdened with $11,000,000, or thereabouts, of the indebtedness of the old state. At all events, she was neither called upon nor given an opportunity to decide whether she would accept statehood upon such a condition.

If section 9 of the Ordinance had provided " The new state shall take upon herself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained upon the basis of territory and population " or " The new state shall take upon herself one-third of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1st, 1861 ", would West Virginia be heard here for a moment to contend that the Ordinance was no part or basis of the Constitutional provision and that the court is at liberty to adopt some other basis than that agreed upon by the parties? It would not tax the ability of the distinguished counsel on the other side, to demolish such a proposition. And section 9, as it was written, defining the basis upon which the new state should take upon herself an assumption of a just proportion of the public debt as completely forecloses the question of basis as would have been the case had the language of the Ordinance been as we have suggested.

To rub out section 9 of the ordinance and put upon West Virginia, liability for one-third of the debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, as it existed prior to January 1st, 1861, upon the theory that this was what she assumed by section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution, is a proposition as unjust as it is untenable. Indeed, if the opposite theory were adopted no testimony need be taken except to ascertain the amount of the public debt of Virginia on the first day of January, 1861, and the proportion of population and territory of the new state to that of the Commonwealth of Virginia at the time of the separation. If the Ordinance were eliminated it follows that the assumption of an equitable proportion of the debt by section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution of West Virginia was purely voluntary and not in any sense a condition of the assent of Virginia to the admission of West Virginia as a state into the Union. This is contrary to repeated allegations of the bill and against the truth as disclosed everywhere in the record. If section 9 of the Ordinance were eliminated, it is a grave question whether, but for an assumption of liability by section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution, West Virginia would have been legally liable at all, upon principles of international law, for a dollar of that debt (See Hall on International Law, sec. 27, p. 78, and especially note on p. 80).

An effort is argumentatively made in the bill and was repeated at the bar, and it seems to have somewhat impressed the court, to make it appear that Sections 5 and 7 of Article 8 are a recognition, not only of the liability to assume a portion of the indebtedness of Virginia, but as a recognition of liability to Virginia for grants of land and money made by the Acts of February 3 and 4, 1863.

Although not especially material, with great deference, we are unable to agree to this construction. Section 5 of Article 8 provides:

> "5. No debt shall be contracted by this state except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the state, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion or defend the state in time of war."

And Section 7 of the same article provides:

> "7. The legislature may at any time direct a sale of the stocks owned by the state, in banks and other corporations, but the proceeds of such sale shall be applied to the liquidation of the public debt and hereafter the state shall not become a stockholder in any bank."

We do not see that the words "a previous liability," in Section 5, and the words "public debt," in Section 7, can be construed, all things considered, as referring to any liability of the new state to Virginia. Both Sections 5 and 7 were manifestly intended to be permanent provisions of the Constitution. They would have been properly included in the Constitution if Virginia, at the time of separation, had owed not a dollar of debt. Section 5, in our view, was intended to express the policy of the state as to indebtedness. The word "debt" is used here in contradistinction from the word "liability." A debt is a liability, but a liability is not necessarily a debt, and where they are both used in the same clause, as above, they are not to be construed as synonymous. The phrase "a previous liability" is altogether indefinite, and has no regard to the time at which it is incurred, except that it must have been incurred prior to the contracting of a debt with which to redeem it. The provision will apply to any liability incurred during the history of the state, which thereafter must be provided for by the contracting of a debt. It was the evident policy of the Constitution that West Virginia should "pay her way" except as therein otherwise indicated. If it is uncertain whether anything will be demandable by virtue of the contract, it cannot be called a debt. "Debt," as used here, we think, means a certain sum of money due upon an express agreement.

Hagar vs. Reclamation District, 111 U. S., 701.

The theory of the constitutional provision was, we submit, that the state should rely upon taxation and current revenues to carry on its operations, and was to prohibit the contracting of debts (borrowing of money), evidenced by bonds or otherwise, except to meet casual deficits in revenue, etc., which would involve a previous liability. In other words, that money should not be borrowed, save as excepted, in anticipation of liabilities. The words "public debt" in Section 7 are not to be construed as having any reference to unliquidated demands. It will not be pretended that until an accounting West Virginia owes a "debt" to Virginia. She has assumed a liability which may or may not ripen into a debt, only to be determined by a judicial accounting or by voluntary adjustment.

Section 7 was likewise a permanent provision of the Constitution. To say otherwise is to assume that there was not to be any "public debt" except the debt to be contracted under the ordinance when its amount shall be ascertained. This assumption is untenable, for Section 5 authorizes the state to borrow money to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the state, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion or defend the state in time of war. Very conclusive evidence that this is the true construction of these provisions is to be found in the fact that in the new constitution of West Virginia adopted in the year 1872 from which was omitted Article 8 of Section 8 which was in the Constitution of 1861, is found this provision.

Sec. 4, Article 10) :

> "No debt shall be contracted by the state except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the state, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion or defend the state in time of war, but the payment of any liability other than that for the ordinary expenses of the state shall be equally distributed over a period of at least twenty years."

Strongly supporting the view which we urge is the fact that in the Constitution of Virginia of 1867–8, Article X., section 7, is found this provision :

> "No debt shall be contracted by this State except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the State, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion or defend the State in time of war."

This seems to have been rather a customary permanent Constitutional provision in that region.

But a better reason, why sections 5 and 7 of Article VIII. of the West Virginia Constitution should not be construed as having any reference whatever to any liability of West Virginia to the Commonwealth of Virginia is that by section 8 of the same Article, it was provided:

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January in the year 1861, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof, by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

This is a provision not susceptible to misconstruction in respect of the subject to which it refers. Its language is not general. It is in its nature a temporary provision. It deals with but one thing and that is the assumption by West Virginia of a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, with a provision for its ascertainment and liquidation.

It is hardly to be supposed that three distinct sections of Article VIII., two of them general and permanent and one specific and self-executing so far as the assumption of the indebtedness was concerned, were deemed necessary in order to carry into the constitution the provision of section 9 of the Ordinance. The omission of the clause in the next Constitution was very natural and nowise sinister. It would have been absurd to readopt it in the Constitution. The liability had been solemnly assumed, and once assumed in the Constitution, it was an acceptance of the proposition of the Ordinance and, with the assent of Congress, by her admission into the Union became an irrevocable compact between West Virginia and Virginia. It is as valid to-day as it was when it was made. It could not be subtracted from by omission to repeat it in every new or revised Constitution, nor could it be added to by frequent repetition. Any act passed by the Legislature of West Virginia or any subsequent Constitutional provision attempting to repeal this assumption of liability would be void under the Constitution of the United States; and it is as binding upon Virginia, who was a party to it, as it is on West Virginia.

But under Section 5 of Article VIII. it is perfectly clear that when the proportion of the public debt of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, to be borne by West Virginia under the ordinance and the constitutional provision shall have been ascertained, as provided by the former, a "debt" may lawfully be contracted by the State to redeem it, upon such terms as the legislature may prescribe. The question is: Was the ordinance binding and is it still binding?

If it be valid and binding, it is impossible for us to discover any ground upon which it can be disregarded by the Court, for if it is binding upon the states, it is binding upon the court. True, West Virginia could not by any suit prevent Virginia from disregarding it in the adjustment with her creditors of her debt or any portion of it. But when Virginia invokes the original jurisdiction of this Court in a suit against West Virginia to compel her to account for an equitable proportion of her debt prior to January 1, 1861, upon the basis of the ordinance and upon other and different bases, she may plead the ordinance as the only basis upon which the Court can decree an accounting by her. The Court will not make a new contract for the parties. They were competent to make one for themselves, and they did make one for themselves. It is unfortunate that the two states were unable many years ago to adjust the matter in accordance with the agreement which they had entered into and which subsist between them. Without asserting that the fault for delay rests solely with either, we have a right to say on the record that it does not lie in the mouth of Virginia to impute much, if any, of the fault for delay to West Virginia. The records of this Court show that in December, 1866, Virginia instituted a suit in equity in this Court against the State of West Virginia to test the question whether the Counties of Berkeley and Jefferson were or were not a part of the territory of West Virginia. The cause was not determined until the 6th day of March, 1871, upon which day it was decided in favor of West Virginia, and until it was settled, obviously there could be no accounting under the ordinance, for the boundaries of West Virginia depended upon the decision, and until it was determined what Counties were a part of West Virginia, the basis for accounting under the provisions of the ordinance was wanting.

This Court takes judicial notice of the general laws and constitutions of the states. The Constitutional Convention which assembled at Alexandria on the 11th day of April, 1864, framed and adopted a constitution, it not being submitted to the people for ratification. Section 27 was as follows:

> "The General Assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt proper to be borne by the States of Virginia and West Virginia, respectively, and may authorize, in conjunction with the State of West Virginia, the sale of all lands and property of every description, including all stocks and other interests owned and held by the State of Virginia in banks, works of internal improvement, and other companies, at the time of the formation of the State of West Virginia, and no ordinance passed by the Convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 11th day of June, 1861, adjusting the public debt between Virginia and West Virginia shall be binding upon this State. It shall provide for the payment of any debt or obligation created in the name of the State of Virginia by the usurping and pretended authorities at Richmond, and shall not allow any County, City or corporation to levy or collect any taxes for the payment of any debt created for the purpose of effecting any rebellion against the State or the United States. The legislature shall not provide for the payment of any bonds now held by rebels in arms against the State or United States Government."

This convention was provided for by the General Assembly of Virginia of 1863. Relatively few delegates were elected for the districts were mostly within the Confederate lines. The Constitution was adopted by the convention but was not required, nor was it submitted to a vote of the people. Under this Constitution the government of Virginia was conducted until it was superseded by another Constitution adopted some years later. We apprehend that no lawyer would contend that this attempted repudiation of section 9 of the ordinance of the Wheeling Convention, embodied in the Constitution of Virginia, adopted in convention after the State of West Virginia had been for over a year in the Union, was of the slightest validity. Nevertheless, it showed bad faith and doubtless had a tendency to prevent an energetic effort by West Virginia for the ascertainment of the liability under the ordinance with that government.

The Court will find appended to the bill as an exhibit the argument of Mr. Randolph Harrison, representing the Virginia Debt Commission, before the Joint Committee on Finance of the West Virginia Legislature, February 1, 1905, in relation to West Virginia's contributive share of the debt of Virginia, an unusual document to be found in such a relation, but certainly the complainant is not in position to impeach its accuracy, for it is made a part of its bill, In that argument Mr. Harrison says:

"In February, 1870, Virginia sent delegates to Wheeling, West Virginia, then the capital of the State, for the purpose of inviting the Governor and the legislature of West Virginia to unite with her in making a statement in settlement of this account, but the Governor of West Virginia did not think the time opportune to deal with the subject, because the suit between the two states involving the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley had not then been decided. Soon thereafter the Governor of West Virginia sent Commissioners to Virginia with authority to state the account, but at that time Governor Walker of Virginia, did not feel that he had authority to appoint commissioners, because the legislature of Virginia had in the meantime passed an act to submit the question to arbitration, and so nothing came of this effort to settle the controversy."

It cannot therefore upon the basis of the Bill be truthfully said here that West Virginia was in the beginning laggard in respect of attempting to adjust on the basis of the ordinance the burden which she had assumed by her acceptance of it. She could not do it without the co-operation of Virginia.

Then came the enactment, on March 30, 1871, by the General Assembly of Virginia of the first funding bill, approved March 30, 1871 (Exhibit No. 1 of the bill). By this act Virginia herself undertook to "apportion," without consulting West Virginia, the debt between herself and West Virginia upon the assumed international law basis, and adjusted it upon the basis that Virginia's share of the debt was two-thirds, and West Virginia's share was one-third; which act provided for the issue of several million dollars of what were known in the market as "West Virginia certificates" for one-third of the debt. This was in utter disregard of the compact. If she had settled with her creditors on the basis of two-thirds, and left open the ascertainment, on the basis of the ordinance, of West Virginia's share, without issuing the "West Virginia certificates," it would have been simply her affair. But the preamble to this act challenges attention. It is as follows:

"WHEREAS, in the formation of the State of West Virginia there were included within its boundaries about one-third of the territory and population of the State of Virginia; and

"WHEREAS, in the ordinance authorizing the organization of such state it was provided that the said State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, which provision has not yet been fulfilled, although repeated and earnest efforts in that behalf have been made by this State, and will continue to be made as long as may be necessary; and

"WHEREAS, the people of this Commonwealth are anxious for the prompt liquidation of her portion of said debt, which is estimated to be two-thirds of the same; and

"WHEREAS, it has been suggested that the authorities of

West Virginia may prefer to pay that State's portion of said debt to the holders thereof, and not to this State, as the Constitution of this State provides;

NOW, THEREFORE, to enable the State of West Virginia to settle her proportion of said debt with the holders thereof and to prevent any complications or difficulties which might be interposed to any other matter of settlement, and for the purpose of promptly restoring the credit of Virginia by providing for the prompt and certain payment of the interest upon her portion of said debt as the same shall become due therefor;

"1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Virginia," etc.

Here, the Court will observe, is a distinct reference in the second clause of the preamble of the first funding act, to the Wheeling ordinance, under which West Virginia was to take upon herself the just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, with the declaration that it had not yet been fulfilled, although repeated and earnest efforts in that behalf had been made by this State, "and will continue to be made as long as may be necessary." This ordinance is made the basis of her funding legislation.

How strange it seems that in this legislation asserting the liability of West Virginia to be based upon section 9 of the ordinance, and declaring that it would be continuously insisted upon, its terms, brief as they were, should have been garbled, and that the legislature should have proceeded to ignore it. But the reference to section 9 of the ordinance in the preamble was operative in law to incorporate it all, and to put upon notice of its terms as measuring the liability assumed by West Virginia thereunder, every person who accepted a bond or a certificate issued under that act and under the subsequent acts.

In the act of 1879, approved March 28, 1879, Exhibit No. 2 of the bill, it was provided by section 7:

"The owners of all classes of bonds mentioned in this act who shall exchange their securities for the bonds created under this act, and who shall not have yet received certificates representing the remaining one-third of their principal and interest due and payable by the State of West Virginia, shall receive certificates of a like character to those issued under the act of March 30, 1871, when they made such exchange, etc."

In the act of February, 1882, Exhibit 3 of the bill, it is provided:

> "6. For all balances of such indebtedness constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt, principal and interest, in the settlement of Virginia's equitable share as aforesaid, the said Board for Sinking Fund Commissioners shall issue a certificate as follows:
>
> "No. . The Commonwealth of Virginia has this day discharged her equitable share of the (registered or coupon, as the case may be) bond for , held by , dated the day of , numbered , leaving a balance of , with interest from , to be accounted for by the State of West Virginia without recourse upon this Commonwealth."

Exhibit No. 4, Chapter 325, provides for the issue of similar certificates, "to be accounted for to the holder of this certificate by the State of West Virginia."

In the act, Exhibit No. 5, Chapter 747, after reciting in the preamble the various funding acts of 1871, 1879, 1882 and 1892, occurs the following:

> "WHEREAS, in each of said acts provision is made for issuing to creditors of the original State of Virginia which should accept the new bonds provided for by said several acts, certificates for such proportion of the obligations surrendered by them as was deemed proper to be borne by the State of West Virginia, to wit, one-third of the amount of said obligations, of which certificates this State holds a large amount, through the agency of the Commissioners of its Sinking Fund and Literary Fund; and
>
> WHEREAS, the present State of Virginia has settled and adjusted to the entire satisfaction of her people and her creditors the liability assumed by her on account of two-thirds of the debt of the original State;
>
> "NOW, THEREFORE, be it resolved," etc., "that a commission of seven members is hereby created," etc., "which is known as the Debt Commission, and said Commission is hereby authorized and directed to negotiate with the State of West Virginia a settlement and adjustment of the proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia properly to to be borne by West Virginia;" concluding with this language:
>
> "But said Commission shall in no event enter into any negotiation hereunder, except upon the basis that Virginia is bound only for the two-thirds of the debt of the original State, which she has already provided for as her equitable proportion thereof."

Thus beginning with 1871, Virginia has proceeded without regard to her compact to adjust two-thirds of the indebtedness as her own, and to issue $18,000,000 or thereabouts, of West Virginia certificates, frequently characterized in the act as West Virginia's proportion, and several millions of them bearing on their face the statement that they are to "be accounted for to the holder of this certificate by the State of West Virginia, without recourse upon this Commonwealth," and hawked about in the markets, to the injury of the credit of West Virginia. Is the State of West Virginia much to be chided for the delay which has occurred in adjusting with Virginia this matter on the basis of the ordinance?

But there would seem to be, from the bill and the argument on behalf of Virginia in this Court, no question open here as to the validity and binding force of the compact created by the proposition in the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance, its acceptance by the Convention of November, 1861, its incorporation in the constitution of West Virginia, its ratification by the people of the State, and the assent of Congress to it, evidenced by the admission of the State into the Union.

It was said on the argument by the learned Attorney-General of Virginia, who officially and very ably represents the Commonwealth in this cause, after outlining, at page 323, what he thinks would have been a fair adjustment and coming to the ordinance, as follows:

"MR. ANDERSON: In the 11th Wallace case it was established that the Wheeling government was the government of Virginia, and the effect of that decision was to uphold the validity of what is known as the Wheeling ordinance.

"Now instead of letting these questions be settled upon the principles of equity and public law, that convention prescribed this artificial and arbitrary basis of adjustment. We have to concede that we cannot go behind this, that we must accept it.

"Section 9 of the ordinance, giving the consent of Virginia to the formation of the new State, reads as follows:

"MR. JUSTICE HARLAN: What are you reading?

"MR. ANDERSON: From the Wheeling Ordinance quoted at page 3 of the brief of the counsel for the plaintiff. Section 9 of the ordinance reads as follows:

"'9. The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all of the State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during said period.'

"That is the basis upon which the consent of the Commonwealth of Virginia was given to the formation of this new State. The stipulation imposed by Virginia upon West Virginia as a condition upon which her consent was given, and which afterwards, in forming the State of West Virginia, the people of that new Commonwealth accepted and assented to, was that the new State should assume and take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, to be ascertained in the manner therein prescribed. That was a fundamental as well as a contractual provision, and it constitues a primary obligation and lies at the very foundation of the right of West Virginia to be a State."

Nothing could be stronger than this statement nor could anything be more accurate.

It is very difficult to reconcile this explicit and conclusive statement by the chief law officer of the Commonwealth of Virginia, in respect of the binding force and effect of the ordinance, with the decree which he proposes on behalf of Virginia and the brief which he submits in its support; for this proposed decree asks the Court to ignore the ordinance, to treat the matter as being as completely open as if the ordinance had never been adopted or accepted; and to commit the case at large to a master to ascertain as an original proposition on the alleged basis of international law or any other basis he may choose to adopt, what proportion of said indebtedness and of the interest accrued thereon should in equity be apportioned to and be now paid by the State of West Virginia. (See Kimberly vs. Armes, 129 U. S., 512). West Virginia says to this

That she thinks herself entitled to have the question whether or not the special agreement as to what shall constitute a just proportion of the debt solemnly entered into between the two states is binding, determined at this juncture by the Court and that, if it be held to be a binding agreement, Virginia is entitled to no accounting with West Virginia in this suit for her equitable proportion of the debt of the Commonwealth prior to January 1, 1861, except under the terms of that ordinance, carried into the constitution.

True, the decree proposed by the complainant directs that the master.

> "III. Make and return with his report any special or alternative statements of the account between the plaintiff and the defendant in the premises which either may desire him to state or which he may deem to be desirable to prevent to the Court."

This asks the Court to leave the determination of the pivotal point in the case, which we think should be decided by it in advance of an accounting, to a master, albeit only in an advisory way, and it gives West Virginia permission to have an accounting made, if she desires it, on the basis of the ordinance at her own expense. She is defendant here. In that event we would have two lines of investigation proceeding before the master at the same time, each entirely distinct in basic principle from the other, each burdensome in labor, expense and the consumption of time. Neither would throw any light upon the other. An exhaustive accounting under the ordinance would not aid the Court in determining whether it is binding and the only legal basis of settlement or not. An exhaustive investigation upon the international law basis would no more aid the Court in determining whether the ordinance is binding and therefore the sole ground upon which the liability of West Virginia to an accounting at all can be based. If the compact is in force, any accounting save under that will be not only burdensome, but superfluous. If both were made, upon what principle would the Court choose between them?

Upon general principles there must be a distinction, one would think, dealing with the general doctrine of apportionment, in the absence of a special agreement between a debt incurred by a state, before separation, in repelling invasion, a debt which would be for the equal benefit of all its inhabitants, and a debt incurred, as was the entire debt of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, for works of internal improvement. If the proceeds of such a debt were all expended in the territory of the original state, there would seem to be no equity in requiring the new state erected out of a portion of its territory to be saddled with any portion of the debt, for the reason that the improvements for which the debt was incurred would be owned by and remain entirely within the limits of the original state. Upon the other hand, if a portion of the debt were expended in improvements within the boundaries of the newly erected state, it would seem that upon separation, as such improvements would be local and the old state would be deprived of her property in them and the new state would become the proprietor and beneficiary by virtue of the separation in the absence of a special agreement, she should, in equity, contribute their cost or value to the payment of the debt of the original state. And this was the theory of the Ordinance.

In this case it is alleged in the bill that the larger portion of the indebtedness for internal improvements, for which the debt was incurred, were constructed within the state of Virginia, but it is alleged, generally, that several millions were expended in constructing improvements within the territory of the new state of West Virginia. All this, manifestly, must have been taken into account in the framing of the ordinance. All the local improvements which were constructed in what is now Virginia remain in Virginia, of course; and those which were constructed in what is now West Virginia were fixed within her borders. It is alleged in the bill:

> "That the completion of some of the main lines of improvement beyond the said range toward the Ohio River since the first of January, 1861, has increased to a very great and material extent the values of real estate, including coal and timber, in the said territory now included in West Virginia, thus carrying into effect the original scheme of improvements which could not have been had not the lines east of said range been first constructed."

But it must be remembered, first, that these internal improvements which have been completed within the territory, now West Virginia since January 1st, 1861, have been completed without expense to Virginia, and for that she is entitled to no credit. Second, Obviously, the completion of such works to a connection with the railroads and other means of transit in Virginia, has enhanced the value of the improvements local to Virginia constructed with the proceeds of said debt, by increasing the business over them. The allegations of the bill, that these improvements in Virginia, which began in 1820, were mainly with a view to ameliorating the condition of the people of West Virginia, and for their benefit are not issuable allegations, but they are denied by the answer. They are easily pleaded, but they afford no basis upon which the Court can enforce a liability upon West Virginia. Whatever element of fact there is in the allegation was well known to the government of Virginia when the Wheeling ordinance was adopted, and undoubtedly entered into the proposition embodied in Section IX.

It is said in the brief for complainant by way of objection to Paragraph 2 of the decree proposed by defendant :

> " We respectfully object to paragraph 2 of defendant's draft, on the ground that it seems to lend the sanction of the court in advance to a basis or scheme for the statement of account, which is not shown by anything as yet in the cause to be either equitable or just.
> " Before any such question can be fairly adjudicated, it is necessary to the ends of justice, that there shall be a mass of evidence in the case, not yet introduced, which evidence the court should have the aid of its Master in collating and thoroughly digesting."

In reply to this we have to say that all that can be shown, bearing upon the question whether the ordinance, and its acceptance and incorporation into the constitution with the consent of Congress, is the measure of liability assumed by West Virginia in agreement with Virginia is already in the case. No evidence can throw any light upon it. It raises a question of law pure and simple; evidence or aid by a Master are not necessary to its determination. The facts are not only undisputed and indisputable, but they are documentary, and are alleged in the bill and admitted by the answer. If the court is of the opinion that it is the basis agreed upon between the two states, it certainly is not for the court to determine whether the agreement ought, or ought not, to have been made between the states. Whether it would, from the standpoint of to-day, a just or equitable basis, is beside the question, which is: Is it the basis agreed upon? It is also said :

> " There is by no means enough in the record to enable the court to come to any just or definite conclusion as to the precise scheme which it would be equitable to adopt in stating the account.
>
> " To do so at this stage of the litigation would be to decide an important question in the case before the evidence for a full understanding and just decision of that question is before the court. It would be largely to take a step in the dark, which might, and in all probability would, do injustice to one party or the other.

"Our main objection to paragraph 2 of defendant's draft is that its effect manifestly is to have the court prejudge the case as to the basis upon which the account shall be stated."

All this means but one thing, and that is, that the court shall take a mass of testimony in order to enable it to determine whether or not it will set aside the compact between the two states. We take this to be an impossible proposition. Of course it is not possible to determine now what the result of an accounting, on the basis of the ordinance, will be, if such an accounting is had. The records archives and papers bearing upon it, for the most part have been in the continued custody of the complainant, and were not open, upon reasonable request many years ago officially preferred, by the Commissioners appointed by West Virginia authorized to state the account. It seems to be the notion of the learned counsel that the court will feel itself at liberty to enforce the ordinance as the basis of accounting, or set it aside and resort to the alleged international law basis, according as testimony shall be furnished as to whether it was equitable or otherwise. We do not understand that to be within the province of the court upon the allegations of this bill and the conceded facts in this case. It involves no pre-judgment. It is simply what occurs in such cases generally that the court will have decided where upon the pleadings and other exhibits it is able to do so, upon the principle which shall govern the accounting. There is no allegation in the bill that the proposition made by the restored government of Virginia, defining the just proportion of the debt to be assumed by the new state, was not advisedly made. There is no allegation of fraud or overreaching, and if there were it comes over forty years too late. It must not be forgotten that this proposition, which was accepted by West Virginia, was a proposition made by Virginia, and that the acceptance of it was a condition upon which she gave her assent to the erection of the new state out of her territory. It is not for her to ask the court to aid her in repudiating it. It must be borne in mind, too, that the fairness of the agreement is to be considered, if it were an open question, without reference to the condition of either party at this day but with reference solely to the condition of both in 1861 when the ordinance was adopted.

Probably it is true that with the development of West Virginia, which has come about through the lapse of years, the increase of her population, the expenditure of vast sums in transportation facilities, in mining and other operations, and the general exploitation of her resources, Virginia would not be willing to make the proposition which she did make a half century ago. But when one thinks of West Virginia as she was then, with her undeveloped resources, with scant transportation facilities and population, it will be quite apparent that the agreement in her then condition was at least a fair one. If it is open to criticism at all, it is that it is unfair to West Virginia. True, Virginia has suffered; she was through four years of war a battleground; her people were largely withdrawn from their vocations of peace; her agriculture languished; her commerce was paralyzed and much of her property destroyed by contending armies. But the people of West Virginia, who adhered to the Union and helped to rescue the government of their state and to bring it into harmony with and support of the government of the United States are neither to blame for it nor should they be compelled to pay for it. West Virginia likewise suffered from her proximity to the theatre of war. Counsel add:

> "It is submitted for a decree referring it to a Master, to state and report to the court the data necessary to enable the court to justly decide it upon its merits—and all the complainant desires is an opportunity to show to the court and its Master what is the fair and equitable basis upon which the account between the two states should be stated, under all of the circumstances of the case, as they shall appear when the evidence is all in. If it should then appear that the basis prescribed by the Wheeling ordinance is binding upon the parties and must be followed as the basis upon which the account shall be made up, that basis would be adopted. But if it should be then manifest that that arbitrary basis of settlement is not the one on which the account should be stated, because it would, if applied to the facts of the case as they shall appear in the evidence, lead to absolutely unconscionable results and operate to impair the obligation of the contracts by which the common debt was created, contracts which were and are alike obligatory upon Virginia and West Virginia, or for any other valid reason, then the scheme of settlement indicated in the Wheeling ordinance would have to be discarded, and an equitable basis and scheme of settlement adopted."

This, too, is but a restatement by counsel, in different language, of the proposition that it is for the court to take testimony through a Master, to determine what would be a just and equitable basis of settlement between Virginia and West Virginia, the agreed basis, or the assumed international law basis. This is plainly calling upon the court to ignore the ordinance as a binding agreement, notwithstanding the solemn statement of the Attorney-General on the argument as to its binding force and contractual character. This, it seems to us, is impossible.

What is meant by the suggestion that the ordinance may be held to be unconstitutional because it impairs the obligation of contracts by which the common debt was created, "contracts which were and are alike obligatory upon Virginia and West Virginia," is difficult for us to understand. It is easy to see that it begs the question, for it assumes the indebtedness of Virginia prior to January 1st to be contracts which are binding alike upon Virginia and West Virginia. The personal identity or individuality of Virginia as a state which issued the bonds and owed the debt was not at all affected by the separation of West Virginia from her and her erection into a new state. It would have been entirely competent for Virginia to have agreed with West Virginia that she would not be liable to assume any portion of the debt of Virginia as it existed prior to the first day of January, 1861. It would not have impaired the obligation of any contract, just as it was competent for the United States to enter into an agreement with Texas that she should pay her own debt, consisting of several millions of dollars, incurred before she was received into the Union.

The writers on international law are unanimous as to the validity of agreements between nations, under similar circumstances, as to the apportionment of indebtedness accrued before a separation. It is needless to again quote or cite them:

Counsel say further by way of objection to paragraph second of the decree proposed by the defendants:

> "While it is believed upon the facts stated in the bill and the accompanying exhibits and upon the proofs hereafter to be adduced in support thereof that West Virginia will owe a very large sum under the arbitrary scheme of the Wheeling ordinance, we submit that we should not in the present status of that litigation be tied down to the terms of that ordinance."

If it is binding upon the two states, why should not both parties be "tied down to the terms of that ordinance?" It will be observed by the Court that no argument is made that it is not binding and that no reason is given why it should not be binding and enforced. Indeed it is insisted upon in the Bill as an irrevocable Compact.

Counsel add:

> "Indeed, its provisions were modified by the terms of the eighth section of Article VIII. to the State Constitution, under which West Virginia was made a state, which provided that West Virginia should assume an equitable proportion of the common debt of the Commonwealth, principal and interest, and yet the defendant's draft excludes any item of interest from the account."

Section 8 of Article VIII. of the first West Virginia constitution did not assume the payment of any interest upon the debt of Virginia as it existed prior to the 1st day of January, 1861. It is brief, we repeat it:

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State."

The above words constitute all there is in the Constitution by way of assumption of liability for indebtedness. If there was unpaid interest due January 1, 1861, that would be a part of the debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia then existing, an equitable proportion of which was assumed by this constitutional provision. After assuming an equitable proportion of the debt, Article VIII. laid a command upon the legislature:

> "* * * to ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

This injunction for reasons which appear in the case was not observed. There was no agreement to assume an equitable proportion of the interest on the debt which might accrue after January 1, 1861. The Constitution shows that it was in the contemplation of its framers that the new State, confessedly sparsely settled and undeveloped, would require time for the discharge of the equitable proportion of the debt so assumed when it should have been ascertained, and it was provided that the legislature should make provision for the liquidation of the debt so assumed, when ascertained, by a sinking fund to pay the interest accruing on the debt so ascertained and assumed by West Virginia, and to pay the principal of the debt so ascertained and assumed within thirty-four years.

The thirty-four years have expired. The constitutional provision has been omitted. The provision as to ascertaining the indebtedness and providing for its liquidation, etc., within thirty-four years was outside of the constitutional assumption of an equitable proportion of the debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, as it existed prior to January 1, 1861. It was no part of the ordinance which was carried into the Constitution, and fulfilled by the specific assumption of an equitable proportion of the debt. The ordinance had made no provision as to the tribunal by which the debt should be ascertained, nor did it contain any provisions as to its payment, after its ascertainment. The assumption of the debt was a literal acceptance and fulfillment of the requirement of Section 9 of the ordinance, to be ascertained as therein provided. If Article VIII. had stopped there, it would, so far as the obligation of West Virginia to Virginia was concerned, have been complete; it would have constituted, as it does constitute, a compact for the assumption and payment of an equitable proportion of the debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia as it existed prior to January 1st, 1861. If the requirement that the Legislature should "ascertain" the amount and provide for its payment, principal and interest, within thirty-four years, had been carried out and bonds issued therefor, the bonds might have been delivered to Virginia for distribution among her creditors and would have borne interest; or they might have been sold by West Virginia, and the cash proceeds paid to Virginia for distribution among her creditors. Either method was open under section 8 to the legislature and so, when there shall have been an accounting under the ordinance and an ascertainment thereby of what is the equitable proportion of the debt as it existed prior to the date of January 1, 1861, assumed by West Virginia, the legislature of West Virginia is perfectly free as to the manner in which the obligation shall be discharged. It would not be obliged to issue bonds for thirty-four years, that provision of the Constitution having been omitted in the revised Constitution. It might do so if it chose. It might provide for the issue of bonds due in 100 years, or 20 years. It is at liberty to fix the rate of interest which the bond shall bear at 2 per cent. or 3 per cent. or 4 per cent. It could provide for the delivery of the bonds to West Virginia in discharge of her obligation to that Commonwealth, if acceptable to her, or she could borrow the money on her bonds at a low rate of interest and discharge the debt to Virginia in money. That would be a "debt contracted" under section 5 of the Constitution for the redemption of a previous liability, and in nowise a modification of or departure from the ordinance or the contract of assumption made irrevocable by the adoption of section 8 of the first Constitution. She made no covenant to pay interest upon the debt of Virginia but she did provide for the payment of interest upon the proportion which she assumed upon its ascertainment, until the amount should be paid to the State. But whether she should pay interest or not, is a question which it is not necessary to determine at this time through a Master or otherwise. In any event, it is very difficult to see what testimony could be taken before a Master which would aid the Court in determining the liability of the defendant to pay interest.

Under Point III., the learned Attorney General objects to the second paragraph of the decree proposed by the defendant also upon the ground that it excludes from the account the value of the property, assets and money which West Virginia is alleged to have received from the Commonwealth of Virginia by grants contained in the acts of February 3 and 4, 1863. The learned Attorney General says that these acts were passed, as we understand him, "before the legislature of Virginia had in any form given its consent to its (West Virginia) creation out of the territory of Virginia". In this he is certainly in error. It has been our understanding that the claim of Virginia, for which an accounting is sought in this case, is restricted by the court to an accounting which shall ascertain the equitable proportion of the debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to January 1, 1861; but be this as it may, the argument of the learned Attorney General is extraordinary.

It is said that upon the basis of the ordinance alone none of the property embraced by the grants contained in the acts of February 3 and 4, 1863, would have passed to the State of West Virginia; and on page 6:

> "By the terms of that ordinance Virginia's title to ownership of all the property and assets theretofore belonging to the Commonwealth remained intact. By it West Virginia would acquire no title to any of these assets or of that property. Framed as that ordinance was, by West Virginians, and arbitrary on its face, unjust as were the criteria by which it undertook to provide that West Virginia's proportion of the common debt should be computed, its authors were not so conscienceless as to also propose that the new State, after making such an inadequate contribution to its share of a debt, which had been chiefly contracted by the votes of the representatives of its people and for their benefit, should also have a share of the property and assets of the Commonwealth free of charge.

"All that was by the terms of that ordinance to be ceded by the Commonwealth to the new State was political dominion and jurisdiction over the people and territory embraced in the new State."

To this we do not agree. There is nothing in the terms of the ordinance which affirms Virginia's title to and ownership of all the property and assets theretofore belonging to the commonwealth of Virginia, or of any thereof located in the territory of the proposed new state. Virginia consented to the erection of West Virginia into a new State, out of her territory. She did not grant sovereignty to the new State. There could not be a new State without sovereignty, and when she gave her consent to the erection of the new State, it was accompanied by all the rights and powers which upon principles of international law would follow the territory and inhere in the sovereignty of the new State over the territory within her borders. The ordinance contained nothing upon the subject. The ordinance did provide—as such ordinances have always provided:

"SECTION 9. All private rights and interests in lands within the proposed State derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State and shall be determined by the laws now existing in the State of Virginia. The lands within the proposed State of non-resident proprietors shall not in any case be taxed higher than the lands of residents therein. No grants of land, or land warrant issued by the proposed State, shall interfere with any warrant issued from the Land Office of Virginia prior to the 17th day of April last which shall be located on lands within the proposed State now liable thereto."

By Section 1 of the ordinance it is declared:

"The people of Virginia, by their delegates assembled in convention at Wheeling, do ordain that a new State, to be called the State of Kanawha, be formed and erected out of the territory included within the following described boundary, to-wit: * * *"

And there is not a word in the ordinance in regard to what should be possessed by the new State of West Virginia, nor a single reservation in the ordinance of assets or property of any kind to the commonwealth of Virginia. What passed to the State of West Virginia by the separation was what would have passed had Virginia been a nation and a portion of her people had, by revolution, separated themselves from her sovereignty and formed of the people and the territory an entirely distinct and new nation called West Virginia; and what would be possessed by the new nation out of what had been possessed by the old one, would be measured entirely, in the absence of special agreement, by the settled principles of international law. It is needless to cite authorities. As Mr. Hall says (p. 79):

> "And as the old State continues its life uninterruptedly, it possesses everything belonging to it as a person which it has not expressly lost; so that property enjoyed by it as a personal whole, or by its subjects in virtue of their being members of that whole, continues to belong to it. On the other hand, rights possessed in respect of the lost territory, including rights under treaties relating to cessions of territory, and demarcations of boundary, obligations contracted with reference to it alone and property which is within it and which has therefore a local character, or which, though not within it, belongs to State institutions localized there, transfer themselves to the new State person."

Again he says:

> "Property which becomes transferred by the fact of separation consists in domains, public buildings, museums and art collections, communal lands, charitable and other endowments connected with the State, and the like."

State banks, which are State institutions and local in their nature, certainly belong to the new State created after a forcible secession. The same result would follow from an agreed dismemberment, unless the property in them were reserved. The same would be true of railroads and all proprietary interests of the old State local to the new State. Section 9 of the ordinance indus-triously safeguards all private rights and interests in lands within the proposed new State and their titles; but we repeat, it is silent as to public interests and ownership of the old State located within the borders of the new.

All that Virginia required in a financial way of the new State was that she should—

> "take upon herself a just proportion of the public debt of the commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, by charging to the defendant all stated expense within the limits thereof and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted and deducted therefrom, the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period."

Expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

Possibly, these grants were made in February, 1863, mainly to afford a ground for the claim that the property which had passed by the separation should be "accounted for in the settlement hereafter to be made." The learned counsel contends—as he is obliged to contend, we think, to give any plausibility even to his proposition—that the statutes of February 3d and 4th, 1893,

> "together with the Wheeling ordinance, the first Constitution of West Virginia, the Act of the United States Congress, approved December 31, 1862, under which the new State was afterwards admitted into the Union, and the act of the Wheeling legislature of May 13, 1862, constitute the constating instruments and acts by which her political existence was created and her governmental powers and duties determined."

And he adds:

> "As was indicated by this court in its decision overruling the defendant's demurrer, the Wheeling ordinance and Section 8 of Article VIII. of the first Constitution of West Virginia must be taken and read together; so, also, these constating acts of February 3 and 4, 1863, and particularly of February 3, 1863, must be taken and read together with Section 9 of the Wheeling ordinance, and with Section 6 of Article VIII. of the first West Virginia Constitution, as together prescribing the terms and conditions on which the consent of the commonwealth was given to the formation of the new State out of her territory, and the transfer to that new State, when formed, of any portion of the assets and property of the parent State."

The court does say in the opinion overruling the defendant's demurrer, "Reading the Virginia ordinance and the West Virginia Constitution, in pari materia, it follows that what was meant by the expression that the legislature "shall ascertain" was that the legislature should ascertain as soon as practicable the result of the pursuit of the method prescribed and provide for the liquidation of the amount so ascertained." True this was said in deciding adversely to the contention that the admission of the State under the ordinance and Section 8 of the Constitution, with the consent of Virginia, created a compact which gave to the legislature of West Virginia power of final ascertainment of the equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia prior to January 1st, 1861, assumed, as provided in the 9th Section of the ordinance. But there can be no question of the correctness of the proposition above quoted from the opinion. We dissent altogether from the suggestion of counsel that the acts of February 3d and 4th, 1863, are to be taken and read with Section 9 of the Wheeling ordinance and with Section 8 of Article VIII., of the first West Virginia Constitution,, as together prescribing the terms and conditions on which the consent of the commonwealth was given to the formation of the new State out of her territory. This proposition is entirely untenable. The Wheeling ordinance was adopted August 20th, 1861. The Constitutional Convention assembled in November, 1861, and framed the Constitution which was thereafter duly ratified by a vote of the people, which Constitution contains Section 8, assuming an equitable proportion of the debt. On the 13th of May, 1862, an act was passed by the legislature of Virginia giving the consent of that State to the formation and erection of the proposed new State within the jurisdiction and territorial limits of said State of Virginia, Section 1 of which is as follows:

> "That the consent of the legislature of Virginia be and the same is hereby given to the formation and erection of the State of West Virginia within the jurisdiction of this State, to include the counties of Hancock, Brook and Ohio (and many other counties), according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the constitution of the said

State of West Virginia and the schedule thereto annexed proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 26th day of November, 1861."

Section 3 said act provided :

"Be it further enacted That this act shall be transmitted by the executive to the senators and representatives of this Commonwealth in Congress, together with the certified original of the said Constitution and schedules, and the said senators and representatives are hereby requested to use their endeavors to obtain the consent of Congress to the admission of the State of West Virginia into the Union."

It ought here to be stated that the Constitutional Convention of West Virginia appointed three Commissioners to that end also that the Commissioners presented on May 31, 1862, to the United States Senate a memorial praying for the admission of that State into the Union, addressed to the Hon. B. F. Wade, Chairman of the Committee on Territories, in which they gave a history of the proceedings which led to the organization of the restored government of Virginia, and which included at length the ordinance adopted on the 20th of August, 1861, by the Convention at Wheeling entitled "An ordinance to provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State", which, on the 31st day of May, 1862, was referred by the Senate to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed (Congressional Globe, p. 2451 ; 37 Cong., 2d Session, Misc. Senate Doc. No. 99), thus clearly demonstrating that Congress had before it not only the Constitution of West Virginia, but the Wheeling ordinance in full.

On the 31st day of December, 1862, an act was passed by the 37th Congress providing that the new state, thus formed in pursuance of the ordinance of the Wheeling convention above referred to, should, upon a certain condition, be admitted into the Union by the name of West Virginia, with the Constitution which had theretofore been adopted by the new State and by the people thereof ; said condition being that a change should be made in the constitution of the proposed State in regard to the liberation of slaves therein. And it was provided by the act of Congress that whenever the President should issue his proclamation stating the fact that such change had been made and ratified, thereupon the act admitting the new State into the Union should become effective 60 days after the date of uch proclamation.

The proclamation was duly issued by President Lincoln on the 20th day of April, 1863, and on the 20th day of June, 1863, West Virginia became a state and fully organized as one of the States of the Union.

Prior to the passage, it will be observed, of the acts of February 3 and 4, 1863, the general assembly of Virginia had consented to the admission of West Virginia under the Constitution adopted by her people and had requested her admission, and Congress had admitted her under that Constitution with the single condition that a should change be made in it relative to the liberation of slaves, which was made. And we deny that it was in the power of Virginia after the action of Congress to withdraw her consent to the admission of West Virginia or to change the terms of her consent, Congress not having required as a condition of her admission any change in the ordinance adopted by the Wheeling convention or in the Constitution in anywise affecting the provisions of the ordinance.

Virginia could not thus play fast and loose with Congress in respect of her consent to the admission of West Virginia. This proposition has been sustained by this Court in Virginia vs. West Virginia, 11 Wallace, 39.

It cannot be supposed that after Congress had passed the law admitting the state of West Virginia into the Union upon the conditions indicated and authorizing President Lincoln to issue the proclamation announcing a compliance with the condition, that a specific withdrawal by Virginia of her consent to the admission of the new state into the Union would have been of any force. If this be a correct proposition, it necessarily follows that no modification of the consent theretofore given upon which Congress had acted and after Congress had acted on the faith of her prior consent, would be of any efficacy. The proposition of the learned counsel must have for its predicate the assumption that after Congress had passed the act for the admission of West Virginia and up to the time President Lincoln issued his proclamation declaring the condition imposed by Congress to have been complied with, the General Assembly of Virginia possessed the power to withdraw her consent or to modify it as she might see fit. If she could withdraw it, she could modify it. She could change its terms and impose other conditions. Prior to February, 1863, West Virginia had been admitted into the Union upon a condition subsequent. The act was complete. Congress simply suspended the taking effect of the act until sixty days after the proclamation of the President that the condition had been complied with. The argument places the acts of February 3 and 4, 1863, upon precisely the same basis, which it is conceded that the Wheeling ordinance of August 20, 1861, and the constitution of 1861 stand. It is probable that Virginia might have withdrawn her consent to the formation of the new state at any time before the acceptance of the proposition proffered by the ordinance, by the convention which framed, adopted and submitted for ratification the constitution of 1861. That she could not do it afterwards and before the action of Congress is subject to grave doubt, although it is academic, since she did not attempt to do so.

The counties of Berkeley and Jefferson involved in the case of Virginia vs. West Virginia, supra, were by the ordinance authorized to be incorporated in West Virginia upon the condition that a majority of the votes of the counties were cast in favor of becoming a part of West Virginia. The convention by the constitution made provision for their being incorporated. By act afterwards Virginia renewed her consent by legislation. The vote was not taken by the counties until after the state had been admitted into the Union and by that time and before the vote was taken Virginia had repented and had passed an act withdrawing her consent; and, to test the question whether these counties had become a part of the State of West Virginia, the suit of Virginia vs. West Virginia was brought in this Court. The Court said :

> "Now, we have here on two different occasions the legislative proposition of Virginia that these counties might become part of West Virginia, and we have the constitution of West Virginia agreeing to accept them and providing for their place in the new-born state. There was one condition, however, imposed by Virginia to her parting with them and one condition made by West Virginia to her receiving them, and those conditions were the same, namely, the assent of the majority of the votes of the counties to the transfer. It seems to us that here was an agreement between the old state and the new that these counties should become part of the latter, subject to that condition alone."

Again, as to Congress having assented, the Court says :

> "It is therefore an inference clear and satisfactory that Congress by that statute (referring to the act of admission) intended to consent to the admission of the state with the contingent boundaries provided for in its constitution and in the statute of Virginia, which prayed for its admission on those terms and that in doing so it necessarily consented to the agreement of those states on that subject. There was then a valid agreement between the two states, consented to by Congress, which agreement made the accession of these counties dependent upon the result of a popular vote in favor of that proposition."

Mr. Justice DAVIS, with whom concurred Justices CLIFFORD and FIELD, dissented upon the ground, that Congress had not given its consent to the compact between the states for the transfer of Berkeley and Jefferson Counties to West Virginia until March 2, 1866, saying:

"If so, the consent came too late because the legislature of Virginia had on the 5th day of December, 1865, withdrawn its assent to the proposed cession of these two counties. This withdrawal was in ample time, as it was before the proposal of the state had become operative as a concluded compact, and the bill in my judgment shows that Virginia had sufficient reasons for recalling its proposition to part with the territory embraced within these counties. But it is maintained in the opinion of the Court that Congress did give its consent to the transfer of these counties by Virginia to West Virginia when it admitted Virginia into the Union."

From this the learned justices dissented.

It is clear to our apprehension that whatever may be the opinion of the court as to the effect of the acts of February 3 and 4, 1863, it cannot be said that they had any effect whatever, qualifying or otherwise, upon the assent which Virginia gave in the ordinance and by the act of her legislature to the admission of the State of West Virginia into the Union, and if the Court shall be of the opinion that under the general public law which governs between nations, the property referred to in the acts of February 3 and 4 or either of them, passed by the acceptance of the ordinance and the conditional admission of the State by Congress upon the request of Virginia, the enactment of the acts of February 3 and 4, 1863, were not necessary as evidences of title, and in no event could be anything more than that. The learned Attorney General further says:

"It is objected to the draft of the proposed decree for the defendant that it does not direct any account to be taken ascertaining the amount and proportion of the debt of Virginia on and prior to January 31, 1861, which West Virginia should assume and pay, but contents itself with merely directing the arbitrary and inconsequential accounts defined in paragraph second of defendant's proposed decree. This is an objection simply that the proposed decree of the defendant is upon a different theory from that proposed by the complainant. That this is true, is freely admitted. It was not intended by the draft that the Court should direct the Master to ascertain and report what proportion of the public debt of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, West Virginia ought to assume and pay. That was settled by Virginia and West Virginia nearly fifty years ago. The latter was required to take upon herself a just proportion of the debt, and the two states agreed how that should be ascertained. The draft proposed by the defendant is in literal execution of the contract of the parties, as evidenced by the ordinance and section eight of the first constitution.

It directs the Master to ascertain and report:

(a) The amount of State expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, within the territory now included within the State of West Virginia, since any part of said indebtedness was contracted, as provided by the ordinance adopted by the Commonwealth of August 20, 1861.

We agree that the last clause need not be inserted.

(b) To ascertain the aggregate ordinary expenses of the State Government of the Commonwealth prior to January 1, 1861, and since any part of said indebtedness was contracted.

(c) All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth of Virginia from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during the said period.

The items (a) and (b) are, under the ordinance, to be charged to West Virginia.

The item (c) is under the ordinance to be credited to the State of West Virginia, and when these three steps shall have been taken, and the two items charged, and the one item credited, the sum which it was agreed between the two States should constitute a just proportion of the debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, which West Virginia assumed, will have been ascertained. It is vain to refer to these as "arbitrary and inconsequential items."

They are the items which Virginia herself framed and required to be accepted by the proposed new State as a condition of assent to her separation and admission into the Union.

The entire debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia as it existed prior to January 1, 1861, as averred in the bill, and admitted by the answer, was contracted for, and its proceeds are alleged to have been expended in, the construction of a system of internal improvements, the greater part of which were expended in what is now Virginia, and several millions of which were, it is alleged by the Bill, and denied in the answer, expended in what is now West Virginia. It was just that Virginia should provide that there should be charged to West Virginia so much of the proceeds as were expended in the construction of internal improvements within her territory. It ought not to be very difficult to ascertain how much of the debt was expended for internal improvements within the limits of what is now West Virginia.

There is but one item in section 9—defining the manner in which the account should be taken in order to ascertain the proportion of the debt to be taken upon herself by the proposed new State—left at all indefinite, and that is item (b), "'a just proportion' of the ordinary expenses of the State Government, since any part of said debt was contracted." This involves a determination of the basis upon which a "just proportion" of the aggregate ordinary expenses of the State Government during the said period is to be ascertained. Shall it be population or territory, or both, or taxable values? We are strongly of the opinion that it should be based upon population, since "government"—including the administration of justice, the making and administering of the laws, the education of the children through a system of common schools, academies and a State university, the maintenance of State institutions, the support of prisoners, the care of the insane and paupers, and the like—is for people, not acres. It is difficult to conceive of government except in its relation to people, and so, it has seemed to us that the basis must be population. We therefore suggest that there should be added to the draft proposed by the defendant, in respect of an ascertainment of the aggregate ordinary expenses of the State, a direction to the Master to find alternatively certain facts substantially as follows:

> "For the purpose of enabling the Court to determine the just proportion of the aggregate of the ordinary expenses of > the State Government of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, and since any part of said indebtedness was contracted, said Master shall ascertain and report the population during the said period of the counties now constituting the Commonwealth of Virginia, and separately the population of the counties now constituting the State of West Virginia, as shown by the decennial censuses taking during the said period by the United States, and also the average population of Virginia during each of said periods of ten years."

The aggregate ordinary expenses being found, and the items suggested as to population, it will be easy to determine the "just proportion" if that is the proper basis.

We submit that this case should not be cast at large, with no definition of the principles to govern his action, into the hands of a Master; that at least it should be settled before a reference for the purpose of taking an account, whether the liability of Virginia to West Virginia is upon the special agreement which preceded and accompanied her admission into the Union, or, because of the absence of a special agreement, upon the basis of population and territory.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, COMPLAINANT,

vs.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

MEMORANDUM FOR DEFENDANT.

It will be observed that in paragraph II of this draft of a decree the master is not only directed to ascertain the amount and proportion of said indebtedness, but "of the interest accrued thereon."

Counsel for the defendant object further to this paragraph because there is no legal ground for directing the ascertainment of interest. The State of West Virginia has not obligated herself in any manner for the payment of interest. The principle is well settled that a State is not liable to pay interest unless it has expressly contracted to do so.

In support of this proposition this court, in United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S., 211, said:

"A state is not liable to pay interest on its debts, unless its consent to do so has been manifested by an act of its legislature, or by lawful contract of its executive officers."

Following the principle thus announced by this court, many of the State courts have laid down in distinct terms the same proposition. Among the decisions of these courts are the following:

Sawyer v. Colgan, 102 Cal., 293; 36 Pac., 583.
Hawkins v. Mitchell, 34 Fla., 421, 422; 16 So., 316.
Molineux v. State, 109 Cal., 380; 50 Am. St. Rep., 50; 42 Pac., 34.
Flint, etc., R. R. v. Board of State Auditors, 102 Mich., 502; 60 N. W., 971.
Carr v. State, 127 Ind., 204; 22 Am. St. Rep., 624.

In Carr v. Sate, 127 Ind., 204; 22 Am. St. Rep., 624, this principle is announced as one of the points decided:

"A sovereign State is not bound to pay interest unless it has contracted to do so."

The court, in the course of its opinion in this case, says:

"In the case of State ex rel. v. Board, etc., 36 Ohio St., 409, it was held that in the absence of a promise to pay interest none can be recovered against a State, and that a State is not within the provisions of a general statute providing for the payment of interest in cases where money is wrongfully withheld from a creditor. The court put its decision upon the familiar rule that a sovereign is not bound by the words of a statute unless it is expressly named, and in support of its conclusion cited these cases: Trustee, etc., v. Campbell, 16 Ohio St., 11; Joselyn v. Stone, 28 Miss., 753; State v. Kinne, 41 N. H., 238; Attorney-General v. Cape Fear, etc., Co., 2 Ired. Eq., 444; Auditorial Board v. Arles, 15 Tex., 72; State v. Thompson, 10 Ark., 61. In Wightman v. United States, 23 Ct. of Cl., 144, the general rule was stated, and it was said: 'Hence there is no law fixing a rate of interest for all classes of the public debt, and a long-established public policy has been to pay interest only where it is a subject of express agreement or of positive enactment.' It was held in the case of Tillson v. United States, 100 U. S., 43, that a statute referring a claim did not authorize a recovery of interest, in the absence of words expressly providing for the payment of interest. It is impossible to escape the effect of these authorities, and considerations may be readily suggested which increase their force. One is, that there is no right to coerce the payment of a debt due from a sovereign, and, of course, a sovereign may impose limitations upon its liability."

In a note appended to this case as reported in 22 American State Reports, at page 448, we find the following:

"With respect to the obligation of the State to pay interest upon its indebtedness, the principal case is well established by other authorities upon the same subject. In nearly and perhaps all of the States there are statutory provisions providing that moneys, after they become due, shall, in the absence of express contract to the contrary, bear the rate of interest specified in such statutes; but, acting under the old common-law rule that the king or sovereign is not bound by a statute unless expressly named therein, it has been uniformly held that these statutory provisions respecting interest did not apply to any obligation either of the State or of the national government, and therefore that interest is never allowed upon such obligations, in the absence of some special statute clearly manifesting the intention of the sovereign to be bound for the payment of interest upon the particular obligation or class of obligations under consideration (United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S., 211; State v. Thompson, 10 Ark., 61; State v. Board of Public Works, 36 Ohio St., 409; State v. Bank of Washington, 18 Ark., 554; United States v. Sherman, 98 U. S., 565; United States v. Bayard, 127 U. S., 251; Tillson v. United States, 100 U. S., 43; In re Gosman, 17 Ch. Div., 771; Attorney-General v. Cape Fear N. Co., 2 Ired. Eq., 444; Bledsoe v. State, 64 N. C., 392; Trustee v. Campbell, 16 Ohio St., 11; Joselyn v. Stone, 28 Miss., 753; Wightman v. United States, 23 Ct. of Cls., 144)".

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1907.

IN EQUITY. ORIGINAL, No. 4.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA

v.

WEST VIRGINIA.

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF MOTION TO MODIFY DECREE OF REFERENCE.

Paragraph 2 of the decree of reference entered herein on the 4th day of May, 1908, directed the special master to ascertain—

> "2. The extent and value of the territory of Virginia and of West Virginia June 20, 1863, and the population thereof, with and without slaves, separately."

As a substitute for this the defendant proposes the following:

> "2. The territorial area and assessed valuation of the States of Virginia and West Virginia June 20, 1863, and the population thereof, with and without slaves, separately stated, including in the latter State the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson."

We respectfully submit that unless the official assessments of the territory and slaves in both sections of the State are made the basis of the valuation by the master, it will be impossible for him to comply with this part of the decree in a manner satisfactory to the court or the parties. Forty-five years have elapsed since the date fixed in the decree for the valuations, and it is scarcely possible that witnesses can now be produced whose testimony upon the subject will be conclusive or satisfactory. Moreover, the introduction of parol evidence to prove values as they existed forty-five years ago, in a State consisting of more than 60,000 square miles of territory and containing many thousands of slaves, would necessarily prolong the investigation to an unreasonable extent and subject the litigants to a very large and, we think, useless expense. At best, the witnesses could only state their opinions, and upon such a subject they would differ so widely that it would not be possible to reconcile them so as to reach a satisfactory conclusion. The decree provides:

> "All public records published by authority of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 17th day of April, 1861, and all papers and documents and other matter constituting parts of the public files and records of Virginia prior to the date aforesaid, which in the judgment of the master may be relevant and pertinent to any of said inquiries, or copies thereof, if duly authenticated, may be used in evidence and considered by the master, but all such evidence shall be subject to exceptions to its competency. The public acts and records of the two States since the admission of West Virginia into the Union shall be evidence, if pertinent and duly authenticated, but all such evidence tendered by either party shall be subject to proper legal exceptions to its competency."

The authentic official evidence thus provided for in the decree would seem to be sufficient to secure a reasonable degree of accuracy in the valuations ordered to be ascertained by the master without encumbering the record and protracting the investigation by the introduction of unreliable opinions, which must, under the circumstances, be mere guesses.

The assessments are parts of the public records of the State and constituted the basis of taxation in both sections, and their accuracy ought not to be impeached at this late day by the mere opinions of witnesses based upon their recollections of the situation as it then existed. These opinions as to the value of the territory of West Virginia would be largely influenced by the developments of her mineral and other resources and the internal improvements made in that State since 1863, and the testimony would be quite different from what it would have been if it had been taken at that time. It was then known, as is alleged in the bill, and was known when Virginia began to create the debt, that these resources existed, and it is to be presumed that the officials in assessing the value of the land took them into consideration. Most of the land was not arable and was valuable mainly, if not entirely, because of the forests and minerals. It would be manifestly unfair to West Virginia to receive as evidence, for the purpose of increasing the valuations, the mere opinions of witnesses as to the values of gas, coal, iron, and timber separately from the land in which the minerals were deposited or on which the timber was grown, and then add that value to the assessment which already included them. It is stated in the brief filed for Virginia on this motion that these minerals and other resources were not included in the assessments "as distinct subjects of valuation;" but it is said "their presence was considered in estimating the value of land in transactions between vendor and vendee," and that the property was assessed at two-thirds its value. That would be, we suppose, at two-thirds of its market value, including, of course, the minerals and other resources. The same rule of assessment prevailed in both sections of the State, and therefore the relative proportions which the value of property in one section bore to the value in the other would be precisely the same as if it had been assessed at its full market value.

If the assessments are not to govern, what is to be the test of value? It would be impracticable to prove the market value of the land and slaves in 1863, but if assessed values are to be ignored or contradicted, we know of no other test except market value that could be properly applied.

For two years prior to June, 1863, a large part of the territory which now constitutes the State of Virginia was occupied by the two armies, and not only was much valuable property destroyed or carried away, but all values, and especially the values of slave property, were greatly depreciated. The people of West Virginia were not responsible for this condition and they ought not to be prejudiced by it in ascertaining the relative values of the property in the two States at that date.

Paragraphs 3, 4, 5, and 6 read as follows:

> "3. All expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of the debt was contracted.
>
> "4. Such proportion of the ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia since any of said debt was contracted, as was properly assignable to the counties which were created into the State of West Virginia on the basis of the average total population of Virginia, with and without slaves, as shown by the census of the United States.
>
> "5. And also on the basis of the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia.
>
> "6. All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during the period prior to the admission of the latter State into the Union."

The defendant asks that these paragraphs be so modified as to read as follows:

> "3. All expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of said debt was contracted, and prior to January 1, 1861.
>
> "4. The ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia since any of said debt was contracted and prior to January 1, 1861, on the basis of the average total population of Virginia, with and without slaves, as shown by the census of the United States.

"5. And also on the basis of the assessed valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia during the same period.

"6. All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the State of West Virginia, during the said period, and prior to January 1, 1861."

Unless some date is fixed by the court at which the investigation shall stop, the master will be required to decide what seems to us some very difficult questions. On the 17th of April, 1861, Virginia passed an ordinance of secession from the Union, and from that time on until long after West Virginia was admitted as a State the two sections were substantially as separate and distinct as they are now. Not long after the passage of the ordinance of secession the restored government of Virginia was organized, composed almost entirely of the counties now constituting the State of West Virginia. These counties paid nearly the whole of the revenue of the restored State until the admission of the new State into the Union. Is West Virginia to be charged in this proceeding with money expended in what is now her territory during that time, and with her just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the government up to June 30, 1863? That was the only recognized government existing in Virginia during that period. We do not suppose it will be claimed that West Virginia is liable for any part of the ordinary expenses of the government at Richmond after the passage of the secession ordinance. To make such a charge against her would be to compel her to contribute to the support of a government in rebellion against the United States. Under the Wheeling ordinance she ought to be charged with money expended in her counties and with her share of the ordinary expenses and credited with money paid into the State treasury during the same period, whatever that period may be; and it should be prescribed by the court, not left to the master.

Most of what we have said concerning paragraph 2 of the decree is also applicable to paragraph 5. It does not appear to us at all practicable to ascertain, by the testimony of witnesses, what was "the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties" forty-five years ago. According to the position taken by counsel for Virginia, the valuation is to be ascertained by considering the oil, gas, iron, coal, and timber separately from the land in or on which they were situated, and then, of course, it would be necessary to ascertain the value of the land separately, without the minerals or timber, in order to secure the entire valuation. This tedious process would have to be adopted in both States, if it was adopted in one, and the investigation would consequently be almost interminable. It is well known that Virginia had vast and valuable deposits of coal and iron and large forests of timber, as well as many other natural resources and advantages which West Virginia did not possess, such as navigable waters, access to tide water, with large bays and fine harbors. Are all these assets to be valued separately also, or did they, like the minerals and timber in West Virginia, affect the value of land and other property of the State and thereby increase the valuation in the official assessments?

The fact that assessments were not made annually, but only once in ten years, is not very material when they are introduced as evidence of values in any intermediate year. The United States census is taken only at the end of each decade, but each decennial census and each decennial assessment shows a certain rate of increase or decrease, as the case may be, since the last one was taken, and it is not difficult, therefore, to calculate with reasonable accuracy what the values are in any particular year. Such evidence is certainly far more reliable than the memories and opinions of witnesses who are called to testify after the lapse of nearly half a century.

In plaintiff's brief on this motion it is said:

> "The expenses of the government of the restored State government from June or July, 1861, to June 20, 1863, when the State of West Virginia was created, were all furnished from the funds of the Commonwealth of Virginia, as appears from the acts of the legislature referred to in the progress of this cause. So that the latter date would be the proper one, if any amendment at all is to be made."

On the 19th day of June, 1861, the convention which had assembled at Wheeling on the 8th of June, 1861, adopted an ordinance for the reorganization of the State government, and the restored State government was organized immediately thereafter by the election (by the convention) of a governor and other State officials. Senators were elected to the Congress of the United States on the 9th day of July, 1861, and they were admitted to seats in the Senate on the 13th day of the same month. This government continued until 1867, and it defrayed all its own expenses as long as it existed. As already stated, nearly the whole of its revenue was paid by the counties now composing the State of West Virginia until the admission of that State into the Union; the old Commonwealth of Virginia paid no part of the expenses. It had not only withdrawn protection from the persons and property of the people in West Virginia, but was waging war against them, having, as early as April 24, 1861, seven days after the passage of the ordinance of secession, entered into an agreement with the Confederate States transferring the control of the State to the Confederacy. We are not aware of the existence of any acts of the legislature showing that any part of the expenses of the restored State government was paid "from the funds of the Commonwealth of Virginia," unless the restored government is meant; and if this is the meaning of the statement, the people of West Virginia have paid once for the support of their government and for the protection of their territory and property, without any assistance from the old State, and that State ought not now to have any credit on account of these ordinary expenses.

We respectfully submit that, whatever date may be fixed with respect to the closing of the other accounts in controversy, it is clear that West Virginia should not be charged with any part of the ordinary expenses of the State government after the actual separation and the withdrawal of protection by Virginia in this respect.

Virginia had the Right under Her Own Laws to Discharge Herself from Liability by Assuming Two-thirds of the Old Debt, if Done with the Consent of Her Creditors (and it Was so Done), without Impairing Their Rights (if Any They Had) against West Virginia for the Residue ---------- 63-65

Virginia has no such Interest in any Part of the Unfunded Debt Held by Third Parties, which it Is Claimed West Virginia Should Pay, as to Enable Her to Enforce Payment by this Suit ---------- 65-66

Party without Interest Cannot Maintain an Action-------- 66-76

Virginia, being without Interest in the Unfunded Debt Held by Third Parties, Cannot Constitute Herself a Trustee, and thus Create a Controversy between Herself as Trustee and the State of West Virginia, and Thereby Maintain this Suit as to such Unfunded Part of said Debt ---------- 77-82

CAUSES OF SEPARATION OF WEST VIRGINIA:

1. Rule of construction to be applied in this case---------- 199

THE RULE OF PUBLIC LAW IN REGARD TO THE APPORTIONMENT OF THE DEBT OF A STATE AFTER ITS DIVISION:

1. This Court has never decided that when a state is divided the debts of the original state should be ratably apportioned between it and the new state---------- 206

2. The true rule of public law in case of the division of a state. General debts are apportioned on the basis of taxable value. Local debts are assumed by the state for the exclusive benefit of whose territory they were incurred. The authorities ---------- 210-229

4. Recognition of distinction between general and local debts in division of territory of Dakota---------- 230

5. Distinction between general and special debt discussed in negotiation of treaty between United States and Spain ---------- 234

6. The distinction between general debt and local debt is substantial and just ---------- 234

7. The public debt of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, was a local or special, and not a general, debt------ 236

8. The nature of the debt as shown by the legislation under which it was incurred ---------- 237

THE RULE OF PUBLIC LAW DOES NOT GOVERN THIS CASE BECAUSE THE WHEELING ORDINANCE AND THE CONSTITUTION OF WEST VIRGINIA CONSTITUTE A SPECIAL AGREEMENT AS TO THE PROPORTION OF THE OLD VIRGINIA DEBT TO BE ASSUMED BY WEST VIRGINIA:

1. Section 9 of the Ordinance ---------- 248

2. Section 8 of Article VIII. of West Virginia Constitution 249

3. Two views of opposing counsel in relation to the Ordinance ---------- 249

4. Virginia is not in a position to insist upon the elimination of the Ordinance from the case ---------- 252

5. Virginia does not contend that the Ordinance has ceased to be binding ---------- 253

6. There is no conflict between the Ordinance and the Constitution ---------- 255

7. The vice in the argument for Virginia ---------- 258

8. "Just" and "Equitable" are symonymous ---------- 261

9. If the Ordinance is in conflict with the Constitution, the Ordinance must be wholly eliminated ---------- 263

10. With the Ordinance eliminated the ascertainment of West Virginia's proportion of the debt must be left to the Legislature of Virginia ---------- 263

11. With the Ordinance eliminated, is the matter justiciable?* ---------- 265

12. The Court has declared that the Ordinance and the Constitution do not conflict and are to be read in pari materia ---------- 270

EXCEPTIONS TO THE MASTER'S REPORT:

1. The Master was right in holding that bonds held by the Sinking Fund and by the Literary Fund were not a part of the public debt of Virginia ---------- 273

2. The Master was right in excluding under Paragraph III. of the decree expenditures by corporations in which Virginia was a stockholder ---------- 274-281

(a) The Master's finding ---------- 275

(b) The rejected claims represented expenditures by private corporations ---------- 275

(c) Virginia Legislature and Courts recognize the distinction between private corporations with stock and public corporations without stock 276

(d) Virginia Act of 1863 transferring to West Virginia property within her boundaries---- 278

(f) West Virginia cannot equitably be charged both with the value of the stock and with the expenditures made by the corporations---- 280
(g) Counsel for Virginia beg the question ------ 281

3. The Master was wrong in finding that interest on the public debt of Virginia was part of the ordinary expenses of the state government ---------- 282-314

(a) The language of the Ordinance ---------- 283
(b) Defendant's contention ---------- 283
(c) Interest on state debt is not an ordinary expense of government because it is payable only during a limited period ---------- 283
(d) Interest on the old Virginia debt was not an ordinary expense of government because the debt was incurred for extraordinary purposes 284
(e) The fact that the interest was payable at regular intervals did not make it an ordinary expense ---------- 285
(f) Interest is not properly described as an expense ---------- 285
(g) The distinction between the state and the government of the state ---------- 286
(h) Finance provisions of state constitutions show that interest on a state debt is not regarded as an expense of government ---------- 288
(i) Extracts from state constitutions ---------- 289
(j) The distinction between ordinary expenses of government and interest on a public debt is apparent in the case of municipal corporations ---------- 293

(k) The adjectives "ordinary," "current," and "necessary," when applied to governmental expenses are synonymous ---------- 294
(l) The Master's argument ---------- 295
(m) Fallacy of the Master's argument ---------- 296
(n) By the great preponderance of judicial construction, interest on a public debt is not an ordinary expense of government. The authorities ---------- 297
(o) Legislation of Virginia during the period covered by the Ordinance did not deal with interest on the public debt as an ordinary expense of government ---------- 307
(p) The creation of a sinking fund for the payment of interest on the Virginia debt shows that such interest was not an ordinary expense of the state government ---------- 311
(q) The words of the Ordinance should be construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances ---------- 313
(r) The proportion of ordinary expenses with which Virginia is to be charged should be ascertained upon the basis of taxable values 314

WEST VIRGINIA IS NOT BOUND TO PAY INTEREST FROM JANUARY 1, 1861, ON THE PROPORTION OF THE OLD VIRGINIA DEBT ASSUMED BY HER:

1. Neither by the Ordinance nor by her Constitution did West Virginia in praesenti assume any portion of the public debt of Virginia ---------- 317
2. The Virginia rule as to private contracts that interest follows the principal does not apply to contracts between states ---------- 319
3. Analysis of Higginbotham's Executrix v. Commonwealth ---------- 319

4. The case of United States v. North Carolina 323

5. There is no basis for Virginia's claim for interest---- 324

6. West Virginia agreed to assume a just proportion, not of the outstanding obligations of Virginia, but of her debt ---------- 325

7. There is no evidence that the improvements constructed by Virginia within her present limits were for the benefit of the region now West Virginia ---------- 326

8. Facts showing injustice of Virginia's claims -------- 327

9. Under the Ordinance and her Constitution, West Virginia cannot be charged with interest until the ascertainment in the manner prescribed of her equitable proportion of the old Virginia debt ---------- 329

10. Memorandum of John G. Carlisle ---------- 332

11. Virginia's responsibility for the delay in apportioning the debt ---------- 335

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1910

ORIGINAL NO. 3.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, Plaintiff, vs.) In Equity.
STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, Defendant.

DEFENDANT'S BRIEF

PART I.

ARGUMENT OF CASE ON THE BILL AND ANSWER AND EXHIBITS.

INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT.

Complainant's bill was filed at the October term, 1906, to which defendant interposed demurrer and amended demurrer, which, after argument, in March, 1907, were overruled in the opinion of this Court pronounced May 27, 1907 (206 U. S. 290).

The briefs and argument of counsel on the demurrer are contained in West Virginia Compilation, Vol. I. (See last paragraph of this statement.)

Defendant filed her answer and its exhibits in October, 1907.

May 4, 1908, the cause, by a decree, was referred to a Special Master with directions (209 U. S. 514), which directions were modified, June 1, 1908, by substituting in paragraph 2 of the decree of reference the words "assessed valuation" for the word "value."

There is contained in Vol. 2 of West Virginia Compilation, at the pages indicated, the following:

Form of decree proposed by each party, referring cause to a Master, plaintiff's at p. 35, defendant's p. 41; the motion of defendant to modify the decree of reference, p. 325; the order modifying said decree, p. 371; the names recommended by each party as fit persons to be appointed Master, by plaintiff at p. 61, by defendant at p. 57; the order appointing Mr. Charles E. Littlefield Special Master, p. 375. The volume also contains the briefs and arguments of counsel on the motion to refer the cause to a Master and on the motion to modify the decree of reference.

Beginning on November 16, 1908, and ending on July 2, 1909, sessions were held by the Special Master at Richmond, Va., to take evidence. Thereafter the Special Master held sessions in the city of New York, to hear arguments of counsel, the last whereof was held on January 1, 1910.

March 17, 1910, the Special Master filed his report.

In April, 1910, the parties filed printed exceptions to the Master's report.

The printed Record consists of two volumes; the Record proper, referred to herein as "R., p. ---"; and the Appendix to the record, referred to herein as "App., p. ---." The Appendix contains such statutes and ordinances and extracts therefrom, and selections from constitutions of Virginia and West Virginia, as were deemed most material to the questions in the cause, compiled by the parties under direction of the Special Master.

The Record consists of Part I. and Part II. The former contains the Bill and its exhibits; defendant's demurrer and amended demurrer; opinion of the Court overruling demurrer (206 U. S. 290); defendant's answer and its exhibits; decree referring cause to the Master; motion to modify decree of reference; and the orders modifying decree, and appointing the Special Master.

Part II. contains the proceedings and evidence taken before the Special Master, arranged under the seven paragraphs of the decree of reference; followed by the evidence of general application to the cause. Under each paragraph is printed the exhibits and other evidence germane to the subject of the paragraph.

But not all the exhibits, documents and other evidence adduced is printed in the Record. In order to keep the Record as small as might be, under direction of the Master much was omitted therefrom. None of the original principal exhibits of either party are printed, except under Paragraph VII. After the oral evidence of the expert accountants of each party was given, by direction of the Master, these accountants prepared "Joint Exhibits," from which all items were omitted about which there was no disagreement as to amount; and in which the items and details thereof about which there were disagreement were stated. Some other exhibits were also omitted.

So, the oral evidence of the expert accountants printed in the Record was given under the original exhibits and before the "Joint Exhibits" were prepared. All matters of mere routine were also omitted from the Record; but all the exhibits, evidence, etc., introduced before the Master at the hearings specified are part of the record of the cause, and were returned by the Master with his report.

Some evidence was taken by the Master after the Record was printed, and designated as "Supplemental Exhibits" 1 to 11.

Besides the foregoing, there have been used in the cause two books, gotten out by the Attorneys General of West Virginia, referred to above as West Virginia Compilation, Vol. I. and Vol. II., and referred to herein as "W. Va. Comp., vol. ---, p.----." Copies of these books have been filed in the clerk's office of the Court.

Historical Statement Showing Formation of West Virginia and Her Assumption of a Just Proportion of the Public Debt.

On November 15, 1860, Governor John Letcher issued a proclamation convoking the General Assembly of Virginia in extra session. In obedience to this proclamation, the general assembly convened in the capitol at Richmond at the time designated therein, and on January 14, 1861, passed an act providing "for electing members of a convention and to convene the same." The delegates to this convention were to be elected on the 4th of February, 1861, and to assemble at Richmond on the 14th of the same month.

The convention assembled at Richmond at the time appointed, composed of 152 delegates, of whom 47 were from counties now included in West Virginia, and on April 17, 1861, the following ordinance was adopted by said convention:

> "AN ORDINANCE TO REPEAL THE RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA BY THE STATE OF VIRGINIA, AND TO RESUME ALL THE RIGHTS AND POWERS GRANTED UNDER SAID CONSTITUTION.
>
> "The people of Virginia, in their ratification of the Constitution of the United States of America, adopted by them in Convention on the twenty-fifth day of June, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, having declared that the powers granted under the said Constitution were derived from the people of the United States, and might be resumed whensoever the same should be perverted to their injury and oppression, and the Federal Government having perverted said powers, not only to the injury of the people of Virginia, but to the oppression of the Southern Slaveholding States.
>
> "Now, therefore, we, the people of Virginia, do declare and ordain, That the ordinance adopted by the people of this State in Convention, on the twenty-fifth day of June, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, whereby the Constitution of the United States of America was ratified; and all acts of the General Assembly of this State ratifying or adopting amendments to said Constitution, are hereby repealed and abrogated; that the union between the State of Virginia and the other States under the Constitution aforesaid is hereby dissolved, and that the State of Virginia is in full possession and exercise of all the rights of sovereignty which belong and appertain to a free and independent State.
>
> "And they do further declare, That said Constitution of the United States of America is no longer binding on any of the citizens of this State.

"This Ordinance shall take effect and be an act of this day, when ratified by a majority of the votes of the people of this State, cast at a poll to be taken thereon, on the fourth Thursday in May next, in pursuance of a schedule hereinafter to be enacted."

The Ordinance of Secession was accompanied by a Schedule providing, among other things, for a vote of the people on the question of the ratification of the ordinance by the people of Virginia, to be taken on the fourth Thursday in May, 1861. The ninth section of this ordinance provided as follows:

"The election for members of Congress for this State to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, required by law to be held on the fourth Thursday in May next, is hereby suspended and prohibited until otherwise ordained by this Convention."

On April 18, 1861, said Convention adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Governor of this Commonwealth be requested to communicate immediately to the President of the Confederate States, the fact that this Convention, on yesterday, adopted an Ordinance resuming the powers delegated by Virginia to the Federal Government, and to express to the said President the earnest desire of Virginia to enter into an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the said Confederate States."

Pending the question of the ratification of the Ordinance of Secession by a vote of the people of Virginia, the State entered into the following temporary convention with the Confederate States of America:

"1st. Until the union of said Commonwealth with said Confederacy shall be perfected, and said Commonwealth shall become a member of said Confederacy according to the Constitutions of both powers, the whole military force and military operations, offensive and defensive, of said Commonwealth, in the impending conflict with the United States, shall be under the chief control and direction of the President of said Confederate States, upon the same principles, basis and footing as if said Commonwealth were now, and during the interval, a member of said Confederacy.

"2nd. The Commonwealth of Virginia will, after the consummation of the union contemplated in this convention, and her adoption of the Constitution for a permanent Government of said Confederate States, and she shall become a member of said Confederacy, under said permanent constitution, if the same occur, turn over to said Confederate States all the public property, naval stores and munitions of war, etc., she may then be in possession of, acquired from the United States, on the same terms and in like manner as the other States of said Confederacy have done in like cases.

"3rd. Whatever expenditures of money, if any, said Commonwealth of Virginia shall make before the union under the Provisional Government, as above contemplated, shall be consummated, shall be met and provided for by said Confederate States.

"This Convention, entered into and agreed to, in the city of Richmond, Virginia, on the twenty-fourth day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, by Alexander H. Stephens, the duly authorized commissioner to act in the matter of the said Confederate States, and John Tyler, William Ballard Preston, Samuel McD. Moore, James P. Holcombe, James C. Bruce and Lewis E. Harvie, parties duly authorized to act in like manner for said Commonwealth of Virginia—the whole subject to the approval and ratification of the proper authorities of both governments respectively.

"In testimony whereof, the parties aforesaid have hereto set their hands and seals, the day and year aforesaid, and at the place aforesaid, in duplicate originals.

"JOHN TYLER, (SEAL)
"WILLIAM BALLARD PRESTON, (SEAL)
"SAMUEL MCD. MOORE, (SEAL)
"JAMES P. HOLCOMBE, (SEAL)
"JAMES C. BRUCE, (SEAL)
"LEWIS E. HARVIE, (SEAL)
"Committee of the Convention.

"ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, (SEAL)
"Commissioner for Confederate States."

On the day upon which the Convention adopted the Ordinance of Secession, it took steps to enable the government of Virginia to possess itself of the property of the Federal Government within its territorial jurisdiction; and Virginia accordingly reduced into her own possession the Norfolk and Gosport Navy Yards, with vessels, steam engines, machinery, tools, supplies and other property, valued at $2,497,130.92, and the old and new custom houses at Norfolk, valued at $207,000.00.

On the same day (April 17) the Commonwealth of Virginia, through said Convention, provided for a State Military force. This was done by the adoption of "An Ordinance to call the volunteers into the service of the State and for other purposes." On the 19th of April, the office of Major-General of the Military and Naval forces of the State was created. Three days later Governor Letcher nominated Robert E. Lee for this office, which was promptly confirmed by the Convention. April 27th, an Ordinance providing for Enlistment in the Provisional Army was adopted. It provided that all free, able-bodied men, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, might enlist, and the enlistment should be binding on minors, provided they be allowed four days to reconsider and retract their enlistment.

On the 29th of April, five Congressmen were elected to represent Virginia in the Provisional Congress of the Confederate States, about to assemble at Montgomery, Alabama. These were the Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, of Essex county; William C. Rives, of Albemarle county; the Hon. John W. Brockenbrough, of Rockbridge county; Walter R. Staples, of Montgomery county, and Judge Gideon D. Camden, of Harrison county.

By another Ordinance, adopted April 30th, the term of service of all volunteers called into service under the Ordinance of the 17th of April, 1861, was twelve months, unless sooner discharged.

On May 1, 1861, the Convention adopted an Ordinance absolving all citizens of Virginia from their allegiance to the United States.

On May 7, 1861, the representatives of Virginia in the Confederate Congress took their seats in that body, except said Camden, and a Resolution adopted by the Congress of the Provisional Government, ratified the terms of alliance entered into on the 24th of the preceding April, by and between Alexander H. Stephens, the Confederate Commissioner, and the Commissioners of Virginia, and the old Commonwealth was thus formally admitted into the Confederate States of America, May 7th, 1861.

> "A Brief Summary.—The Convention having adopted an Ordinance of Secession; forbidden the election in the State of representatives to the Federal Congress; effected an Alliance, offensive and defensive, between Virginia and the Confederate States; adopted the Constitution of the Provisional Government of said States; elected five members of the Confederate States Congress, four of whom hastened to take their seats; released all officers from the oaths they had taken to support the Constitution of the United States, and absolved all the people of Virginia from their allegiance to the United States; captured the property of the National Government at Harper's Ferry; took possession of the Norfolk and Gosport Navy Yards, with the property connected therewith; occupied the custom houses at Norfolk and Richmond; and made arrangements by which the State was formally admitted a member of the Confederate States,—the whole done before the time arrived for the people to vote for the ratification or rejection of the Ordinance of Secession,—the Convention adjourned until June 12th ensuing."

Pending the vote upon the question of ratifying the Ordinance of Secession, the loyal citizens left within the counties now constituting West Virginia asserted an earnest and patriotic endeaver to avoid the calamity incident to the adoption of this ordinance. After publication by the authorities at Richmond of its adoption, the citizens of the old state living within the present boundaries of West Virginia, instituted a movement to restore the practical governmental relations of Virginia to the United States.

The first convention called by the people of Northwestern Virginia, known as the May Convention, adjourned on the 15th day of May, 1861, after having provided for the meeting of a second convention in the event that the Ordinance of Secession should be ratified by the people on the 23rd day of May ensuing. This was done by means of a resolution, reported by the Committee on Federal Relations, adopted by the convention, as follows:

> "Resolved, That, in the event of the Ordinance of Secession being ratified by a vote, we recommend to the people of the Counties here represented, and all others disposed to co-operate with us, to appoint, on the 4th day of June, 1861, delegates to a General Convention, to meet on the 11th of that month, at such place as may be designated by the Committee hereinafter provided, to devise such measures and take such action as the safety and welfare of the people they represent may demand, each county to appoint a number of Representatives to said Convention equal to double the number to which it will be entitled in the next House of Delegates; and the Senators and Delegates to be elected on the 23rd inst., by the counties referred to, to the next General Assembly of Virginia, and who concur in the views of this Convention, to be entitled to seats in the Convention as members thereof."

The second convention of the people of Northwestern Virginia assembled on June 11, 1861. It adopted an ordinance for the reorganization of the State government of Virginia. This ordinance provided for the appointment of a governor and a lieutenant governor, and also for other State officers of Virginia, and declared that the members elected to the General Assembly of Virginia should meet in Wheeling and constitute the legislative department of the government; and all other necessary steps were taken to restore the government of Virginia to her proper place in the Union; in fact, the government of Virginia was duly restored in this convention. After transacting all the business necessary to this restoration, the convention adjourned to meet on the first Tuesday in August, 1861, in the city of Wheeling. On Tuesday, August 6, 1861, this convention, which adjourned on the 25th of June of the same year, re-assembled pursuant to its adjournment. At its second session this convention provided by ordinance for the formation of a New State out of the territory of Virginia now constituting West Virginia, and for the call of a convention, to which delegates should be elected, for the formation of a constitution for the new State. This election was duly held, and the delegates elected to such convention met, and framed a constitution. The convention assembled on the 26th of November, 1861, and, having finished its work, adjourned on February 18, 1862. A schedule was attached to this proposed constitution, providing for an election to take the sense of the people on the question of ratification. The election was held on April 3, and resulted in its ratification by the people. On May 13, 1862, the General Assembly of Virginia passed an act giving the assent of Virginia to the formation and erection of the proposed new State; and on April 20, 1863, a proclamation was made by the President of the United States, reciting the act of Congress approved on the 31st day of December, 1862, by which the State of West Virginia was declared to be one of the United States of America, and was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, upon the condition that certain changes should be duly made in the proposed constitution of that State; and then reciting that proof of a compliance with that condition had been submitted to him, he therefore declared in pursuance of the act of Congress, that the said act would take effect and be in force from and after sixty days from April 20, 1863; and accordingly on that day, June 20, 1863, West Virginia became one of the United States.

See "How West Virginia Was Made," pages 78 et seq., 317 et seq.

A condensed history of the formation of West Virginia appears in the case of Virginia v. West Virginia, 78 U. S. 39 (20 L. Ed. 67). There can be no question as to the validity of the acts of the Restored Government of Virginia which resulted in the formation of the State of West Virginia, as this is settled by the case just cited, and also because the new State was recognized as one of the States of the Union by all branches of the general government. The formation of the State of West Virginia was the result of the acts of the loyal government of Virginia—a government in harmony with the general government, and one performing all the acts of a government of a State in all its practical relations with the Federal government. The ninth section of the ordinance providing for the formation of the new State, contains the following as to the assumption by West Virginia of a part of the public debt of Virginia:

> "Said new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the monies paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State within the same period."
> Appendix to R., p. 122.

The Constitution of the new State, adopted in 1862, by a vote of the people, with reference to the said debt, provides as follows:

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof, by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

Shortly after the close of the late Civil War, Virginia brought suit against West Virginia to establish jurisdiction over the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley, claimed by the defendant as a part of her territory. This suit was not decided until March 6, 1871, when the demurrer filed to the bill was sustained and the bill dismissed.

Virginia v. West Virginia, 78 U. S. 39 (20 L. Ed. 67).

Therefore, it was not known until the decision of this case whether the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley were a part of Virginia or West Virginia; and hence no settlement could be made between the two States with reference to the public debt, on the basis of the ordinance of Virginia, above quoted, providing the method by which the settlement should be effected, until after this case was decided.

Virginia Sought No Adjustment with West Virginia of Any Part of the Public Debt as Alleged in Her Bill.

With reference to the efforts at settlement between the two states touching the public debt, the bill makes this averment:

> "After the year 1865, and prior to the year 1872, attempts were made at different times by the public authorities of both the Commonwealth of Virginia and the State of West Virginia, respectively, to ascertain their contributive proportions of the common liability resting upon them for the public debt of Virginia contracted prior to January 1st, 1861; but all such attempts proved ineffectual and vain, and no accounting or settling of any kind was ever had between the two States in regard to this debt."
>
> Record, p. 10.

The answer of the defendant to this paragraph of the bill appears in the record at pages 149-154. The facts in relation to this matter are as follows:

The first governor of West Virginia, the Hon. Arthur I. Boreman, in his first message to the first legislature of that state, in discussing the financial condition and prospects of the new state, said:

> "The constitution provides that this state shall assume an equitable proportion of the debt of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, but no settlement can be made at present, and when it is made our 'equitable proportion' cannot be much."

In his message, dated January 16, 1866, to the legislature of that year, Governor Boreman, after quoting section 8 of article 8 of the constitution of West Virginia, says that the execution of this provision of the constitution had theretofore been impracticable on account of the existence of the war, but now that the war is over and peace is restored, he recommended the appointment of commissioners on behalf of the state to meet a like commission from Virginia.

Prior to December, 1866, Virginia instituted a suit in equity against the State of West Virginia in this Honorable Court for a decision of the question whether or not the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson constituted a part of the State of West Virginia. This cause was not determined until the 6th day of March, 1871, on which day it was decided in favor of West Virginia. During pendency of this suit no adjustment of West Virginia's liability, as provided in the ordinance, could be made, because until the boundaries of West Virginia were definitely determined it could not possibly be known what (1) amount of money was spent within the boundaries as state expenditures, (2) what her just proportion of the expenses of the state government was, nor (3) the amount paid into the state treasury from her counties, as provided by the ordinance.

In his message to the legislature of 1867, Governor Boreman refers to his recommendation of the appointment of commissioners, made in last message, to meet commissioners from the State of Virginia, and states that it had not been done because the authorities of Virginia had made no provision for such settlement. He states that he was informed that the Honorable Alexander H. H. Stuart of Virginia, together with two others, had been appointed under a resolution adopted by the general assembly of Virginia; first, for the purpose of securing a reunion of the two states, or secondly, for the purpose of adjusting the public debt and for a fair division of the public property. On February 28 of the same year, the legislature of West Virginia by resolution declared that the people of that state were unalterably opposed to a reunion with the people of Virginia, but expressed the willingness of West Virginia to effect a prompt and equitable settlement between the two states, and directed the Governor as soon as the said suit in the Supreme Court of the United States relating to the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson had been disposed of, to appoint three commissioners on the part of West Virginia to treat with commissioners of Virginia upon the matter of adjusting the public debt as provided in the ordinance of 1861 and the constitution of West Virginia (W. Va. Compilation, vol. 1, pp. 444-6).

In January, 1868, the governor of West Virginia informed the legislature in his annual message, that the

> "Commissioners to treat with Virginia in regard to the public debt of that state, have not yet been appointed under the resolutions of that subject adopted by the > legislature, February 28, 1867. The resolutions prescribe that the suit brought by Virginia in the Supreme Court of the United States, to recover jurisdiction over the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, shall be finally disposed of before such appointment shall be made, which event has not yet transpired; and, if it had, there might still be a question whether such settlement should take place in the present condition of affairs in Virginia."

The "present condition of affairs in Virginia" referred to was doubtless that arising out of the anomalous situation caused by the refusal of Congress to admit representatives from Virginia, from December, 1865, until the state was re-admitted into the Union in 1870. Congress, it appears, refused to recognize as valid the legislature that assembled under the Alexandria constitution of Virginia. Later, the state was placed under military government; a new constitution was adopted in 1868, ratified by the people in July, 1869, and Virginia re-admitted into the Union January 26, 1870. No negotiations could properly or safely have been carried on with Virginia during this period of "reconstruction," even if the suit to recover Berkeley and Jefferson counties had not been pending.

Again, in his message in 1869 to the legislature of West Virginia, the Governor stated that commissioners had not been appointed by him up to that time, owing to the fact that the suit between the states was still pending. Virginia having, by an act approved February 18, 1870, provided for the appointment of three commissioners to treat with the authorities of West Virginia, the Governor of West Virginia, by communication dated February 24, 1870, advised the legislature of West Virginia of the passage of that act; and thereupon the legislature of West Virginia, March 1, 1870, appointed a joint committee of its two houses to confer with the Virginia commissioners and report to the legislature, providing, however, that such appointment of commissioners should not in any manner prejudice the rights of West Virginia involved in the suit then still pending in this Court respecting the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson. (W. Va. Comp., vol. 1, pp. 446-7.)

On March 3, 1870, the Governor of West Virginia was authorized by the legislature by joint resolution to appoint three resident citizens of the state, to treat with the authorities of Virginia upon the subject of the public debt of that state, but it was provided that nothing in that action was to be construed as impairing the jurisdiction of West Virginia over the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson. (W. Va. Comp., vol. 1, pp. 447-8.) As the resolution was passed on the last day of the session, and as there was omission to make appropriation of money to carry out its provisions, the Governor of West Virginia, in his message of 1871, stated that no appointment had been made, owing to the lack of funds to pay the compensation and expenses of such commission.

Pending the efforts thus being made on the part of West Virginia, the general assembly of Virginia, through the Governor of that state, tendered to West Virginia a proposition for an arbitration of the question relating to the debt, the arbitrators not to be citizens of either state, each state to appoint two, and an umpire to be chosen by the arbitrators if deemed necessary. This proposal was submitted to the legislature of West Virginia on February 17, 1871; but on the 15th, two days prior to the communication of this action of Virginia, the legislature of West Virginia had passed a joint resolution, authorizing the Governor to appoint three disinterested citizens of the state to treat with the authorities of Virginia upon the subject of the adjustment of the public debt of that state existing prior to January 1, 1861, to report on various matters relating to the creation of the debt, upon the investments held by the state of Virginia, and, providing, among other things, compensation for the commissioners and for the employment of an accountant or clerk. (W. Va. Comp., vol 1, pp. 448-9.)

The proposal of Virginia relating to arbitration was referred by the legislature of West Virginia to a joint special committee of the two houses, which committee reported a preamble and joint resolution, rejecting the tender of arbitration because the adjustment of the debt should be subject to the ratification of the legislature of the two states, and because citizen commissioners from the two states would be necessarily more familiar with the circumstances attending the creation of the said debt and other questions connected therewith. This joint resolution also invited Virginia to appoint three disinterested citizens of that state as commissioners, with authority to treat with the commissioners theretofore authorized upon the part of West Virginia; but it was provided that their report should be subject to the approval and ratification of the legislature of the State of West Virginia and the general assembly of the commonwealth of Virginia. The Governor of West Virginia was directed by said resolution to communicate to the Governor of Virginia, without delay, certified copies of the preamble and resolution. (W. Va. Comp., vol. 1, pp. 449-54.) Accordingly, the Governor of West Virginia appointed three commissioners for the purpose aforesaid. This commission is known as the "West Virginia Debt Commission of 1871." After their appointment they proceeded to Richmond, where all the evidences of the receipt and expenditure of the money were kept, and there spent some time in the examination of such documents as were accessible. Realizing the necessity for further and more accurate information than they could obtain unassisted, they addressed a communication to the second auditor of Virginia, soliciting specifically the necessary information. To this request the second auditor made a reply, in which he declined to furnish the information desired, a copy of which reply is filed as "Exhibit No. 2" of defendant's answer (R., p. 166).

Soon after their appointment the commission addressed a letter to the Governor of Virginia, notifying him of their appointment, their organization, and the duties put upon them, and requesting him to indicate at his earliest convenience what "channel of communication will be open to us." Nearly a month later they received from the Governor of Virginia a copy of a letter from him to the Governor of West Virginia, declining to recognize the West Virginia commissioners (W. Va. Comp., vol. 1, pp. 457-9). A few weeks later, in his message to the legislature, the Governor of Virginia "proceeds," to quote the language of the West Virginia Debt Commission, "to asperse the good faith of the State of West Virginia" (W. Va. Comp., vol. 1, p. 463). Having failed in their effort to obtain either the recognition or the co-operation of the Governor or the second auditor of Virginia, the commission left Richmond, because, as they say in their report, "further stay was not likely to add to the scant information already gleaned by them from the public documents" (W. Va. Comp., vol. 1, p. 462).

The failure and refusal of Virginia to recognize, receive, or co-operate with the commissioners placed them at a great disadvantage, and they therefore obtained only such facts and figures as enabled them to make an imperfect report to the Governor of West Virginia with reference to the matters with which they were charged; and because of the incompleteness and inaccuracy of their report, and because it appeared therefrom, that in making their invetsigations they wholly disregarded the provisions of the ordinance of the Wheeling convention adopted August 20, 1861, and did not follow the method of settlement therein prescribed, their report was not adopted by the legislature of West Virginia. In 1873, the senate of West Virginia made an investigation of the subject of the debt, through its finance committee, of which J. M. Bennett, who was for eight years auditor of the old state of Virginia, and whose time expired when the city of Richmond was evacuated in 1865, was chairman. This committee made a report on December 22, 1873, from which it appeared that West Virginia upon a settlement with Virginia, based on the provisions of section nine of the ordinance, did not owe to Virginia anything whatever, but that, on the contrary, Virginia was indebted to West Virginia on account of said debt on January 1, 1861, in the sum of $512,000, not including interest. A copy of this report is printed in the record at page 166, as Exhibit 3 of defendant's answer.

A few weeks after the West Virginia Debt Commission of 1871 retired from Richmond after their fruitless endeavors there for recognition and co-operation, and after the Governor of Virginia had, in his message to the general assembly, questioned the good faith of West Virginia, Virginia passed her first funding act, that of 1871, in which she assumed two-thirds of the amount of the debt as her full share, and, in violation and repudiation of section nine of the ordinance of August 20, 1861, arbitrarily set aside the other one-third as West Virginia's portion. This is the more remarkable when it is remembered that she refers to and quotes from said section nine of the ordinance in the preamble of this act (R., p. 18). And to the same effect were the funding acts of 1879, 1882, and 1892. The joint resolution of the general assembly of Virginia, approved March 6, 1894, to provide for adjusting the portion of the debt to be borne by West Virginia, and creating the Virginia Debt Commission, provides (R., p. 49):

> "But said commission shall in no event enter into any negotiation hereunder except upon the basis that Virginia is bound only for the two-thirds of the debt of the original state which she has already provided for as her equitable proportion thereof."

And the act of the general assembly of Virginia, approved March 6, 1900, is to the same effect, namely, that Virginia is liable for two-thirds only of the debt as her part thereof, which she has already provided for.

West Virginia, since the passage of the funding act of 1871—certainly since the adoption of the joint resolution of 1894,—could enter upon negotiations with Virginia upon no other basis. West Virginia must agree, as a preliminary to any such negotiations with Virginia, that Virginia was liable for two-thirds only of the debt, that this was her "equitable proportion," and that she has settled that. And what besides would it be held that West Virginia recognized or admitted or agreed to had she entered into negotiations with Virginia on such basis? This, that she had recognized that she was liable for the other third as her "equitable proportion"; for, it would be reasoned, that since it takes three thirds to make a whole, and as Virginia was liable for two-thirds only, West Virgina must be liable for the other third. It is and was not reasonable to ask that West Virginia should place herself in such a position, especially as it would have set aside the agreement West Virginia made with reference to her portion of the debt and the method of ascertaining the same contained in section nine of the ordinance.

West Virginia has never receded from the said provisions of the ordinance with reference to the settlement of her just proportion of the public debt of Virginia, but has uniformly adhered thereto throughout her history as a state. The resolutions adopted by her legislature in recent years, in which she declared that she did not owe the state of Virginia anything on account of said debt, and would not negotiate with her concerning the same, were based upon the said report of the finance committee of 1873, upon Virginia's persistent refusal to recognize the basis of settlement provided for in said ordinance, and upon the conditions of negotiations dictated by Virginia in her said joint resolution of 1894 and said act of 1900.

After the said proposition of Virginia, made in 1871, to select arbitrators, which was declined by West Virginia, as hereinbefore stated, Virginia at no time signified her desire to settle with West Virginia the matters relating to West Virginia's proportion of said public debt, until after the adoption of said joint resolution approved March 6, 1894, whereby she had compromised and settled with her creditors and been released from all liability, which resolution provided that the commission thereby created should not proceed with negotiations with West Virginia until assurances should be received from the holders of a majority in amount of the certificates issued by Virginia under her funding acts, hereinbefore referred to, that they desired the commission to undertake such negotiations and would accept the amount so ascertained to be paid by West Virginia in full settlement of the one-third of the debt of the original state which had not been assumed by Virginia; and also that in no event should said commission enter into negotiations except upon the basis that Virginia was bound only for the two-thirds of the debt of the original state and which she had already provided for as her equitable proportion thereof. Under this resolution no negotiations were proposed to West Virginia until the year 1895, and then only upon the conditions prescribed in said joint resolution of 1894, which has never yet been repealed or modified in this respect. Negotiations were again offered by Virginia in 1906, but upon the same condition, that is, that West Virginia should enter upon such negotiations with the admission on her part that Virginia should be liable for two-thirds only of the debt, which was again declined by West Virginia.

It will be clearly seen, therefore, that the allegations in the bill that "attempts were made at different times by the public authorities of both the commonwealth of Virginia and the State of West Virginia, respectively, to ascertain their contributive proportion of the common liability," is not supported to the extent and effect sought to be shown by the bill filed in this case.

It is averred in the bill that it was soon apparent that Virginia had by the act of March 6, 1871, assumed a heavier burden than she was able to bear, and other plans for the settlement of the debt were attempted to be made by the action of the General Assembly on March 28, 1879, and February 14, 1882, until at length, it is alleged, that a final and satisfactory settlement of the portion of the debt of the original state which Virginia should assume and pay was definitely concluded by the Act of February 20, 1892. See R., pp. 21-47. Virginia files with her bill copies of each of these Acts of her General Assembly as exhibits Nos. 2, 3 and 4. It is also shown by the bill that Virginia by her Act of March 30, 1871, sought to fix her liability upon the basis of two-thirds of the original debt, and it is alleged that this was the intention of that act.

All Questions Arising Upon the Record of this Case Are Still Open for the Consideration and Decision of the Court.

Before entering upon the further consideration of the case, the attention of the Court is respectfully called to its former decision rendered upon the demurrer filed to the bill in this cause, appearing in 206 U. S. 290-322, the third point of the syllabus reading as follows:

> "The question whether the Commonwealth of Virginia has been released from all liability on account of the public debt evidenced by bonds of the state outstanding on January 1, 1861, will not be passed upon on a demurrer to a bill filed by that state against the State of West Virginia which seeks an adjudication of the amount due the former by the latter as the equitable proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia which was assumed by West Virginia at the time of its creation as a state, but the consideration of such question will be postponed until the final hearing."

Again, in this case, reported in 209 U. S. 514-537, in the opinion of the Court referring this cause to a Master, specifying the matters as to which the Master should report, the Court uses the following language:

> "The answers to these inquiries to be without prejudice to any question in the cause."

Inasmuch as the question of the release of Virginia by her creditors from all liability to her on account of the debt in question, and her lack of interest to prosecute this suit so far as it relates to the settlement of said debt, or the ascertainment of the just proportion thereof payable by West Virginia, is still open for consideration, these matters may, therefore, be properly argued on the hearing of the cause at this time, as well as all other questions that properly arise in the cause.

The Bill Sets Up Four Distinct and Independent Grounds in Respect to Each of Which Virginia Seeks Relief.

To intelligently argue this case, it is necessary to know just what Virginia seeks to recover by her bill. An examination of it discloses four distinct and independent grounds upon which she asks adjudication, and in respect to each of which she seeks a recovery against West Virginia.

The first of these grounds is that which relates to the part of the public debt held by third persons which Virginia alleges West Virginia should be required to assume and pay, and which Virginia has not paid and declines to pay, for the very substantial reason, as shown by her bill and its exhibits, that from its payment she has been exonerated by the acts and consent of her creditors, the holders thereof, and as to which she avers that she sues in trust for the benefit of those creditors or holders of said unpaid part of said debt who may be entitled thereto.

The second of these grounds is that which relates to the part of the said debt not held by third persons but which Virginia avers she holds in her Literary and Sinking funds, of which she herself, as she contends, is the owner, and as to which she sues in her own right and not as trustee.

The third ground is predicated upon the allegation that Virginia has paid off or retired of principal and interest of said debt a sum considerably in excess of $25,000,000, which she owns in her own right, and on account of which she avers that she has "a just claim against West Virginia for contribution to the extent of West Virginia's equitable liability therefor." This claim she asserts in her own right.

The fourth and last ground in respect to which she asks a decree against West Virginia is based upon certain property which she avers was transferred to and became the property of West Virginia, under two acts of the legislature of Virginia passed respectively on the 3rd and 4th days of February, 1863, amounting, in the aggregate, as alleged in the bill, to several millions of dollars, the exact amount of which it is alleged the plaintiff is unable to state. This claim is also asserted by Virginia in her own right.

These four several phases of the bill will be presented and considered in the order we have here respectively designated.

Questions Arising Upon the Record for the Consideration and Decision of the Court.

First. Virginia has no interest in this suit, so far as it seeks to ascertain West Virginia's proportion of said debt, Virginia suing therefor in her alleged capacity as trustee; because no liability now attaches to Virginia in respect thereto, as Virginia has been released therefrom by the concurrent acts of herself and her creditors.

Second. Inasmuch as the bonds held by Virginia through the agency of her Literary and Sinking funds do not constitute any part of the debt within the meaning and contemplation of the ordinance of 1861, or the provision of the constitution of West Virginia adopted in 1862, Virginia cannot maintain this suit as to this phase of the bill; for the very cogent reason that these bonds are assets belonging to Virginia herself, and do not constitute a debt in any sense of the term.

Third. To authorize a suit for contribution, where the principle of this doctrine is applicable, it is absolutely essential that the party seeking contribution shall have paid more than his just share of a common debt. The very contrary appears from exhibit 3 filed with plaintiff's bill (R. pp. 26-38) and made a part thereof. From the bill and this exhibit it appears that every dollar which Virginia ever paid on account of said debt was actually applied in reduction of that part of the debt which she herself assumed, and that no part thereof was ever applied upon the unfunded part which Virginia contends should be assumed and paid by West Virginia; and, inasmuch as West Virginia has not received any benefit whatever of any sum paid by Virginia, she is not liable to the plaintiff for contribution. It is clear, therefore, that Virginia can not maintain the bill as to this phase of the cause, predicated upon her alleged right of contribution.

Fourth. The plaintiff produced no proof of the value of the property embodied in the claim of Virginia against West Virginia, for property transferred by the former to and received by the latter by the act of February 3, 1863 (App. to R., p. 128) In the printed record the only evidence of this value is that furnished by West Virginia. West Virginia admitted that the value of the bank stocks received by her was $186,630.00. The Special Master found that the value of the other property so received by West Virginia was $73,578.00 (Report, pp. 181-193). Hence, if Virginia can maintain this suit as to this feature of her bill, she could recover only the sum of $260,208.00.

Fifth. But Virginia has blended in this suit, with the claim which she asserts in her representative capacity as trustee, various other claims which she asserts in her own right, thus clearly creating a multifarious demand, which cannot be asserted in one and the same cause, unless the court shall be constrained for convenience' sake to treat those demands which she asserts in her own right as mere matter of surplusage and not entitling her to any relief on account thereof.

Sixth. Treating then the claims which Virginia asserts in her own right as not proper subjects for relief but as surplusage, Virginia has no claim whatever, as shown by the bill and its exhibits, which she can sustain in this cause; and therefore the whole bill must be dismissed.

The propositions which we have here presented, and which clearly arise upon the record in this cause, will be discussed in the order named; and in our argument we will consider the various acts of legislation adopted by the State of Virginia which ultimately resulted in her release from any and all liability regarding the unfunded part of the Virginia debt created before and existing on January 1, 1861. It is clear that this is the date from which we must reckon, because this date is fixed by the ordinance of Virginia herself in section 9 thereof (R. p. 146), and the constitution of West Virginia adopted in 1862 (R. p. 147), and to the provisions whereof Virginia gave assent and therefore accepted as the condition of her assent to the formation out of her territory of the new state (R. p. 165).

Virginia Has no Interest in this Suit so far as it Seeks to Ascertain West Virginia's Proportion of Said Debt.

Virginia has no interest in this suit so far as it seeks to ascertain West Virginia's proportion of the debt, because any part of the debt which West Virginia may have assumed by reason of the ordinance or her constitution was direct to the creditors and not to Virginia; and because no liability now attaches to Virginia in respect thereto, as Virginia has been released therefrom by the concurrent acts of herself and the creditors.

Following in consecutive order the propositions arising on the record, we necessarily begin with the consideration of the Wheeling Ordinance and the first Constitution adopted by the State of West Virginia.

Any assumption of any part of the public debt that West Virginia may have taken upon herself by reason of the Wheeling Ordinance of August 20, 1861, or by reason of the West Virginia constitution of 1862, was to the creditors and not to the Commonwealth of Virginia. Both the terms of the Ordinance and of the Constitution relating thereto are clear and distinct, and show that West Virginia did not assume to pay any part of the public debt to Virginia. That part of said Ordinance relating thereto is as follows:

> "Sec. 9. The new state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all state expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government, since any part of said debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new state during the same period." * * * *

"Sec. 10. When the general assembly shall give its consent to the formation of such new state, it shall forward to the congress of the United States such consent, together with an official copy of such constitution, with the request that the said new state may be admitted in the union of states." App. to R., p. 122.

That part of the West Virginia Constitution referred to in section 10 of said Ordinance is as follows:

"Sec. 8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof, by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years." App. to R., p. 125.

From the foregoing it clearly appears, therefore, that the Commonwealth of Virginia had full knowledge that any assumption West Virginia made of any part of the public debt was to the creditors and not to the Commonwealth of Virginia. The terms of said Ordinance and the provisions of the West Virginia Constitution were known to Virginia. Section 3 of the act of the General Assembly of Virginia passed May 13, 1862, required the Governor of Virginia to transmit to the senators and representatives of Virginia in Congress, said act of the General Assembly and a "certified original of the said Constitution and schedule." App. to R., p. 126.

That the assumption was to the creditors, and not to Virginia, is evident not only from the words of the Ordinance and the Constitution, but also from the condition of the times. The people of Virginia inhabiting that part which became West Virginia were loyal to the Union; they adhered to and were under the jurisdiction of a government which was in a state of war with the government to which what is now the State of Virginia adhered and was loyal. The two states of Virginia and West Virginia were in armed conflict. Virginia had "suspended," or postponed until after the end of the war, her obligations to those citizens, including those of West Virginia, who adhered to the Union. She "repudiated" that part of her debt, and the interest thereon, held by citizens loyal to the Union. She held up the property of the citizens of West Virginia who adhered to the Federal government. The Ordinance and the Constitution were framed under these conditions—in a time of war; when it was impossible to forecast the result of that war; when no victory had favored the Union cause, but when the victories favored the cause of the Southern Confederacy; indeed, when the chances favored the success of the Confederacy, and the creation of another nation in the territory of the Federal government seemed probable. It would be most unreasonable to suppose that West Virginia would, under such conditions, agree to pay money over to Virginia for the benefit of West Virginia's own citizens who were at that time the creditors of Virginia. It would be most reasonable that West Virginia would look to the interests of her own citizens, and that any money she should pay would be paid so as to protect their interests. And this is what she did do. And hence she agreed to take upon herself or assume a just or equitable proportion of the debt; but provided that this proportion should be ascertained by her own legislature. There is nothing in the compact that she would consult Virginia either as to the portion she would pay or as to the persons to whom she would pay it. To this agreement and compact Virginia assented. Upon this agreement and compact, Virginia assenting, West Virginia was admitted into the Union. It is fundamental that, while courts can enforce agreements between parties, they cannot make agreements for parties; they can only enforce the agreements the parties have made.

The lawfully Restored Government of Virginia, when she framed the ordinance for the creation of the new state (R., p. 6), and when she gave consent for the admission of West Virginia into the Union, did not contemplate that any part of the public debt should be paid by West Virginia to the mother state; nor would Congress, under the conditions then existing, have given its consent to the admission of West Virginia if it had been understood that the said ordinance and the constitution provided that the share of the public debt which West Virginia would pay was to be paid to the old state. It was the understanding of the Restored Government of Virginia, of the framers of the constitution of West Virginia, and of Congress, that payment would be made direct to the creditors of Virginia, and not to the state of Virginia. The circumstances attending the passage of the act of Congress admitting West Virginia into the Union clearly indicate this. In support of this proposition, we quote from Exhibit No. 8 of plaintiff's bill the following excerpt:

> "A brief extract from the debates, when the bill providing for the admission of West Virginia was under consideration, will serve my purpose tonight:
>
> "MR. OLIN: 'I desire to ask what will become of the bonds and other obligations which Virginia has issued or incurred by the recognition of a new state?'
>
> "MR. HUTCHINS: 'I will answer my friend from New York. Here is the provision of the constitution of West Virginia in reference to that matter: An equitable portion of the debt of Virginia prior to January the first, 1861, shall be assumed by this state, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable.'"
>
> "MR. CRITTENDEN: 'There is another question; the State of Virginia owes a large debt. How is this debt to be divided?'"
>
> "MR. BLAIR: 'The constitution framed by the convention of the people of the proposed new state binds the new state to pay its just proportion of the debt owed by Virginia prior to the ordinance of secession.'"
>
> "MR. CRITTENDEN: 'I only knew that in this bill there was no provision made for a division of the said debt. The gentlemen tells us there is a provision made for it in the constitution, and I am satisfied with that. As it has been attended to, I have no more to say about it.'" (Record, pp. 80, 81.)

For the original of the above quotations from the debates in Congress, see pp. 45-47 of Congressional Globe, Part I., 3d sess. 37th Cong. 1862-63.

From that debate we add the following quotation from the speech of Representative Edwards (p. 47):

> "But it is said, further, that there may be some difficulty about the public debt of Virginia. Well, sir, if Virginia remains in rebellion, if she succeeds, in conjunction with others of the southern states, in establishing the independence of the southern confederacy, where then, I ask, will the creditors of that state, many of them living in the northern states, go for the collection of their debts? What is the market value of the securities of the state now under the circumstances of her rebellion? Sir, if I had bonds of that state in my possession, I should consider them worth far more with the new state of Western Virginia in the Union as a free state, with her industrious population, she having provided in her constitution to assume her just proportion of all the debts of the state, than if the old state remained entire and wasting the resources of both its eastern and western portions in supporting the rebellion."

It seems clear that the solicitude of Congress related to the holders of the debt, and it was believed by them that these creditors would have the right to look to the new state for payment to them of the just and equitable proportion of the debt she had assumed. The question asked by Mr. Crittenden, and his comment on the reply to it, and the remarks of Mr. Edwards, and, indeed, the whole course of the debate, so far as it touched the debt question, go to show that it was contemplated by all the parties that payment would be made to the creditors and not to the State of Virginia. There is no reason to believe that it was the intention of either the Restored Government of Virginia, or of Congress, that West Virginia was to assume a just or equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia and then turn the same over to the old State of Virginia, the greater part of whose territory was then in rebellion against the Federal Government and held by armies in hostility to that government. Why would the Federal Government, under such circumstances, concern itself about the fiscal affairs of the rebellious government of Virginia? There was every reason, however, why Congress should concern itself about the interest of the loyal creditors of Virginia; and the same sentiment which prompted Congress to have solicitude for the interest of such creditors, would also prompt the loyal Restored Government of Virginia concerning them. At that date there could be no negotiations between West Virginia and the old state; nor could it be told with any certainty how soon in the future there could be such negotiations between them, because the result of the war was at that time very uncertain, and no one could tell either what the result of the war would be nor how long it would continue, nor what would be the conditions after its close. The language of the ordinance and of the constitution of West Virginia is that West Virginia should assume or take upon herself and pay a just or an equitable proportion of the debt. But, very significantly, neither instrument declares it should be paid to Virginia. If the intention had been to pay it to Virginia, then it would seem a reasonable assumption that it could not be paid to Virginia until the amount was ascertained by negotiations between the two states. In other words, if it was the contemplation that whatever West Virginia was liable for was a liability to Virginia, then it would follow that Virginia should have something to say about the amount thereof. But the constitution of West Virginia distinctly provided that the legislature of West Virginia alone should ascertain the amount; and this was agreed to by both the Restored Government of Virginia and the Congress of the United States, the former in giving its consent to the formation of the new state, and the latter by its act admitting West Virginia into the Union.

This is the view taken by the Supreme Court of Appeals of the Commonwealth of Virginia, in the case of Higginbotham v. Commonwealth, 25 Gratt. 627, decided in 1874, and cited by Virginia in her brief in this cause. It was upon this principle of a direct liability from West Virginia to the creditors, that Virginia based her first act of March 30, 1871 (R., p. 17), whereby she funded a large amount of the public debt upon the basis of two-thirds to herself and one-third to West Virginia. It was upon this principle that she passed the acts of March 28, 1879 (R., pp. 21-26), and of February 14, 1882 (R., pp. 26-38), and of February 26, 1892 (R., pp. 38-47). It was upon this principle that Virginia adopted her joint resolution approved March 6, 1894 (R., p. 49). It was upon this principle that Virginia passed the act of March 6, 1900 (R., p. 50). It was upon this principle of construction that Virginia waived, in said funding acts of 1871, 1882 and 1892, the clause in her constitution of 1869, which provided that such part of the public debt as should be assumed by West Virginia should be applied to the discharge of said debt. It was also upon this principle of construction that Virginia superseded section 19 of article 10 of her constitution of 1869 by her constitution of 1902, in the latter of which she impliedly remits the holders of the unfunded part of her debt to the State of West Virginia for the direct payment thereof.

We next take up in consecutive order the consideration of those acts whereby Virginia was ultimately released from all liability as to that part of the state debt which she has assumed to be her just portion thereof. The first of which is the which had for its express object the funding of said debt and the fixing, upon her own basis, of Virginia's proportion thereof, and remitting her creditors to West Virginia for the payment of the residue. This act, which is filed as exhibit number 1 with plaintiff's bill (R. p. 17), contains the following recital:

> "Whereas in the formation of the State of West Virginia there were included within its boundaries about one-third of the territory and population of the State of Virginia; and whereas, in the Ordinance authorizing the organization of said state, it was provided that the said state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, which provision has not yet been fulfilled, although repeated and earnest efforts in that behalf have been made by this state, and will continue to be made as long as may be necessary; and whereas the people of this commonwealth are anxious for the prompt liquidation of her portion of said debt, which is estimated to be two-thirds of the same; and whereas it has been suggested that the authorities of West Virginia may prefer to pay that state's portion of said debt to the holders thereof and not to this state, as the constitution of this state provides; now, therefore, to enable the State of West Virginia to settle her proportion of said debt with the holders thereof, and to prevent any complications or difficulties which might be interposed to any other matter of settlement, and for the purpose of promptly restoring the credit of Virginia by providing for the prompt and certain payment of the interest upon her proportion of said debt as the same shall become due; therefore,

"1. Be it enacted," etc. (R., p. 18.)

The act then provides:

"That from and after its passage * * * no bond, certificate or other evidence of indebtedness shall be issued for any portion of the debt of this state; nor shall any interest be paid upon any part or portion of said debt except as hereinafter provided." (R. p. 18.)

The act then provides for the funding of the two-thirds of the debt, with its accrued and unpaid interest to the first day of July, 1871, to bear interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, to be due and payable in thirty-four years from date, redeemable at the pleasure of the state, the bonds to be made payable to order or bearer, the coupons to be paid semi-annually and receivable for taxes and other debts due the state (R. 18). The third section of the act provides for the surrender of the old and the acceptance of the new bonds for two-thirds of the amount of said debt, and the issuance of a certificate, bearing the same date as the new bond, for the other one-third of the debt, "and that payment of said amount, with interest thereon at the rate prescribed in the bond surrendered, will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be made between the states of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the state of Virginia existing at the time of its dismemberment, and that the state of Virginia holds said bonds, so far as unfunded, in trust for the holder or his assignees. * * * The remaining one-third of unpaid interest, both on the bonds and certificates, shall be payable in money, and the principal of said certificates in new sterling bonds of the same character as the old, in accordance with such final settlement as shall be made with West Virginia." (R. p. 19.)

Section 4 of this act provides:

> "The treasurer, by proper endorsement, written or stamped, upon each bond, certificate of stock or interest certificate so surrendered and delivered to him, shall cancel the same, and endorse thereon the date of such cancellation, and shall preserve the same in his office until otherwise directed by law." (R. p. 20.)

An examination of this act discloses that provision is made only for the payment of the new bonds funded under this act and the interest accruing thereon. By this act Virginia signifies to her creditors that she will pay no bond or any part of said debt except the two-thirds thereof provided for in this act, nor any interest thereon except upon the bonds issued by her to cover said two-thirds.

The provisions of this act were accepted by a large number of her creditors, as shown by the number of certificates issued under it, which amounted on January 23, 1905, to $10,639,776.42 (R. p. 55.)

The acceptance of the provision of this act by the creditors constituted between them and Virginia a lawful contract, as declared by this court in Hartman v. Greenhow, 102 U. S. 672 (26 L. Ed. 271). The consideration of this valid contract was based upon the negotiability and receivability of the coupons for taxes and other dues owing to the state, written on their face, and the conditional promise of Virginia to pay the unfunded part of said debt. This act did leave a conditional liability upon Virginia to pay or provide for the payment of the unfunded debt of the Commonwealth represented by certificates issued by her, from which she could not relieve herself without the assent of her creditors; but Virginia was relieved from this conditional liability by the consent of the creditors, and the subsequent acts of the Commonwealth relating to the debt, and hereinafter cited.

Act of 1879.

To obtain a reduction of the rate of interest upon the two-thirds of said debt assumed by Virginia, this act (1879) was passed, the recital in such act declaring that,

> "The council of foreign bondholders of London, England, and the funding association of the United States of America, limited, have, in view of this belief expressed their willingness to jointly endeavor to obtain the consent of the creditors to an abatement in the rate of interest." (R., p. 21.)

The act, to effectuate its purpose, divides the outstanding indebtedness of the state into two classes, as follows:

> "Class I., which shall be taken to include all tax-receivable coupon bonds, and all registered bonds and fractional certificates which are convertible under the act approved March thirtieth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, into such tax-receivable coupon bonds
>
> "Class II., which shall be taken to include all bonds funded under the act approved March thirtieth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, as amended by the act approved March seventh, eighteen hundred and seventy-two; and also two-thirds of the face value, with two-thirds of the unpaid accrued interest up to the first of July, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, on all unfunded bonds, including sterling bonds." (R., p. 22.)

It will be seen that this act deals with the entire debt, both that funded under the act of 1871 and that not so funded, and of that so unfunded this new act provides for the funding of two-thirds of it at its face value with two-thirds of its unpaid accrued interest.

The act is made effectual upon the following condition, provided in the act as part of section 5 thereof:

> "If on or before the first day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy-nine, the council of foreign bondholders and the funding association of the United States of America aforesaid, shall file with the governor their assent to and acceptance of the terms of this act, the same shall be taken to be a contract between the state and the said corporations, and the governor shall forthwith provide for the preparation of the bonds provided for by this act." (R., p. 23.)

The act also provides for the funding of the entire debt, on the basis of two-thirds thereof assumed by Virginia, and gives, in effect, an indefinite period for such purpose (R., p. 23.)

Provision is made by section 6 of this act for the cancellation of the bonds surrendered under it (R., pp. 23, 24), and section 7 thereof provides as follows:

> "The owners of all classes of bonds mentioned in this act, who shall exchange their securities for the bonds created under this act and who shall not have yet received certificates representing the remaining one third of their principal and interest, due and payable by the state of West Virginia, shall receive certificates of a like character to those issued under the act of March thirtieth, eighteen hundred and seventy one, when they make such exchange; and the state of Virginia will negotiate or aid the creditors holding all of such certificates issued under this act, or previous acts, in negotiating with the state of West Virginia for an amicable settlement of the claims of such creditors against the state of West Virginia. The acceptance of the said certificates for West Virginia's one-third, issued under this act, shall be taken and held as a full and absolute release of the state of Virginia from all liability on account of said certificates." (R., p. 24.)

The act provides in section 8 thereof for the payment of interest on the bonds issued thereunder (R., p. 24). The act also provides for a sinking fund to pay the principal of the bonds (section 9; R., pp. 24, 25). It repeals all acts inconsistent with it, and therefore repeals the act of 1871 and the acts amendatory thereof. The rate of interest under the act of 1871 was six per cent per annum (R., p. 18); while under this act the annual rate was three per cent for ten years, four per cent for twenty years, and five per cent for ten years (R., pp. 21, 22).

Act of 1882.

The following is the title of the act of 1882:

> "An act to ascertain and declare Virginia's equitable share of the debt created before and actually existing at the time of the partition of her territory and resources, and to provide for the issuance of bonds covering the same, and the regular and prompt payment of interest thereon." (R., p. 26.)

To this act there is this preamble:

"Whereas to the end which this act comprehends, a full statement of the debt is essential; and whereas the following has been carefully made up from the records of the second auditor's office of the state, it is confidently submitted as presenting a true state of the account between the state and her creditors—the account is as follows." (R. p. 26.)

Then follows a full statement of the account of the debt as between Virginia and the holders thereof.

On January 1, 1861, there were three classes of this debt:

Sterling, bearing 5 per cent interest	$ 1,973,000.00
Dollar, bearing 6 per cent interest	29,533,582.90
Guaranteed, bearing 6 per cent interest	294,130.00
Total	$31,800,612.90

Interest on this debt:

Past due and uncalled for	$101,023.63
Maturing at this date, January 1, 1861	944,156.38
Total	$1,045,180.01

Then follows a statement of the debt as of July 1, 1863, amounting to $33,141,212.12. This is followed by a statement of accrued interest to July 1, 1863, amounting to $5,954,716.08. Of this total principal as of July 1, 1863, Virginia assumes two-thirds as her "equitable portion," which is $22.094,141.96. Of this total amount of interest Virginia assumes two-thirds, which is $3,969,810.72; an aggregate of principal and interest of $26,063,952.38.

Virginia continues this statement in detail to July 1, 1882, crediting herself and charging to her creditors all payments made by her on account of said debt from January 1, 1861, to July 1, 1882, making an aggregate balance of $21,035,377.15, principal and interest, and inclusive of $1,428,245.25 held by the literary fund of the state and $602,016.90 as interest on such fund (R., pp. 27-32). This total sum of $21,035,377.15 represents two-thirds of the debt, principal and interest, as of July 1, 1882, after deducting everything ever paid by Virginia on account of said debt during the period between January 1, 1861, and July 1, 1882—a period of twenty-one and one-half years.

The act then continues with an extended recital classifying this debt, stating her intention to provide a uniform rate of interest, treating the said sum of $21,035,377.15 as,

> "the amount of Virginia's equitable share of the debt of the old and entire state, as the same is ascertained and now formally declared by the foregoing account" (R., pp. 33, 34).

Then follows sections 1, 2, 3 and 4 of the act, authorizing the issuance of new bonds for said debt, prescribing the form of the bond, fixing therein the rate of interest at three per cent per annum, and the form of the coupon to accompany the bond (R., pp. 34, 35). Section 5 of the act prescribes the denomination of the bonds to be issued in exchange for the outstanding indebtedness of the state as enumerated in the act for "her equitable share" (which the act fixes as we have seen at two-thirds of the original debt after deducting therefrom all money paid by her on account thereof) of each class as shown in the recital to the act (R., p. 33), extending from A to F inclusive. For her equitable share of class A she refunds at 53 per cent; class B at 60 per cent; class C at 69 per cent; class D at 80 per cent; class E at 69 per cent; class F at 63 per cent. (R., pp. 35, 36.)

Section 6 of this act of 1882 provides as follows:

> "For all balance of such indebtedness, constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt, principal and interest, in the settlement of Virginia's equitable share as aforesaid, the said board of sinking fund commissioners shall issue a certificate as follows:
>
> "No.------
>
> "The commonwealth of Virginia has this day discharged her equitable share of the (registered or coupon, as the case may be) bond for -------- dollars, held by --------, dated the -------- day of ---------- and numbered ------, to be accounted for by the State of West Virginia, without recourse upon this commonwealth.

"Done at the capitol of the State of Virginia, this ------ day of ----------, eighteen ----------
----------, Second Auditor.
----------, Treasurer."

It is prescribed in section 8 of this act:

> "All the bonds and certificates of debt and evidences of past due and unpaid interest taken in under the provisions of this act, shall be canceled by the treasurer in the presence of the board of commissioners of the sinking fund as the same are required, and by the treasurer the same shall be carefully preserved until such time as the general assembly may otherwise direct. A schedule of the bonds, certificates and other evidences of debt so canceled from time to time shall be certified by said board and filed with the treasurer for preservation." (R., p. 37.)

The act, in section 11, provides for a sinking fund (R., p. 37), in section 13 for the payment of interest on the bonds issued under the act (R., p. 38), and section 15 declares:

> "That from and after the passage of this act, no bonds, certificates, or other evidences of indebtedness, shall be issued for any portion of the debt of this state, nor shall any interest be paid upon any part or portion of said debt, except as hereinbefore provided."

Act of 1892.

While the act of 1882 contemplated and provided for the funding of all the said debt assumed by Virginia and her release from the balance thereof, in March, 1890, as appears from a recital in this act of 1892 (R., p. 38), it had not all been funded by said act of 1882; so that in March, 1890, a commission was appointed on the part of Virginia to receive propositions for funding the debt of the Commonwealth not funded under the act of 1882, known as the "Riddleberger bill" (R., p. 38).

This act recites as a fact that,

"said Virginia debt commission has submitted a report to the general assembly, wherein it appears that under a certain agreement, dated May twelfth, eighteen hundred and ninety, lodged with the Central Trust Company of New York, Frederick P. Olcott, William L. Bull, Henry Budge, Charles D. Dickey, Junior, Hugh R. Garden and John Gill, constituting a committee for certain of the creditors of Virginia, called the 'Bondholders' committee,' have proposed to said commission to surrender to the state in bulk not less than twenty-three million of dollars of the public debt, unfunded under said act approved February fourteenth, eighteen hundred and eighty-two, in exchange for an issue of new bonds, as hereinafter specified, the same to be apportioned between the several classes of creditors by a tribunal which the said creditors have themselves appointed; and that, in pursuance of said proposal an agreement has been entered into unanimously between the said commission and the said bondholders' committee, subject to approval by the general assembly, whereby in exchange for the said unsettled obligations of the state held by the public, which were issued prior to February fourteenth, eighteen hundred and eighty-two (exclusive of evidences of debt held by the public institutions of the commonwealth pursuant to law and by the United States) together with the interest thereon to July first, eighteen hundred and ninety one, inclusive, aggregating about twenty-eight million of dollars, there shall be issued nineteen million of dollars of new bonds, dated July first, eighteen hundred and ninety one, and maturing one hundred years from said date with interest thereon at the rate of two per centum per annum for ten years from said first day of July, eighteen hundred and ninety-one, and three per centum per annum for ninety years thereafter to the date of maturity, said interest to be payable semi-annually, of which aggregate debt of about twenty-eight million of dollars the said bondholders' committee represent that they now hold and agree to surrender not less than twenty-three million of dollars; and

"Whereas said report and agreement contemplate the surrender of the obligations held by the bondholders' committee as an entirety, and do not contemplate an apportionment by the general assembly between the various classes of creditors so represented by said bondholders' committee, the same having been committed to a distributing tribunal, as hereinbefore recited; and

"Whereas it is the desire and intention of the general assembly that a settlement of all the other outstanding obligations of the state (except those issued under the act of February fourteenth, eighteen hundred and eighty two, the evidences of debt held by the public institutions of the state in pursuance of law and by the United States) as well as those controlled by the bondholders' committee, as aforesaid, shall be made under the provisions of this act." (R., pp. 38, 39.)

This act provides in the first section, that the sinking fund commissioners do issue nineteen million of dollars in bonds in lieu of the twenty-eight million dollars outstanding not funded under the act of 1882 (R., p. 39); in the second section, the date of the bonds, when payable, the rate of interest (two per cent for the first ten years and three per cent for the remaining ninety years), and for the redemption of the bonds (R., pp. 39, 40). The third section prescribes the form of the bond, and the fourth the form of the coupon (R., pp. 40, 41). Section 5 is divided into paragraphs, the first of which prescribes the denominations of the bonds. The other paragraphs are designated by capital letters from A to E inclusively (R., pp. 41-43). Paragraph C provides that after the presentation of not less than twenty-three million dollars:

"after deducting one-third of the principal and interest of such obligations as were issued prior to the thirtieth day of March, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, and also deducting one-third of the principal and interest of such obligations as were issued under the act approved the thirtieth day of March, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, as do include West Virginia's proportion, said bondholders' committee may at any time on or prior to the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and ninety-two, present the same in bulk to said commissioners for surrender and exchange as herein provided." (R., p. 42.)

Paragraph D provides that:

> "The said new bonds shall be issued to said bondholders' committee by the said commissioners in the following proportion, to-wit: nineteen thousand dollars of the new bonds to be created under this act shall be issued for every twenty-eight thousand of old outstanding obligations (principal and interest to July first, eighteen hundred and ninety-one), as aforesaid, surrendered by said bondholders' committee to the said commissioners, after the deductions provided for in paragraph C of this section; and a proportionate amount of said new bonds shall be issued for smaller sums of said outstanding obligations so surrendered, provided that no certificates issued on account of the proportion of West Virginia of the obligations of the states shall be funded under this act." (R., p. 43.)

After thus carefully providing for a refunding of that part of the debt not funded under the act of 1882, section 6 of said act of 1892 provides as follows:

> "For all balances of the indebtedness, constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt, principal and interest, in the settlement of Virginia's equitable share of the bonds authorized to be exchanged under this act, the said share having been heretofore determined by the Commonwealth of Virginia, the said commissioners shall issue certificates substantially in the following form, viz.:
>
> "No. ------. The Commonwealth of Virginia has this day discharged her equitable share of the (registered or coupon, as the case may be) bond for ------ dollars, dated ------ day of ----------, and No. ------, leaving a balance of ---------- dollars with interest from ----------, to be accounted for to the holder of the certificate by the state of West Virginia, without recourse upon this commonwealth.
>
> "Done at the capitol of the State of Virginia, this ------ day of ----------, eighteen hundred and ninety-two.
>
> ----------, Second Auditor.
>
> ----------, Treasurer."
>
> (R., pp. 43, 44.)

Section 9 of this act provides that:

> "All the bonds and certificates of debt, and evidences of past due and unpaid interest, taken in under the provisions of this act, shall be canceled by the treasurer in the presence of the commissioners of the sinking fund, or a majority thereof, as the same are acquired, and by him carefully preserved, subject to disposition by the general assembly, a schedule of the bonds, certificates, and other evidences of debt so canceled shall be certified by said commissioners and filed by the treasurer for preservation." (R., p. 45.)

Section 10 of this act provides for a sinking fund for the payment of the bonds issued under this and the act of 1882, and for their cancellation, and it also provides for the cancellation of all bonds issued under the act of 1882 and held by the commissioners of the sinking fund at the time said act of 1892 was approved,

> "as soon as at least fifteen million of dollars of new bonds shall have been issued and delivered pursuant to the provisions of this act" (R., p. 46).

The thirteenth section of said act of 1892 provides for the payment of the interest on the bonds issued under it, as the same shall become due and payable (R., p. 46). Section 16 repeals the act of 1882, and all other acts amendatory thereof (R., pp. 46, 47).

It will be perceived that the act of 1871 was repealed by the act of 1879, as the two acts were inconsistent with each other, if not expressly repealed by the repeal therein of the act of 1878, as it was in substance an amendment and re-enactment of the act of 1871 (R., p. 26); and the act of 1882 repealed the acts of 1879 by implication, as it treated the adjustment and settlement of the debt, so far as the liability thereon of Virginia is concerned, as an entirety. That such repeal was so effected by the act of 1882, we submit the following authorities:

In Grant v. Railroad Co., 66 W. Va. 175, this subject of the repeal of a statute by implication, where a subsequent statute deals with the subject as an entirety, is fully considered and the authorities cited. The opinion in that case deals with the repeal of a statute by implication, resultant upon the enactment of a subsequent act dealing with the subject as an entirety. The court said:

"The principle applied here has been stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the following terms: 'Where the later of two acts covers the whole subject matter of the earlier one, not purporting to amend it, and plainly shows that it was intended to be a substitute for the earlier act, such later act will operate as a repeal of the earlier one, though the two are not repugnant. District of Columbia v. Hutton, 143 U. S. 18. This Court in Herron v. Carson, 26 W. Va. 62, has stated it in these terms: 'A subsequent statute revising the whole subject matter of a former one and evidently intended as a substitute for it, though it contains no express words to that effect, must, on principles of law as well as in reason and common sense, operate a repeal of the former law; it has been applied by this Court in other cases. State v. Harden, 62 W. Va. 313; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125. Scores of additional cases of the same class could be enumerated. See United States v. Claflin, 97 U. S. 546; Eckloff v. District of Columbia, 135 U. S. 240; Morris v. Crocker, 13 How. (U. S.) 429; Mitchell v. Brown, 1 Ell. & Ell. 267; Parry v. Croydon Gas Co., 15 C. B. (N. S.) 568; Heckman v. Pinckney, 81 N. Y. 211; United States v. Tyneu, 11 Wall. 88; Commonwealth v. Killiher, 12 Allen (Mass.) 480; State v. Campbell, 44 Wis. 529. Under this rule the implication does not rest on inconsistency or repugnancy, in the restricted sense in which these terms are generally used. It arises as a matter of legislative intention, disclosed by the character of the act, its title or preamble, and subject matter, and inconsistency, so far as it may be deemed to enter into the inquiry, is of a broader kind, namely, inconsistency between the old law and the legislative intent shown by the new. It is not inconsistency or repugnancy between words, phrases or clauses, considered as such, but inconsistency between the acts considered as entireties."

The act of 1892 refunded every part of the debt created by Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, except the one-third thereof which she claims is West Virginia's proportion; and, as to such unassumed and unfunded part, the act remits the holders thereof to West Virginia without recourse upon the Commonwealth of Virginia. The holders of the part of the debt assumed by Virginia assented to its settlement under the acts of 1882 and 1892, in the manner therein prescribed. Of this the exhibits filed with the bill and made a part thereof afford full proof.

The Status of Virginia as to Her Unfunded Debt by Virtue of the Provisions of Her Four Legislative Acts of 1871, 1879, 1882 and 1892.

Virginia, in her act of 1871, declaring its object and clearly expressive of its purpose, says:

> "Now, therefore, to enable the State of West Virginia to settle her proportion of said debt with the holders thereof, and to prevent any complications or difficulties which might be interposed to any other matter of settlement, and for the purpose of promptly restoring the credit of Virginia by providing for the prompt and certain payment of the interest upon her proportion of said debt as the same shall become due, therefore,
>
> "1. Be it enacted," etc. (R., p. 18.)

Section 3 then provides for the issuance of certificates for the unfunded part of the said debt, alleged by Virginia to be West Virginia's proportion thereof, providing that,

> "payment" (of such unfunded debt) "will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia at the time of its dismemberment" (R., p. 19).

Thus, Virginia settled with her creditors for two-thirds of the debt, funded in new bonds drawing six per cent interest, with the understanding that the bonds unfunded and canceled, surrendered to Virginia, represented by the certificates delivered to the owners, should be held by Virginia in trust, to be paid in accordance with a settlement to be made at some future time with West Virginia. It will be seen that Virginia conditionally promises to pay the unfunded part of the debt under the act of 1871, dependent upon the contingency of a subsequent settlement with West Virginia; payment to be in accordance with such settlement, and no interest is payable on any part of the debt not funded under the act.

It will be observed that this act treats the two-thirds which Virginia assumes as her proportion of said debt. All the creditors accepting the provisions of this act thereby assented to this as her portion to be assumed and paid by her, and the residue as West Virginia's proportion, as stated in the act, and with which Virginia was only connected or in which she was only interested under a conditional promise.

The act of 1879 repealed all acts inconsistent therewith and also the act of March 14, 1878 (R., p. 26), and provided again for the funding of the debt, as of the date of January 1, 1879, the principal payable forty years thereafter, bearing interest annually at the rate of three per cent for ten years, four per cent for twenty years, and five per cent for ten years, payable in the cities of Richmond, New York and London, as provided in the bonds issued thereunder (R., pp. 20, 21).

This act of 1879 provided that upon the filing with the governor of the assent of the representatives of the holders of the debt to an acceptance of the terms of this act, such acceptance should create a contract between the Commonwealth and said corporations—that is, the foreign bondholders' and funding associations, treated as corporations, representing the holders of the debt. This assent was accordingly filed. Therefore this act of 1879 created a new and different contract as to the entire debt from that which existed between the Commonwealth and the holders of the debt under the act of 1871. The characteristics or distinguishing features of this contract so created by the act of 1879 were:

First, that the state of Virginia would negotiate, or aid the creditors holding all certificates issued under the act of 1879 or previous acts in negotiating with the state of West Virginia for an amicable settlement of the claims of such creditors against the state of West Virginia, thus relieving her from her conditional liability created as to the unfunded bonds under the act of 1871.

Second, the acceptance of certificates under this act of 1879 for West Virginia's alleged one-third was taken and held as a just and absolute release of the Commonwealth of Virginia from all liability on account of said certificates.

Thus it is seen that Virginia was expressly released from all liability as to the certificates issued under the act of 1879; and as to the certificates issued under the act of 1871 there was substituted for her conditional liability a promise on her part either to negotiate herself directly with West Virginia or to aid the creditors holding the certificates issued under both acts of 1871 and 1879 in negotiating with West Virginia for an amicable settlement of West Virginia's alleged one-third of said debt, being the unfunded portion thereof not assumed by Virginia under said act.

It appears that there had been issued on December 14, 1904, $12,910,555.89, of which $10,639,776.42 were issued under the act of 1871. So that Virginia was released by the very words of the act of 1879 of more than $2,000,000 of the unfunded debt, and released of the residue (amounting to more than $10,000,000) by the acceptance of the terms of the act by the representatives of the holders of all the debt.

Third, another characteristic of the new contract made by Virginia with the holders of the debt under the act of 1879 was the very large reduction of the interest from that provided under the act of 1871.

By the act of 1882 Virginia makes a statement of her entire debt as existing before and on January 1, 1861; and upon the basis of this statement she makes an entirely new contract with reference to the entire debt. This act, thus forming a new contract, is assented to by her creditors. The characteristic changes made under this new act are:

First, a scaling of the debt whereby she pays a certain percentage of each class of bonds (R., pp. 35, 36).

Second, by this she effects a large reduction in the amount of the two-thirds of the debt which she had theretofore assumed under the acts of 1871 and 1879, and secures more favorable terms of interest and changes the place of the payment of the interest, the rate of interest by this act being fixed at three per cent and the place of payment at Richmond, Virginia (R., pp. 34, 35).

After thus fixing the basis of her liability upon the scaling of the debt at the rate designated in the act, the act then arbitrarily prescribes that "for all balances of such debt, constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt," a certificate shall be issued to be accounted for by the state of West Virginia without recourse upon Virginia (R., p. 36). Virginia thus arrogated to herself the right to fix the amount to be paid by West Virginia without West Virginia's consent, and without legal authority.

It will be observed that by this act it is not the certificates issued under it, if any were issued, as to which Virginia is released, but she is released by the terms of the act "for all balances of such indebtedness, constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt." This act provides, as we have seen, for the surrender of all bonds ever issued by Virginia, whether prior to 1861 or subsequent thereto, and for their cancellation. This act of 1882 by its very terms necessarily repealed all previous acts of Virginia relating to the public debt, and creates an entirely new contract between her and her creditors with reference thereto. It is true that the creditors did not bring in the certificates and surrender them which had been issued to them under the acts of 1871 and 1879, for the reason that these certificates represented definitely the unfunded portion of the entire debt, the very part that Virginia declines to assume under the act of 1882, and for which she provides that certificates shall be issued without recourse upon her, and for the very substantial reason that these certificates only represented that part of the debt from which Virginia had been released by the concurrent acts of herself and the holders of these certificates; and they accurately represented the part of the debt which Virginia declined to assume, and specifically designated the bonds for which the certificates were given, being the bonds of the old debt existing prior to and on January 1, 1861. Wherefore, then, bring in the old certificates and take new ones? To do so would not affect the relationship of the holders with reference to the unfunded debt, nor would it affect the liability of Virginia, because she had already exonerated herself, as we have seen, from even a conditional liability by virtue of the act of 1879 for any portion of the debt which these certificates represented. Therefore the certificates which these holders already possessed, issued under the acts of 1871 and 1879, were retained by them as an evidence of that part of the debt as to which Virginia had been released and as to which, under the act of 1882, as well as the act of 1879, they were to look to West Virginia for payment.

The act of 1892 was designed to fund all that part of the debt which Virginia had assumed that had not been funded under the act of 1882. The debt not funded under the act of 1882, then amounted to about $28,000,000, as we have seen. This act was passed in the light of the agreement between the representatives of the holders of this debt and the Virginia debt commission created two years prior to this act, and they proposed to surrender the said $28,000,000 not funded under the said act of 1882, for new bonds to be issued under the act of 1892, amounting to $19,000,000. So, under said act of 1892, the $28,000,000 in bonds made for all principal and interest were surrendered to Virginia and canceled, and in lieu thereof new bonds amounting to $19,000,000 were issued, as we have already seen; and the act expressly provides for the cancellation of all bonds of the state issued under the act of 1882, then held by the commissioners of the sinking fund, "as soon as at least $15,000,000 of new bonds shall have been issued and delivered pursuant to the provisions of this act"—meaning the act of 1892 (R., pp. 45, 46).

Thus we perceive that, by the very language of the act of 1892, which is filed as exhibit number 4 with plaintiff's bill, Virginia effected a complete settlement as to that part of the debt which she assumed, and that all bonds issued prior to 1892 were canceled, and a complete settlement of the debt as to her liability thereon effected by this act.

And the act then provides:

> "for all balances of the indebtedness, constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt, principal and interest,"

a certificate shall be issued, the act prescribing that the amount of the old debt represented by such certificate

> "is to be accounted for to the holders of this certificate by the state of West Virginia without recourse upon the commonwealth." (R., pp. 43, 44.)

Neither the act of 1882 nor the act of 1892 restricts the certificates to be issued to any part of the unfunded debt, but the act applies such certificate to all balances of the old debt, constituting West Virginia's alleged share thereof. The acts of 1871 and of 1879 restricted the certificates to those issued under the act.

Can there be any doubt now that said act of 1892 constituted a final settlement between Virginia and the holders of the debt as to the part which it was agreed Virginia should assume, and operated to release her from all liability whatsoever upon "all balances" not funded under said act? Indeed, Virginia herself alleges in her bill, after referring to the acts of 1871, 1879, and 1882, as follows:

> "Until at length a final and satisfactory settlement of the portion of the debt of the original state which Virginia should assume and pay was definitely concluded by the act of February 20, 1892." (R., p. 11.)

What are we to understand by the use of the term "final and satisfactory settlement"? If such settlement was final, there could be no further settlement in reference to the debt. If such settlement was satisfactory, it must necessarily have been satisfactory to the parties concerned in it, and these parties were the commonwealth of Virginia and the holders of the debt.

It was final, because the only provision made for the payment of any part of the debt is that contained in the act of 1892, which was brought about by the creditors themselves, and the state of Virginia through her debt commission. This act provides a sinking fund for the principal, and provides for the payment of the interest on the bonds issued under it, as the same should become due and payable (R., p. 46). No other act exists and is in force in the state of Virginia relating to the debt, except the act of 1892.

Now, when Virginia has been released from all liability as to the unfunded part of said debt which is represented by the certificates mentioned in the bill, she passes a joint resolution to provide a means whereby West Virginia may be induced to assume and pay the said unfunded part of said debt (R., p. 47). In this joint resolution there is a long preamble, the last of which reads as follows:

> "Whereas the present state of Virginia has settled and adjusted to the entire satisfaction of her people and the creditors the liability assumed by her on account of two-thirds of the debt of the original state; now, therefore, be it resolved," etc. (R., pp. 48, 49.)

This resolution created a commission composed of citizens of Virginia, which is,

> "authorized and directed to negotiate with the State of West Virginia a settlement and adjustment of the proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia" (R., p. 49).

But the commission is not to proceed with its negotiation until satisfactory assurances have been received from a majority of the holders of said certificates (exclusive of those held by the state),

> "that they desire the said commission to enter into and undertake such negotiation, and will accept the amount so ascertained to be paid by the state of West Virginia in full settlement of the one-third of the debt of the original state of Virginia which has not been assumed by the present state of Virginia. But Virginia shall in no event enter into any negotiation hereunder except upon the basis that Virginia is bound only for the two-thirds of the debt of the original state which she has already provided for as her equitable proportion thereof."

A majority of the holders of said certificates have requested this commission to proceed with its negotiations, and upon the understanding and agreement that Virginia is only bound for two-thirds of the debt, and that she has already provided for it.

Can there be any evidence more conclusive than this that Virginia is no longer liable for any part of the said debt represented by said certificates? She has been as effectually released therefrom as it is possible for positive legislation and the acts of the parties in conformity thereto to effect such a release.

This being in brief the status of the case as made out by the bill, West Virginia in her answer, in section 22 thereof, reciting these various acts, among other things, avers as follows:

> "And so respondent avers that the Commonwealth of Virginia has been wholly released from all liability on account of the said certificates and every part of them, and has no legal or equitable interest in any claim based thereon, and that this suit was instituted and is being prosecuted by the said Commonwealth of Virginia solely as trustee for and on behalf of the holders of the said certificates, and not in her own right; and that she has agreed through her said commission with said creditors that she is to incur no expense on account of this action, and that the whole expense thereof is to be borne by the holders of said certificates, in whose behalf and for whose exclusive benefit the same was instituted and is now being prosecuted" (R., pp. 163, 164.)

Everything that Virginia did toward securing an exoneration from all liability as to the unfunded part of said debt, (she alleging that two-thirds of the original debt is her just proportion and which she has assumed and which the creditors have accepted as her just proportion,) appears on the face of the bill and its exhibits; and the allegation of the answer alleging this release must be taken as true for the purposes of this suit, because Virginia has not controverted the truth thereof by any replication to said answer. It is well settled that, in the absence of a statute or rule of court to the contrary, where a cause in equity is set down for hearing on bill and answer alone, the general rule is that the answer is to be considered as true in all its allegations, whether responsive or not, on the ground that the complainant's failure to put in issue by replication the facts alleged in the answer would preclude the defendant from proving them.

Accord and Satisfaction Created Between Virginia and Her Creditors as to the Unfunded (One-third) Portion of Her Debt.

The acceptance by her creditors of the several acts of legislation of Virginia, hereinbefore cited, effected an agreement between them, whereby Virginia was not to be held liable for the payment of the unfunded debt, nor to suit thereon; which unfunded debt is one-third of the whole original debt, and which unfunded debt is evidenced as to amount by the certificates issued by Virginia. By this agreement the holders of this unfunded debt, who are also the holders of these certificates, look to West Virginia for payment thereof without recourse upon Virginia. Thus, Virginia was relieved of all liability for this one-third of her debt not funded nor assumed by her, and there was created between her and her creditors, as to the unfunded one-third of the debt upon which the certificates were issued, an accord and satisfaction.

If the acts of the legislature of Virginia, the provisions whereof were accepted and acted upon by her creditors, show anything at all, they show that these creditors accepted these certificates with the express agreement that Virginia was not to be liable to them for any part of the debt unfunded and which was represented by said certificates. Before considering the law applying to this feature of the case, we call the Court's attention to certain incontrovertible facts appearing in the record.

By the act of 1871, as we have seen, the bonds funded under said act were to be surrendered to Virginia and canceled, but to be retained by her nevertheless in trust for the holders of the certificates representing the unfunded part. The rate of the interest prescribed to be paid upon the new bonds was at the rate of six per cent per annum.

By the act of 1879, which provided for the funding of the entire debt (R., p. 23), all bonds surrendered were likewise to be canceled, and the rate of interest changed from six per cent to three per cent per annum for ten years, four per cent for twenty years, and five per cent for ten years (R., pp. 21, 22); and all certificates issued under that act were to be accepted by the holders without recourse upon Virginia.

Under the act of 1882, after a full statement of the debt and fixing Virginia's proportion thereof, a large reduction was obtained from the principal of the debt. The rate of interest was again changed from that fixed by the act of 1879, and fixed at the rate of three per cent per annum. Under the act of 1879, the interest was payable in the cities of Richmond, New York or London (R., pp. 21, 22), while under the act of 1882 the interest was payable at the office of the treasurer of Richmond, Virginia. There was therefore a change in the place of the payment of the interest.

By the act of 1892, Virginia obtained a reduction of the principal and a reduction of the rate of interest to two per cent for the first ten years and three per cent for the remaining ninety years, and the place of the payment of the interest to be at Richmond, New York and London, or either place, might be designated by the state (R., p. 40).

These changes in the contract as to the rates of interest, the places where the interest was payable, the reduction of the amount of principal, and the extension of time for the payment of the debt, the adjustment in this manner being to the satisfaction of the creditors before the maturity of the debt, constitute a valid consideration for an accord and satisfaction between Virginia and the holders of the old debt.

In Goodnow v. Smith, 35 Mass. 414, the action was assumpsit on a joint and several promissory note made by the defendants, Noah Smith and Joseph H. Adams, dated February 26, 1827, and payable one-half in one year and one-half in two years from April then ensuing. Adams defaulted. Smith pleaded the general issue. The defense was that in the autumn of 1827, before either of the installments of the note became due, it was agreed between the plaintiff and Smith that if Smith would then pay one-half of the note and take of the plaintiff at par a note for $21.14 which he held against one Willis the plaintiff would exonerate and discharge Smith from payment of the other half of this note, and that Smith in pursuance of this agreement then paid one-half of the principal and the interest on the note and took Willis' note at par value and endorsed by the plaintiff without recourse. The court sustained this defense. The syllabus of the case reads as follows:

> "In an action upon the joint and several promissory note of A. and S., brought against both promisors, A. was defaulted, and S. set up, as a defense, an agreement made between him and the plaintiff, before the note became due, by the terms of which the plaintiff exonerated and discharged S. from the payment of one-half of the note, upon his then paying the other half and receiving of the plaintiff, at par, a note of a third person endorsed without recourse to the plaintiff. It was held, that the agreement was founded on a good and sufficient consideration; and that it was a good defense to the action so far as respected S.; but that under St. 1834, c. 189 (Revised Stat., c. 100, §7), the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against A."

The court in its opinion said:

> "This case turns upon the distinction between a > technical release and a covenant not to sue one of two joint obligors or promisors. The distinction is, that a release to one of two joint and several obligors discharges both, whereas a covenant with one not to sue him is not to be construed as a release so as to discharge the other obligor. This distinction is well founded on principle, and is supported by all the authorities."

The court reviews the authorities, and holds that the plaintiff could not maintain any action against Smith.

In Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. v. Clark, 178 U. S. 353 (44 L. Ed. 1099), points two and three of the syllabus are as follows:

> "The rule that payment of a less sum in satisfaction of a larger sum is not binding for want of consideration only applies when the larger sum is liquidated, and when there is no consideration whatever for the surrender of a part of it, and the rule itself is considered so far with disfavor as to be confined strictly to the cases within it.
>
> "The payment of a specified sum conceded to be due, but including certain items but excluding disputed items, on condition that the sum so paid shall be received in full satisfaction, will be sustained as an extinguishment of the whole sum where the aggregate amount is in dispute."

An examination of the opinion in this case, delivered by the late Chief Justice Fuller, discloses a very careful consideration of the rule, an examination of many authorities, and the adoption of the principle that any (even the most insufficient) consideration is valid to support an accord and satisfaction based upon the payment of a less sum in discharge of a greater. The learned justice also says that in some of the states the old common-law rule has been changed by statute: the states mentioned as having altered the rule are Alabama, Georgia, Maine, Tennessee, and Virginia.

In Hutton v. Stoddart, 83 Ind. 539, the syllabus reads as follows:

> "A. employed B. as a traveling salesman at a salary of $1,200 per annum, and becoming dissatisfied with him sent him a check for $400 in payment of the last half of the salary before the expiration of the year, with instructions to return it if not satisfactory. B. retained the check, collected the money upon it, and assigned the residue of the salary, for which suit was brought.

"Held, that the action cannot be maintained; that the retention of the money was an acceptance of A.'s proposition, and operated as a complete satisfaction of the claim.

"The payment of a part of a debt in satisfaction of the whole, if made before the debt is due, is a complete satisfaction of the whole debt.

"A dispute about a claim is sufficient to maintain a compromise, and thus render the payment of a part of a debt a complete satisfaction of the whole debt."

In Allison v. Abendroth, 108 N. Y. 470 (15 N. E. 606), the court in the course of its opinion, discussing the well settled common-law doctrine that a promise by a debtor to pay part of an admitted debt, followed by payment of such part, is not a good accord and satisfaction of the unpaid part, said:

"This rule of the common law, as was said by Nelson, J., in Kellogg v. Richards, 14 Wend. 117, is 'technical, and not very well supported in reason'; but it has been steadily maintained by the courts in cases coming strictly within it. But it is held that where there is an independent consideration, or the creditor receives any benefit, or is put in a better position, or one from which there may be a legal possibility of benefit, to which he was not entitled except for the agreement, then the agreement is not nudum pactum, and the doctrine of the common law to which we have adverted has no application. Upon this distinction the cases rest which hold that the acceptance by the creditor, in discharge of the debt, of a different thing from that contracted to be paid, although of much less pecuniary value or amount, is a good satisfaction; as, for example, a peppercorn for a thousand pounds (Pinnel's Case, arguendo), or a negotiable instrument binding the debtor or a third person for a smaller sum (Curlewis v. Clark, 3 Exch.

> 375). Following the same principle, it is held that, when the debtor enters into a new contract with the creditor to do something which he was not bound to do by the original contract, the new contract is a good accord and satisfaction, if so agreed. The case of accepting the sole liability of one of two joint debtors or co-partners in satisfaction of the joint or co-partnership debt is an illustration. This is held to be a good satisfaction, because the sole liability of one of two debtors 'may be more beneficial than the joint liability of both, either in respect to the solvency of the parties, or the convenience of the remedy.' Thompson v. Percival, 6 Barn. & Adol. 925. In perfect accord with this principle is the recent case in this court of Luddington v. Bell, 77 N. Y. 138, in which it was held that the acceptance by a creditor of the individual note of one of the members of a co-partnership, after dissolution, for a portion of the co-partnership debt, was a good consideration for the creditor's agreement to discharge the maker from further liability."

In Silvers and Brittin v. Reynolds, 17 N. J. L. 275, judgment was entered against two defendants. Silvers and Brittin, by confession on warrant of attorney, upon the joint and several notes to the plaintiff for $2,400, dated May 14, 1835, as collateral security for three other notes of theirs to the plaintiff of $800 each, payable successively in August, 1836, December, 1836, and January, 1837, with liberty to enter the judgment if either of these notes was not paid at maturity. Each defendant obtained a rule on the plaintiff to show cause why this judgment as to himself should not be set aside, or opened so as to allow him to plead. The court in the course of its opinion, in making the rule absolute, said:

> "What is now shown by the affidavits, is not denied, that prior to the entry of the judgment, the plaintiff had agreed with the defendants, to take Silvers alone for the debt, and discharge Brittin from it, if he (Brittin) would pay down five hundred dollars toward it; in pursuance of which agreement, Brittin actually paid him the five hundred dollars, and the plaintiff immediately tore Brittin's name from each of the three notes, and delivered up to him the signatures; after which the plaintiff applied for judgment against him. It is said that five hundred dollars cannot be a satisfaction for eight hundred dollarrs, in law; that an agreement to accept a less in satisfaction of a greater sum of money, is void on the face of it, and can never be enforced without a technical release. It is true that the law will not enforce an unexecuted agreement of that kind; but where such an agreement has been executed, as by giving a release of the larger sum, it is then valid and available. Now this case is as strong as that of a release. It was an executed agreement, for by voluntarily tearing the signatures from the notes, it extinguished them forever, as effectually as a release of them; and after this, it was an imposition on the court to apply for judgment against Brittin."

In Jones v. Perkins, 29 Miss. 139 (64 Am. Dec. 136), the syllabus is self-explanatory. The first two points are as follows:

"Agreement to accept less sum, or actual acceptance at the place of payment by the terms of the original contract of a less sum, than the amount due is no defense to the debtor. It is, however, said that this rule is entirely technical, and not very well supported by reasons; hence it requires but slight consideration to support such agreements.

"While general rule is that payment of less sum than the amount due at the place of payment will not discharge the contract, yet if the payment is made, or to be made, at a different place from that appointed by the contract, this is a sufficient consideration for an agreement to accept a less sum."

In Sonnenberg v. Riedel, 16 Minn. 72, the action was tried before a referee, who found that on January 12, 1867, the defendant owed the plaintiff $300 and some accrued interest, which would become due on the 1st of March, 1867; that on said 12th day of January the defendant paid the plaintiff and the plaintiff received the sum of $100 in full of said debt; that the plaintiff's motive in so doing was compassion for defendant's misfortune in having shortly before been burnt out. The referee held that the settlement was binding and a bar to the action. From the action of the court confirming the finding of the referee the plaintiff appealed, and the action of the court below was affirmed. The syllabus of the case is as follows:

> "The payment and acceptance of a smaller sum, in full of a debt before it becomes due, discharges the debt."

In Brooks v. White, 43 Mass. 283, the point of the syllabus pertinent here is as follows:

> "If a debtor gives, and the creditor receives, in full satisfaction of the debt, the note of a third person for a smaller sum than the amount of the debt, it is a good accord and satisfaction to bar a suit by the creditor to recover the balance of the debt. So if the creditor receives a less sum than is his due, in satisfaction of the whole, before the day of payment."

In McKenzie v. Culberth, 66 N. C. 431, the question presented was, whether the payment by the debtor and an acceptance by the creditor of a less sum than is due upon a bond, as a payment of the whole, is a discharge of the obligation so as to preclude the creditor from recovering the remainder of the bond. The following are the points decided:

> "1. The principle is too well established and too long acquiesced in to be disturbed, that an agreement by a creditor to receive a part in discharge of the whole of a debt due him by single bill, is without consideration and therefore void.
>
> "2. To this rule there are exceptions, as if:
>
> 1. A less sum is agreed upon and received before the day of payment.
> 2. Or at a different place.
> 3. Or money's worth.
> 4. Or where a general composition is agreed upon."

The agreement of Virginia with her creditors comes within the exceptions noted above.

In Fenwick v. Phillips, 60 Ky. 87, the point in the syllabus applicable here reads as follows:

> "The doctrine is well settled, that the payment of a less sum is not a good satisfaction, unless it be made > before the money was due, or at a different place from that at which it was payable."

In Schweider v. Lang, 29 Minn. 254 (43 Am. Rep. 202), the action was upon a promissory note. The defense was what is known as an accord executory; that is to say, an agreement upon the sum to be paid and received at a future day in satisfaction of the note, a part of the agreement being that the note was to be paid for the lesser sum agreed upon at a future day before the maturity of the note. The holder refused to perform the agreement, and transferred the note, and an action was brought against the assignor for damages for breach of the agreement. The syllabus is as follows:

> "An oral agreement by the maker of a note to pay and by the holder to accept, before maturity, a less sum than the note calls for, in full satisfaction, is valid, and the holder is liable in damages for a breach of it."

In Bowker v. Childs, 85 Mass. 434, the point in the syllabus is as follows:

> "Payment of less than the face of several promissory notes, a portion of which are not due, is a good satisfaction of all of them, if upon the receipt and acceptance of the money by the holder the notes are given up to the maker."

In Smith v. Brown, 10 N. C. 580, the second point of the syllabus reads as follows:

> "If an obligor pay a less sum than is due, either before the day specified or at another place than is limited by the condition, and the obligee receive it, this is a good satisfaction."

Surrender and Cancellation of the Old Bonds.

Virginia, in each of the four acts hereinbefore considered, in each of which she dealt as an entirety with the subject of her debt, took the precaution to provide for a surrender of all the outstanding bonds which Virginia had ever issued under the acts of 1871, 1879, and 1882, and for the cancellation of these bonds as evidences of indebtedness; and the act of 1892 effects the same result. Why did she stipulate that these old bonds should be surrendered unless it was to get into her posesssion the evidence of her old debt, which it was her purpose, by these acts, with the agreement with the holders of the debt, that she was discharging and paying off these bonds by the course pursued by her under these various funding acts? The authorities attach great importance to the surrender of an instrument evidencing a debt, when it is sought to show the discharge of such debt by the party against whom it is sought to enforce the unpaid or unsatisfied part. The attention of the Court is called to the following authorities:

In Murray and Mason v. Snow, 37 Ia. 410, the plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant upon an account. Upon the defendant pleading a settlement of the account by note, the plaintiffs then amended their petition, declaring upon the note, and to the petition as amended the defendant pleaded that the note had been fully paid off, satisfied and surrendered. The amount paid for the surrender of the note was fifty per cent in full satisfaction thereof. The court, in holding that the action could not be maintained, in the course of its opinion said:

> "It appearing, therefore, from the pleadings and the findings of fact, that the plaintiffs and the other creditors of the defendant who was in insolvent circumstances, and without any fraud on his part, agreed to accept fifty cents on the dollar in full satisfaction for their respective claims, and that the plaintiffs had been paid such composition in full, and had surrendered the note of the defendant held by them, pursuant to their agreement, they cannot maintain this action. The judgment should have been for the defendant."

In Draper v. Hitt, 43 Vt. 439 (5 Am. Rep. 292), the first point of the syllabus is as follows:

> "The acceptance of a note of $40 in satisfaction of a note of $60, and the simultaneous surrender of the larger note, is a full discharge thereof."

In Ellsworth v. Fogg, 35 Vt. 355, the second point of the syllabus reads as follows:

> "The acceptance by the holder of a promissory note of part of the amount due upon it, in satisfaction and discharge of the whole note, and the surrender of the note by the holder to the maker to be canceled, is a full discharge of the note, and no action can be maintained for the unpaid portion."

The court, in the course of its opinion in this case, said:

"We think the surrender of the notes by the owner to the maker may well be put upon the same ground as a release,—as being an act of the highest significance and clearest import to show the deliberate and well understood agreement of the parties. It is their agreement executed,—a release in practical operation. It is free from liability to mistake or fraud. The deliberate surrender of notes by the owner to the maker, to be canceled, is an act which no man of prudence, or of the least knowledge of business, would do, unless he intended to discharge the debt. A release, as well as the surrender of notes, may be procured by deceit and fraud,—but when they are made according to the intent of the parties, they should be sustained."

Promise of a Debtor to do Some Act in the Future is Sufficient to Create an Accord and Satisfaction Without Performance by the Debtor.

By the act of 1879 Virginia relieved herself from the conditional liability created under the act of 1871 by her promise to her creditors and their acceptance thereof, to negotiate, or to aid the holders of the certificates issued under the acts of 1871 and 1879 in negotiating with West Virginia for an amicable settlement for the payment of the unfunded part of her debt, represented by the certificates. Virginia, when she made this promise, knew that its performance on her part was not a condition precedent to the validity of the accord and satisfaction sought by the said act to be created between her and her creditors as to the old debt; because the acceptance of the provisions of the act, the funding of the old debt under it, the surrender of the old bonds, and the changing of the rate of interest constituted an accord and satisfaction independently of this promise of Virginia to negotiate or aid the creditors in negotiating an amicable settlement with West Virginia for the payment of the unfunded part of the debt.

In Smith v. Elrod, 122 Ala. 269 (24 So. 994), the court in its opinion said:

> "While it is a general rule that an accord, in order to operate as a discharge of a debt, must be executed, yet it is well settled that a creditor may accept the mere promise of the debtor to perform some act in the future in satisfaction of the debt; and where such is the case the satisfaction is good, and the debt extinguished without performance. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 423; Knowles v. Knowles, 128 Ill. 110 (21 N. E. 196); Ports. v. Polk Co., 80 Iowa 401 (45 N. W. 775); Averill v. Wood, 78 Mich. 342 (44 N. W. 381); Railroad Co. v. Forrest, 128 N. Y. 83 (28 N. E. 137); Babcock v. Hawkins, 23 Vt. 561. That the plaintiff accepted the delivery of the sawmill machinery to him, and the defendant's promise to deliver the 20,000 shingles by March 1, 1896, and to perform the other stipulations in full satisfaction of the notes and accounts, and that defendant made the delivery and promises with this understanding, is, we think, made manifest by the undisputed evidence that plaintiff told defendant he would instruct his wife to deliver the notes to him, and he could call on her at any time and get them, and that one of them was in fact surrendered to defendant by the wife. The accord was executed, in so far as its execution was necessary to the satisfaction of the debt, by the delivery of the machinery and the promise to perform the other acts, and was a complete bar to any action on either the notes or the accounts, unless rescinded for sufficient cause."

Virginia Had the Right Under Her Own Laws to Discharge Herself from Liability by Assuming Two-Thirds of the Old Debt, if Done with the Consent of Her Creditors (and it Was so Done), Without Impairing Their Rights (if Any They Had) Against West Virginia for the Residue.

As shown by her acts of legislation, Virginia treated the liability of West Virginia as direct to the creditors, and not as an obligation enuring to her. She thus dealt with the debt under these acts as if she were liable for a certain proportion thereof and West Virginia for the residue. Without consulting West Virginia, she and the creditors arbitrarily fixed her part at two-thirds, and West Virginia's at one-third. In all these acts, beginning with that of 1871, Virginia assumed that West Virginia was liable, like herself, directly to the holders of the debt; and this being so, that Virginia had the right, under her own laws, to agree with her creditors as to the amount they would exact from her; and this they did, as we have already shown.

Under the laws of Virginia, upon this theory of the case, the creditors might have dealt with the debt with Virginia alone, excluding West Virginia from the negotiations; and after a settlement with Virginia as to her part, hold West Virginia liable (if she be liable at all) for the other part. Such a course was duly authorized under the statute law of Virginia, in subordination to which the negotiations of Virginia with the holders of the debt were carried on.

In 1866-7 Virginia adopted the following provision of law, which appears in the present Code as section 2856:

> "A creditor may compound or compromise with any joint contractor or co-obligor, and release him from all liability on the contract or obligation, without impairing the contract or obligation as to the other joint contractor or co-obligors."

In Yuille v. Wimbish, 77 Va. 308, this statute was construed and held to be constitutional. It was contended that as to existing contracts it impairs their obligation and is therefore unconstitutional. Overruling this objection, the court in the opinion says:

> "It preserves all rights, and only provides an express, direct and ready mode of doing, by and between joint contractors, what it was not unlawful to do before the statute was enacted and was done by round-about and difficult indirection. It only removes technical difficulties out of the way of compromise and settlement.

"An English statute cited in Dewolf v. Lindsell, L. R. 5, Eq. Cas. 269, bears close resemblance to our Virginia statute in its purpose and effect, and the courts expressly held that it would apply to existing contracts."

There was inserted in the Code of Virginia of 1887 as section 2858 the following:

"Part performance of an obligation, promise or undertaking, either before or after a breach thereof, when expressly accepted by the creditor in satisfaction and rendered in pursuance of an agreement for that purpose, though without any new consideration, shall extinguish such obligation, promise or undertaking."

The law in Virginia existing prior to that enactment is clearly stated, after an examination of the authorities, in Seymour v. Goodrich, 80 Va. 303. The court in discussing the technical rule which, at common law, forbids the discharge of a debt by the payment of a smaller sum, said:

"But this rule, being highly technical in its character, seemingly unjust, and often oppressive in its operation, has been gradually falling into disfavor; and the courts have therefore not only confined its operation strictly within its own narrow limits, but have seized upon every possible opportunity to evade its application. As a consequence, it has been generally, if not universally, held that where any new element entered into the agreement of compromise—as where an earlier day is fixed for the payment, or a different place selected therefor, or where the payment is made in some other thing than what was originally contracted for, e. g., a chattel, or personal services, it will amount to a satisfaction of the whole debt, if the parties so agree. Bliss v. Charter, 5 Day 359; Gaffney v. Chapman, 4 Roberts 275; Watkinson v. Ingleby, 5 John. 386; Bowker v. Harris, 30 Vt. 424; Bull v. Bull, 43 Conn. 455; Perkins v. Lock- wood, 100 Mass. 249. And in Goddard v. O'Brien, reported in the 21st Vol. Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 638, S. C. L. R., 9 Q. B. Div. 37, the court carried this distinction so far as to hold that an acceptance of a check for $100, payable on demand, was a good accord and satisfaction of an indebtedness of £125 7s 9d, then due and payable, for the reason that the check was a negotiable instrument, thus holding, in effect, that the supposed advantage to be derived from the negotiability of the check for a part of the indebtedness, was a sufficient consideration for a relinquishment of the remainder. Foakes v. Beer, L. R. 9 App. Cases 605."

Virginia Has No Such Interest in Any Part of the Unfunded Debt Held by Third Parties, Which It Is Claimed West Virginia Should Pay, as to Enable Her to Enforce Payment by This Suit.

If Virginia has any suable interest in the unfunded debt, what constitutes that interest? Is it to ascertain the amount of her public debt existing on January 1, 1861? No; because Virginia had already determined this by her act of 1882, to which the holders of the debt assented, and upon terms of that act and the act of 1892 they agreed to accept and did accept new bonds from Virginia for the share of the debt which it was agreed Virginia should pay. Virginia was thereby relieved from liability as to the residue. (See exhibits 3 and 4 with the bill, record pp. 26-47.)

To the action of Virginia in ascertaining the amount of the debt, as shown by her act of 1882, no objection has ever been made, either by West Virginia or any of Virginia's creditors. What controversy, then, between the two states exists as to this matter? There is none. Does Virginia's interest as to the debt consist in ascertaining the proportion thereof which she ought to assume and be liable for? No; because, as we have shown and as appears from the bill itself and its exhibits, this has already been done by agreement between Virginia and the owners of the debt, and that, too, to their mutual satisfaction. There is no controversy then between the plaintiff and defendant as to this feature of the case.

Is Virginia interested in ascertaining West Virginia's equitable proportion of said debt, if such there be? No; because Virginia, as we have seen, is not liable to her creditors for such part, and because she is to receive nothing in this suit on account of such part. No controversy, therefore, exists between the two states as to what is West Virginia's just or equitable proportion of said debt, if she be liable at all, inasmuch as it is neither due nor payable to Virginia, but to the holders of the unfunded part of said debt.

If a controversy exists with reference to what Virginia has done with her creditors touching said debt, upon what is such controversy based? Not under the act of 1871; because while she assumed a conditional liability under such act as to the unfunded part, she has been entirely released as to the certificates issued thereunder therefor by virtue of the acts of 1882 and 1892, whereby the holders of said debt agree to look to West Virginia for payment thereof without recourse upon Virginia. It is not by the form of the certificates issued under the act of 1871 that the holders thereof are to look to West Virginia for their payment, but by the very terms of the acts of 1882 and 1892, which the creditors themselves accepted.

There is no controversy created by the act of 1879; because the certificates issued thereunder representing the portion of the debt not funded under the act of 1871, were accepted under the express agreement that the creditors were to be without recourse upon Virginia.

Inasmuch as Virginia is, by express agreement with her creditors, not liable for the unfunded portion of her debt, represented by the certificates issued by her, and for payment of which portion she sues in this suit; and inasmuch as any liability for such portion of the debt as may attach to West Virginia, is to the holders of the certificates, and not to Virginia, Virginia has no such interest in this suit as enables her to enforce payment of said unfunded part of the debt.

Party Without Interest Cannot Maintain an Action.

The principle is well settled that a party cannot maintain a suit when another party is the real beneficiary in any judgment or decree that may be obtained in such suit.

An agent or other like representative cannot bring suit in his own name.

People v. Booth, 32 N. Y. 397.
Wilson v. Shively, 10 Or. 267.
State v. Bradish, 34 Vt. 420.

In Bissell v. Spencer, 9 Conn. 267, cited above, an action of debt was brought by a state treasurer to enforce the payment of certain judgments rendered for fines against the testator of the defendant, who was sued as his personal representative. The fines were directed to be paid "to the treasurer of the State of Connecticut for the use of the treasury of said State." The declaration was demurred to, on the ground that the state treasurer had no interest in the sum sought to be recovered. The court below overruled the demurrer, and the Supreme Court of Connecticut, reversing the court below, in the course of its opinion said:

> "A person authorized to sue in a court of law must have a legal interest in the subject of the suit. If he is the servant or agent only of the creditor, the action cannot be sustained in his name: 1 Chit. Pl. 3, 5. That a person who has not the legal interest cannot maintain indebitatus assumpsit, is too clear to be disputed: 6 Conn. 312; and that even a promise by simple contract to the treasurer of a corporation is, by legal construction, a promise to his principal. The point has frequently been decided: Pigott v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & Pul. 147; Gilmore v. Pope, 5 Mass. 491; Bainbridge v. Downie, 6 Id. 253, 258; Gunn v. Cantine, 10 Johns. 387."

In Gunn v. Cantine, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 387, it appears that the action was assumpsit for money had and received for the use of the plaintiff. The plaintiff was the holder of a note which was turned over to him by the owner under a power of attorney authorizing him to sue and collect the same. The suit was brought in his own name. The Supreme Court of New York, in holding that the action could not be maintained, says:

> "It appears affirmatively, from the case, that the plaintiff had no beneficial interest in the money collected. He was a mere attorney employed by Simmons to collect this debt; and there was no express promise by the defendant to pay the money collected to the plaintiff."

The State v. New London, 22 Conn. 163, was an action of debt brought by the State of Connecticut against the town of New London to recover the sum of $1500 as a penalty for a violation of the statute requiring towns to appoint assessors and to cause them to be sworn. It was contended that the State could not maintain this action, but that it should be brought in the name of the financial agents of the State as the collectors of the State's revenue. The court, in overruling this objection, in its opinion said:

> "The penalties, incurred by a violation of this statute, are for the use of the treasury of the state, and the state alone has the legal interest in them, and not its officers. These officers are but agents, and cannot sue in their own names, unless empowered to do so by some statute. Spencer v. Huntington, 6 Conn. 312; Bissell v. Spencer, 9 Id. 267."

In Morris Canal ads. The State, 14 N. J. L. 411, the question arose whether or not the State could be made plaintiff in a writ of certiorari. The court, in discussing the question, in the course of its opinion said:

> "But, I apprehend, the state is never properly plaintiff in certiorari, where the object of the writ is to relieve individuals in matters affecting their private rights; unless the proceeding complained of has been instituted and carried on, by the state, in its corporate and political character, and for political or municipal purposes—in other words, the name of the state cannot be used, as plaintiff in certiorari; except in those cases > in which the individual, for whose benefit, or relief, it is sued out, cannot, upon legal principles, be himself the plaintiff; or where the state or the whole community have some rights, or interests, in the subject matter; not speculative or political, but direct and positive rights and interests, which are to be affected one way or the other. This will be found to embrace an extensive class of cases, relating to the public peace, the public revenue, the public defense, common and public highways, and many other matters of general interest and concern. In short, wherever the authority, or the interest, of the state, in the prosecution of any of the great purposes of government, comes into conflict with individual rights, and the state, either in its corporate name, or by its appropriate agents, is the actor, in carrying into execution those purposes: then the name of the state may be properly used by an individual complaining of, and seeking to be relieved against its proceedings. In such cases, the state yields a tacit consent to be made plaintiff in certiorari where that is the proper remedy, for the purpose of affording the citizen an opportunity of being heard in this court, and having the error corrected, if any has been committed."

In Wilson v. Shively, 10 Or. 267, the object of the suit was to have decreed the legal title held by the defendant to be in the relators—to have the state patent to certain tide lands alleged to have been procured by fraudulent representations by Shively to be canceled and annulled, and to compel a conveyance of the title held under the patent by the defendant Shively to the relators. In holding that this suit could not be maintained by the state, the court in its opinion said:

> "And the question which confronts us at the threshold of our inquiry, is the right of the relators to carry on a litigation in the name of the state for the object sought by the suit, and the authority of the court, in a case so constituted, to adjudicate upon it. For it will hardly be asserted, if the subject matter of litigation concerns the rights of private parties only and exclusively, and the state has no direct interest in > the prosecution or result of the suit, that state interference in such controversies ought not to be countenanced, or tolerated, either directly or upon the relation of private parties."

The court then considers the relation the state bears to the suit, or rather what interest it has in it, and, determining that the state has no interest in the subject matter of litigation, the court dismisses the action. The concluding sentence of the opinion is as follows:

> "It seems to us in facts thus constituted, in their relation of the state to them, and in consequences to be apprehended from such state interference, are objections of too serious a character to maintain this suit."

In State v. Bardish, 34 Vt. 419, the action was trespass for carrying away a quantity of tools and implements, the property of the State of Vermont. It was contended that the action could not be maintained by the state, but the court, in overruling this contention, in its opinion says:

> "It is evident both upon common law principles and upon inference from the legislation on this subject, that where there is no statutory provision to the contrary, actions by the state or for the benefit of the state are to be brought in the name of the state, in cases where, upon common-law principles, the legal interest in the subject matter is in the state."

In Lynch v. United States, 13 Okla. 142 (73 Pac. 1095), the action was brought by the United States to set aside a sale of land and cancel a patent issued by the United States. The main question discussed and decided in that case was whether or not the United States as plaintiff had such interest in the suit as authorized its maintainance. In discussing the question, the court in its opinion says:

> "The United States stands in no different relation as a suitor than any individual. When the government comes into a court to submit a question to judicial determination, she is not acting in her capacity as a sovereign, but as a litigant, claiming the same rights, and bound by the same rules, as any of her citizens under similar circumstances. This was expressly held in United States v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. 377 (10 L. Ed. 444); Brent v. Bank of Washington, 10 Pet. 596 (9 L. Ed. 547); United States v. Hughes, 11 How. 552 (L. Ed. 809); United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61 (25 L. Ed. 93); United States v. Minor, 114 U. S. 233 (5 Sup. Ct. 836, 29 L. Ed. 110). Hence, in determining whether the petition alleges such equities in the United States as against the defendants as will warrant the court in cancelling a patent, we must look to the general rule of chancery pleading in equity cases, and in determining these rules we need look only to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, where every phase of the subject has been discussed and determined."

Classifying the cases in which a suit of this sort may be maintained by the government, and disposing of the second and third classes, holding that the suit did not come under these classes, and which it is not material to consider here, the court comes to the first class, "Where, the government being the only party interested, the patent is charged to have been obtained by fraud," and in its opinion regarding this class the Court says:

"In this class of cases a court of equity will furnish relief where the United States has been defrauded, her interest prejudiced, or to protect the general public from wrongful imposition. But if the United States has not been injured, and will not be benefited by the rescission of the contract and cancellation of the patent, the court will not grant any relief. Ming v. Woolfolk, 116 U. S. 599 (6 Sup. Ct. 489, 29 L. Ed. 740).

"This case must be tried and tested by the rule stated in the San Jacinto Tin Co. case, supra, where it was said that the United States can no more sustain an action to cancel a patent than can a private individual, if it is apparent that the United States has no pecuniary interest in the remedy sought, and is under no obligation to the party who will be benefited to sustain an action for his use, or that there is no obligation on the part of the United States to the public. It clearly appears from the petition that the only persons who will be benefited from this proceeding are > the town site occupants who are residing on the land, and by their failure to make the proper town site application and tender the money for the land, and follow the same to a final disposition, they have forfeited all their rights under the law, and it is well settled that equity will not aid one who has had a full and complete remedy at law, and has failed to avail himself of such remedy."

In United States v. San Jacinto Tin Co., 125 U. S. 273 (31 L. Ed. 747), a suit brought by the United States to set aside and annul a patent for land issued in its name on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, the Court in its opinion said:

> "But we are of opinion that since the right of the government of the United States to institute such a suit depends upon the same general principles which would authorize a private citizen to apply to a court of justice for relief against an instrument obtained from him by fraud or deceit, or any of those other practices which are admitted to justify a court in granting relief, the government must show that, like the private individual, it has such an interest in the relief sought as entitles it to move in the matter. If it be a question of property a case must be made in which the court can afford a remedy in regard to that property; if it be a question of fraud which would render the instrument void, the fraud must operate to the prejudice of the United States; and if it is apparent that the suit is brought for the benefit of some third party, and that the United States has no pecuniary interest in the remedy sought, and is under no obligation to the party who will be benefited to sustain an action for his use; in short, if there does not appear any obligation on the part of the United States to the public, or to any individual, or any interest of its own, it can no more sustain such an action than any private person could under similar circumstances."

In State v. Warner Valley Stock Co., 48 Or. 378 (86 Pac. 780), the suit was brought by the state, through its attorney general, for the cancellation of a patent for swamp land given by the state. The case turned on the question whether or not the complaint showed on its face that the state has such interest in the controversy as to authorize it to maintain the suit. In the course of its opinion the court says:

> "Unless the plaintiff has some interest in the land in controversy, it has no right to maintain this suit."

In City of Atchison v. State, 34 Kan. 379, the syllabus of the case, as found in 8 Pac. 367, sufficiently states the matter in controversy and the point decided, without making any further explanation:

> "Where a city, without authority of law, caused a tax to be levied and extended upon the tax-roll for the purpose of creating a fund with which to pay certain bonds theretofore issued and delivered in payment of bridges that had been built therein, and after the tax-roll had come to the hands of the county treasurer for the collection of the taxes a number of the tax-payers of the city voluntarily paid the illegal tax thus levied: held, that the public has no such interest in the money thus paid as will authorize the state to interfere and to maintain an action in the name of the state, enjoining the treasurer from paying out the money so received by him, and from disbursing it in accordance with the will of those who paid the same."

In People v. Stratton, 25 Cal. 242, the first point of the syllabus is as follows:

> "The attorney general may file an information in the nature of a bill in chancery, to annul a patent for lands granted by this state to an individual, in a case where the matter involved in the suit immediately concerns the rights and interests of the state."

The third point of the syllabus in this case is as follows:

> "If the state has no interest in the subject matter, an information on the relation of the attorney general, on behalf of the state, to annul a patent cannot be sustained."

In the case of Kansas v. United States, 204 U. S. 331 (51 L. Ed. 510), the bill was filed by the attorney general of Kansas on behalf of the state as trustee for the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. of certain lands in the Indian Territory alleged to have been granted to the state for the benefit of the railway company. The case was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The Court, in the course of its opinion, said:

> "In our opinion it appears upon the face of the bill that the state of Kansas is only nominally a party, and that the real party in interest is the railroad company. Section 3 provides that patents should be issued not to the state, but to the company direct, which made the state nothing but a mere conduit for the passage of title. And this is so even if it were ruled that the state of Kansas was made trustee under §9, because it would only be trustee of the bare legal title. In very many cases 'in which the grant was directly to the railroad company, or in which the act of Congress required that the patents for lands earned should be issued not to the state, for the benefit of the railroad company, but directly to the company itself,' it has been held that the title vested absolutely in the railroad company. Sioux City and St. P. R. Co. v. United States, 159 U. S. 349, 364, 40 L. Ed. 177, 182, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 17, 23. * * * * In these circumstances we think it apparent that the name of the state is being used simply for the prosecution in this court of the claim of the railroad company, and our original jurisdiction cannot be maintained."

It seems to us that the case just cited is clearly in point, as the court holds that the real party in interest was not the State of Kansas but the railroad company, and that the name of the state was simply inserted in order to give color to the claim of jurisdiction in the Supreme Court of the United States. The court clearly indicates by this decision that in order to give this court jurisdiction of a controversy between states, the state bringing the action must prosecute it for her own benefit—that it must be a suit to protect the rights of the state as such, and not enure only to the benefit of private persons. The state herself must be interested.

In Smith v. Brittenham, 109 Ill. 450, 549, one of the main questions determined by the court was the interest of the plaintiff to maintain the suit. The court in passing on this point said:

"It is a well recognized rule that in equity the party having the beneficial interest in the subject matter of the suit must sue in his own name for any invasion of his rights in respect thereto, although the legal title may be in another. (Frye v. Bank of Illinois, 5 Gilm. 332; Elder v. Jones, 85 Ill. 384; Moore v. School Trustees, 19 id. 83.) It is also well settled that no one, in the absence of some statute authorizing it, can maintain a suit in chancery with respect to real estate to which he has neither the legal nor equitable title. (Bowles v. McAllen, 16 Ill. 30; Hoare v. Harris, 11 id. 24.) If such an interest in the complainant is indispensable to the commencement of the suit, as will be conceded, the conclusion would seem to follow that where a party having such interest commences a suit, and before any hearing or disposition of the cause upon the merits voluntarily transfers all of his interest to another, and the same is made to appear of record, as is the case here, the whole proceeding will become so defective for want of proper parties, that no valid decree can be entered in the cause until the complainant's assignee, by some supplemental bill, or otherwise, makes himself a party complainant to the suit—and this, indeed, is the well recognized doctrine and practice in such cases. Mason v. York and Cumberland R. R. Co., 25 Me. 82."

In Ashby v. Ashby, 39 La. Ann. 105 (1 So. 282), the suit was instituted by a plaintiff claiming to be judgment creditor of one of the defendants. Exception was taken on the ground that the petition disclosed no cause of action. This exception was deferred for decision to the merits of the case. The court in sustaining this exception announced the following as its decision as shown by the syllabus in the case:

"An action can only be brought by one having a real and actual interest, which he pursues. So, where one claiming to be a judgment creditor of another seeks to annul a mortgage executed by the latter in favor of his children on the ground of fraud, and the record shows that the judgment on which the suit is founded is not in favor of the plaintiff, but in favor of her minor children, for which she is tutrix, and who had attained their > majority before the action of nullity was brought, and they do not join in the action, the suit must be dismissed."

In Oakley v. Bend, 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 482, the action was brought in the name of certain persons as bankers who had received the note or paper sued on to collect the same, the authority to collect being transmitted under power of attorney given by the owners of the note. The court in holding that the plaintiffs had no such interest in the subject matter of the suit as authorized a suit in their own names, in its opinion, said:

> "A person who is a mere agent to sue for and collect money under a power of attorney cannot be a party to a bill for an account in his own name, nor to be joined as a co-complainant, with his principal. King of Spain v. Machaao, 4 Russ. 225, 240, recognized in Clarkson v. Depeyster, 3 Paige 337, as good ground of demurrer. As a general rule, if an agent institutes a suit under an authority from his principal he must do so in the name of his principal. Leigh v. Thomas, 2 Ves. 313. And, see Calvert, Parties, 229, 232, for the authority on the subject."
> "In the present case the bill alleges that the complainants are mere agents for the Bank of Leeds, in England, under a power of attorney transmitted to them by one of its officers duly authorizing the collection of the bill of exchange which the bank discounted and to whom it belongs. This being so, the bill should be filed in the name of the bank, if they have the corporate capacity to sue under the Act of Parliament mentioned in the bill; or if they have it not, then in the names of the individuals composing the bank; and it is no excuse that the names of all have not been transmitted or furnished to the agents here or that they are very numerous and constantly fluctuating. To avoid the inconvenience of numerous complainants and changes of interest, this court may allow a bill to be exhibited in the names of a few, in behalf of all interested in the bank. Calvert, 40, 41; Story, Eq. Pl. 97, 114-117."

Virginia, Being Without Interest in the Unfunded Debt Held by Third Parties, Cannot Constitute Herself a Trustee, and Thus Create a Controversy Between Herself as Trustee and the State of West Virginia, and Thereby Maintain This Suit as to Such Unfunded Part of Said Debt.

Virginia does not contend that she has any interest in the unfunded debt represented by the certificates issued by her which can in anywise enure to her benefit. She contends that she has a right to enforce payment of the unfunded debt in her capacity as trustee so far as said unfunded debt relates to third parties who own the same. It is settled by the decisions that a mere nominal trustee cannot maintain a suit in his own name.

Blake v. Allman, 58 N. C. 407.

Elwell v. Bursinger, 70 Tex. 120 (8 S. W. 77).

In State ex rel. Rife v. Hawes, 177 Mo. 360 (76 S. W. 653), the action was mandamus by the state against Hawes and others as a board of police commissioners of the city of St. Louis to compel them to draw a warrant in favor of the relator for payment for himself and others as members of the police force of the city of St. Louis. Judgment was rendered for the relator, and the respondents appealed.

Under the laws of the State of Missouri, a trustee of an express trust may maintain an action in his own name, provided the declaration of trust be in writing. The court found from the record in the case that the real owner of the claim or debt was an individual by the name of Blair; that there was no consideration paid to Blair by the relator or any one else for a transfer of the claim; that Blair never sold his claim to the relator, and never intended to do so; that Blair would receive the fruits of the litigation, and that the action was brought by the relator for himself and his fellows purely as a matter of economy. It was held that Hawes as trustee had no such interest in the matter involved in the action as to maintain it in his own name, and the proceeding was accordingly dismissed for want of interest in the plaintiff.

But we do not concede that Virginia, as to the unfunded debt not assumed by her, is a trustee in reference thereto. To say that Virginia is a trustee of the part of the old debt which Virginia arbitrarily declared is West Virginia's equitable proportion thereof, and for which she is no longer liable, is to announce the proposition that a trust may be created having for its sole object the institution of a law-suit, and that therefore Virginia may bring this suit. Such a proposition is wholly foreign to every principle of the law relating to express trusts. Indeed, after a valid express trust has been created, the legitimate duties of the trustee defined, and the legal title to the property has passed to the trustee, ordinarily the courts will not permit him to bring a suit touching the trust property unless the beneficiaries are also before the court.

The fundamental idea of any kind of a trust contemplates the legal title to the trust subject inhering in the trustee, while the benefits which it carries accrue to and belong to another. This is elementary law.

Wallace v. Wainwright, 87 Pa. 263.
Seymour v. Freer, 75 U. S. 202 (19 L. Ed. 306).
Commissioners v. Walker, 6 How. (Miss.) 143 (38 Am. Dec. 433).
1 Minor on Real Prop., sec. 459.
2 Washb. on Real Prop., 4th Ed. 458.
Tiedeman on Real Prop., sec. 325.

The Court says, in Seymour v. Freer, supra:

> "A trust is where there are rights, titles and interests in property distinct from the legal ownership. In such cases, the legal title, in the eye of the law, carries with it, to the holder, absolute dominion; but behind it lies beneficial rights and interests in the same property belonging to another."

Mr. Minor, speaking of a trust as to real property, says:

> "A trust estate is a right in equity to take the rents and profits of lands, whereof the legal estate is vested in some other person, called the trustee; and to compel such trustee (subject to the discretion which may be vested in him) to execute such conveyance of the land as the person entitled to the profits, who is called the cestui que trust, shall direct."

Mr. Washburn says:

> "A trust may, therefore, be defined as a use, which, though lawful in itself, the statute does not operate upon to execute in the cestui que use, whereby the legal estate is in one, while another has a right to a beneficial interest in and out of the same, the first being termed a trustee, the other a cestui que trust."

These few cases, of the very great number that could be cited, clearly establish the doctrine that a trustee is the holder of the legal title for some lawful and beneficial purpose, enuring to the benefit of a third party, usually called the cestui que trust.

It is also elementary law that, while the legal title gives the trustee dominion over the property in a court of law, in a court of equity the real owner is the cestui que trust. Here his rights are guarded and protected to the same extent as if he were the absolute owner.

To constitute a valid trust there must be a lawful and definite object to which the subject matter is to be devoted.

> 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 866, and the many cases there cited.

Here the object of the trust is definite. It is for the purpose, through the agency of the debt commission, by and with the advice and consent of the attorney general of Virginia, in the name of Virginia, to bring a suit against West Virginia for the recovery of this alleged debt represented by the certificates. This is not a lawful object. In all the multitude of decisions, either in this country or any other jurisdiction where the doctrines of the common law and equity have been recognized and prevail, has such an object of a trust ever appeared? Can a trust have such an object? We believe not. Is it not contrary to public policy thus to encourage litigation?

Virginia herself declined to bring any suit against West Virginia, and for the very valid reason that, as alleged by her, she has already adjusted her equitable proportion thereof and could have no interest in such a suit. She also declined to bring this suit, except at the request of the holders of these certificates and only on the condition that they should be turned over to the debt commission for that purpose, and that the beneficiaries would bear all the expenses of the litigation, even to the payment of the compensation and expenses of her own debt commission.

Is this suit, therefore, one brought by Virginia in her capacity as a trustee? That is, does she occupy the attitude before this Court of a lawful trustee acting under an express trust, bringing a suit to enforce a trust having a valid object and purpose? This question certainly carries its own answer in the negative.

But to recur to the proposition that a trustee of a valid trust will not be permitted to bring suit touching his trust property unless the beneficiaries are also before the court, reliance is had upon the following authorities:

Story Eq. Pl. (9th Ed.), sec. 207.
Fish v. Howland, 1 Paige Ch. (N. Y.) 20.
Reed v. Reed, 16 N. J. Eq. 248.
Monday v. Vance, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 374 (32 S. W. 559).
Ebell v. Bursinger, 70 Tex. 120 (8 S. W. 77).

In Ebell v. Bursinger, cited above, the following appears in the opinion of the court:

> "Two questions are presented by the assignment: First, was the cestui que trust a necessary party to the suit? and, second, can the objection for want of a necessary party be taken by motion in the court below after default or upon appeal? As to the first question, the general rule is well established that, in suits by or against the trustee for the recovery of the trust property, the beneficiary is a necessary party. Boles v. Linthicum, 48 Tex. 224; Huffman v. Cartwright, 44 Tex. 296; Hall v. Harris, 11 Tex. 300; Holland v. Baker, 3 Hare 72; Woodward v. Wood, 19 Ala. 213; Van Doren v. Robinson, 16 N. J. Eq. 256; Richards v. Richards, 9 Gray 313; Ward v. Hollins, 14 Md. 158; 1 Daniell Ch. Pr. (5th Ed.) 220, and note; Story Eq. Pl. §207; 2 Perry, Trusts, §873."

It is admitted that to this rule there are some exceptions. Thus, if the trustee holds the title to the property to manage and dispose of it and to do all other things to promote the purposes of the trust, he may represent the beneficiaries in a suit, and thus dispense with them as parties.

Kerrison v. Stewart, 93 U. S. 155 (23 L. Ed. 843).

So, another illustration is found in the case of trustees in a mortgage to secure a series of negotiable bonds upon the property of railroad companies.

Shaw v. Railroad Co., 5 Gray 162.

Or where the beneficiaries are so numerous that it would be inconvenient to make them parties.

Story Eq. Pl., sec. 207*a*.

But it will be borne in mind that these principles are applicable only to valid trusts, to express trusts having a lawful object.

Furthermore, these certificates were not issued by West Virginia. They were issued by Virginia without the consent of West Virginia. West Virginia never has recognized their legality, or Virginia's wrongdoing in issuing them. And these certificates are not held by the State of Virginia, but by seven members of a commission created by a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia, who as such commission are authorized and directed to negotiate with the State of West Virginia a settlement and adjustment of the public debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia. This joint resolution was approved March 6, 1894, and by an act of March 6, 1900, this commission was to receive and take upon deposit the certificates or to have the same otherwise placed or held on deposit subject to their control, upon an agreement and contract on the part of the holders of said certificates that if said commission would secure a settlement with West Virginia with respect to said certificates the holders would accept the amount realized upon such settlement from West Virginia "as a full settlement of all the claims thereunder." (R. pp. 47-51.)

Thus, it will be seen that this commission as an independent body holds these certificates by contract with the owners thereof that they will negotiate a settlement with West Virginia in regard to the matter. the State of Virginia disclaiming in the joint resolution any liability on account of these certificates; and likewise disclaimed such liability in the act of March 6, 1900, giving this commission power to take into its possession and control the certificates and to negotiate a settlement thereof with West Virginia.

The Principles of Law Governing Suits Between Private Persons Are Applied to Controversies Between States.

The principles of equity applicable in cases between individuals must necessarily be applied in the settlement of controversies between states when these controversies have been brought into court for settlement. The authorities are so numerous upon this proposition and the doctrine seems so well settled, that it scarcely seems necessary to cite them here; yet for the convenience of the court we cite a few of the many authorities bearing on this matter.

In considering the question of the rights of the State of Virginia in this suit, it must be constantly borne in mind that her rights as a state, when she becomes a suitor, are no greater or different from those of a private person. The same rules govern in such case as govern in suits between individuals.

In State v. Cloudt, ____ Tex. Civ. App. ____ (84 S. W. 415), which was an action brought by the state to recover taxes due the plaintiff on a section of land, the court says:

> "When a state appears as a party to a suit, she voluntarily casts off the robes of her sovereignty, and > stands before the bar of a court of her own creation in the same attitude as an individual litigant; and her rights are determined and fixed by the same principles of law and equity, and a judgment for or against her must be given the same effect as would have been given it had it been rendered in a case between private individuals."

In State ex rel. Taylor v. Lord, 28 Or. 489 (31 L. R. A. 473), which was an action by the State to enjoin the defendants from executing the provisions of a statute relative to the location and erection of a branch insane asylum, the court, speaking of what it had decided on a former appeal of that case, reported in 26 Or. 205, said:

> "When this case was here before (26 Or. 205, 25 L. R. A. 862) we held that a private individual could not have public officers enjoined from using public funds, unless it could be shown that some civil or property rights were being invaded, or, in other words, that the individual was going to get hurt by the transaction. Upon that principle it was decided that he should be required to show that the location and building of the branch asylum in eastern Oregon would be attended with greater cost and expense than if constructed at the capital, thereby increasing the burden of taxation which would be imposed upon him, with others, whose duty it is to contribute to the support of the government. It was also held that the state, suing in its corporate capacity, for the protection of its property rights, stood in no different or better position in this regard than an individual. This doctrine is supported by high authority. Allen, J., in People v. Canal Board, 55 N. Y. 395, says: 'When the state as plaintiff invokes the aid of a court of equity, it is not exempt from the rules applicable to ordinary suitors: that is, it must establish a case of equitable cognizance, and a right to the particular relief demanded.' And as is said by the same eminent jurist in People v. Ingersoll, 58 N. Y. 14 (17 Am. Rep. 178): 'A distinction is to be observed between actions by the people or the state, in right of the prerogative incident to sovereignty, and those founded upon some pecuniary interest or proprietary right. The latter are governed by the ordinary rules of law by which rights are deter> mined between individuals. To the same effect is the doctrine announced in People v. Fields, 58 N. Y. 514. See also 2 High, Inj., §1327. So that we then concluded the plaintiff herein occupied no better or superior position, from a legal standpoint, for enforcing the remedy sought to be invoked, than the plaintiff in Sherman v. Bellows, 24 Or. 553. From this position we see no sufficient reason for receding, as we believe it to be sound in law, and supported upon reason and authority."

The first point of the syllabus in the case of State ex rel Smyth, Atty. Gen., v. Kennedy, 60 Neb. 300 (83 N. W. 87), is as follows:

> "When a state invokes the judgment of a court for any purpose, it lays aside its sovereignty, and consents to be bound by the decision of the court, whether such decision be favorable or adverse."

To the same effect are the following cases:

> Green v. State, 73 Cal. 29 (14 Pac. 610).
> Harris v. State, 9 S. D. 453 (69 N. W. 825).
> State v. Paxson, 119 Ga. 730 (46 S. E. 872, 873).

This Court Follows the Former Practice of the Courts of King's Bench and of Chancery, in England, in Cases of Original Jurisdiction in Equity.

The rules of this Court governing controversies between States do not differ materially from those where individuals are parties. The principles of law are the same. This Court, in California v. Southern Pacific Company, 157 U. S. 229 (39 L. Ed. 683), the late Chief Justice Fuller delivering the opinion, said at page 248:

> "By the third of our general rules it is provided: 'This Court considers the former practice of the courts of King's Bench and of chancery, in England, as affording outlines for the practice of this Court; and will from time to time make such alterations therein as circumstances may render necessary.' This rule is, with the exception of some slight verbal alterations and the addition of the word 'former' before the word 'practice' in the first line, the same as original general rule seven, adopted August 8, 1791. 1 Cranch, XVII; 2 Dall.

411. And in cases of original jurisdiction it has been determined that this Court will frame its proceedings according to those which had been adopted in the English courts in analogous cases, and that the rules of court in chancery should govern in conducting the case to a final issue (Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 73 U. S. 12 Pet. 657; 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 23; 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 210; 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 233; Georgia v. Grant, 73 U S. 6 Wall. 241) although the court is not bound to follow this practice when it would embarrass the case by unnecessary technicalities or defeat the purposes of justice. Florida v. Georgia, 58 U. S. 17 How. 478."

The Court further says in the course of the opinion:

"We have no hesitation in holding that when an original cause is pending in the court to be disposed of here in the first instance and in the exercise of an exceptional jurisdiction, it does not comport with the gravity and finality which should characterize such an adjudication to proceed in the absence of parties whose rights would be in effect determined, even though they might not be technically bound in subsequent litigation in some other tribunal."

All through the foregoing case this Court keeps constantly before it the well settled doctrine of equity jurisprudence and practice in deciding original cases brought before it on the chancery side.

Many times this Court has been called upon to decide controversies between states. Examination will disclose that in each case there was some well marked ground as the basis of a controversy. We call the Court's attention to some illustrative cases of the principle that this Court, in determining the rights of parties in an equity cause of original jurisdiction, has always been governed by the doctrines obtaining in the English court of chancery.

In the case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 13 How. 519 (14 L. Ed. 249), the Court said:

"The rules of the High Court of Chancery of England have been adopted by the courts of the United States, and there is no limitation to the exercise of a chancery jurisdiction by these courts except the value of the matter in controversy, the residence or character of the parties, or a claim which arises under the laws of the United States and which has been decided against it in a state court.

In exercising this jurisdiction the courts of the Union are not limited by the chancery system adopted by any state, and they exercise their functions in a state where no courts of chancery have been established. The usage of the High Court of Chancery in England, whenever the jurisdiction is exercised, govern the proceedings. This may be said to be the common law of chancery, and since the organization of the government it has been observed."

See also the following cases:

Rhode Island v. Mass., 15 Pet. 233 (10 L. Ed. 721).

Florida v. Georgia, 58 U .S. 478 (15 L. Ed. 181).

This Suit Discloses no Controversy Between the Two States, as to the Unfunded Debt Represented by Certificates Owned by Individuals.

The agreement between the holders of the certificates and the Virginia Debt Commission provides for their return to said holders in case they are not collected (R., pp. 94, 98), and if collected a method is provided for the distribution of the proceeds of such collection among the owners of the certificates. (R., pp. 68, 69, 98.)

So it is apparent upon the record of this suit that the great Commonwealth of Virginia as a State has not an iota of interest in this suit or in its result. She does not even incur one cent of costs should it be decided against her. She was not to bring this suit except at the request of the holders of these certificates (R., p. 49), and not even then until she was first indemnified against any expense to her incurred by the bringing and carrying on of such suit. (R., p. 49.) If there be any controversy in reference to said debt, it is between the holders of said certificates and West Virginia, and not between Virginia and West Virginia.

The conditions upon which this suit was instituted were very much like those prescribed by the act of the legislature of New Hampshire, section 2 of which provided as follows:

"Upon each deposit being made, it shall be the duty of the attorney general to examine such claim and the evidence thereof, and if, in his opinion, there is a valid claim which shall be just and equitable to enforce, vested by such assignment in the State of New Hampshire, he, the attorney general, shall, upon the assignor of such claim depositing with him such sum as he, the said attorney general, shall deem necessary to cover the expenses and disbursements incident to or which may become incident to the collection of said claim, bring such suits, actions or proceedings in the name of the state of New Hampshire, in the Supreme Court of the United States, as he, the said attorney general, shall deem necessary for the recovery of the money due upon such claim; and it shall be the duty of the said attorney general to prosecute such action or actions to final judgment, and to take such other steps as may be necessary after judgment, for the collection of said claim, and to carry such judgment into effect, or, with the consent of the assignor, to compromise, adjust and settle such claim before or after judgment."

New Hampshire v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76 (27 L. Ed. 656, 659).

Section 3 of this act provided:

"Nothing in this act shall authorize the expenditure of any money belonging to this state, but the expenses of said proceedings shall be paid by the assignor of such claim; and the assignor of such claim may associate with the attorney general in the prosecution thereof, in the name of the state of New Hampshire, such other counsel as the said assignor may deem necessary, but the state shall not be liable for the fees of such counsel or any part thereof."

New Hampshire v. Louisiana, supra.

The State of New Hampshire became the holder, as assignee of one of its citizens, of a part of the bonded obligation of Louisiana for the purpose of requiring payment thereof from Louisiana, and for the purpose of coercing payment suit was brought by New Hampshire against Louisiana.

This Court in its opinion says:

"No one can look at the pleadings and testimony in these cases, without being satisfied, beyond all doubt, that they were, in legal effect, commenced, and are now prosecuted, solely by the owners of the bonds and coupons. In New Hampshire, before the attorney general is authorized to begin a suit, the owner of the bond must deposit with him a sum of money sufficient to pay all costs and expenses. No compromise can be effected except with the consent of the owner of the claim. No money of the state can be expended in the proceeding, but all expenses must be borne by the owner, who may associate with the attorney general such counsel as he chooses, the state being in no way responsible for fees. All moneys collected are to be kept by the attorney general, as special trustee, separate and apart from the other moneys of the state, and paid over by him to the owners of the claim, after deducting all expenses incurred not before that time paid by the owner. The bill, although signed by the attorney general, is also signed and was evidently drawn by the same counsel who prosecuted the suits for the bondholders in Louisiana, and it is manifested in many ways that both the state and the attorney general are only nominal actors in the proceeding. The bond owner, whoever he may be, was the promoter and is the manager of the suit. He pays the expenses, is the only one authorized to conclude a compromise, and if any money is ever collected, it must be paid to him without even passing through the form of getting into the treasury of the state. * * * * * *

"It is contended, however, that, notwithstanding the prohibition of the amendment, the state may prosecute the suits, because, as the sovereign and trustee of its citizens, a state is 'clothed with the right and faculty of making an imperative demand upon another independent state for the payment of debts which it owes to citizens of the former.' There is no doubt but one nation may, if it sees fit, demand of another nation the payment of a debt owing by the latter to a citizen of the former. Such power is well recognized as an incident of national sovereignty, but it involves also the national powers of levying war and making treaties.

As was said in U. S. v. Diekelman, 92 U. S. 524, if a sovereign assumes the responsibility of presenting the claim of one of his subjects against another sovereign, the prosecution will be as one nation proceeds against another, not by suit in the courts, as of right, but by diplomatic negotiation, or, if need be, by war.

"All the rights of the states as independent nations were surrendered to the United States. The states are not nations, either as between themselves or toward foreign nations. They are sovereign within their spheres, but their sovereignty stops short of nationality. Their political status at home and abroad is that of states in the United States. They can neither make war nor peace without the consent of the national government. Neither can they, except with like consent, enter into any agreement or compact with another state. Art. 1, sec. 10, cl. 3."

Discussing the effect of the Eleventh Amendment, taking away the right of an individual to sue a state of the Union, the Court says:

"The evident purpose of the amendment, so promptly proposed and finally adopted, was to prohibit all suits against a state by or for citizens of other states or aliens, without the consent of the state to be sued and, in our opinion, one state cannot create a controversy with another state, within the meaning of that term as used in the judicial clauses of the constitution, by assuming the prosecution of debts owing by the other state to its citizens."

An examination of the pleadings and exhibits filed with them unquestionably discloses that the real parties to this suit are the holders of the Virginia deferred certificates, representing West Virginia's alleged proportion of the old debt, on the one side, and the state of West Virginia on the other, and hence cannot be maintained in this Court.

In Ex parte Ayers, 123 U. S. 443 (31 L. Ed. 216), this court held that—

"Whether a suit is within the prohibition of the Eleventh Amendment is not always determined by > refence to the nominal parties on the record, but by a consideration of the nature of the case."

The principle here announced is considered in the opinion at some length, from which we take this excerpt:

> "The very question was presented in the cases of New Hampshire v. Louisiana, and New York v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76. In each of those cases there was upon the face of the record nominally a controversy between two states, which, according to the terms of the Constitution, was subject to the judicial power of the United States. So far as could be determined by reference to the parties named in the record, the suits were within the jurisdiction of this Court; but, on an examination of the cases as stated in the pleadings, it appeared that the state, which was plaintiff, was suing, not for its own use and interest, but for the use and on behalf of certain individual citizens thereof who had transferred their claims to the state for the purpose of suit. It was accordingly unanimously held by this Court, that it would look behind and through the nominal parties on the record, to ascertain who were the real parties to the suit."

In order to create a "controversy between two states," there must be an actual controversy between them in which both parties have an interest. The word "controversy" has been the subject of frequent consideration by the federal courts, and especially as it relates to the removal of causes from a state to a federal court. In all the cases in which it has been the subject of judicial consideration it is treated as meaning an actual controversy in which both parties have an interest.

Sheldon v. Keokuk N. L. P. Co., 1 Fed. 789.

Every case that has ever come before this Court involving a controversy between states, has been one affecting boundaries and jurisdiction over lands, or cases directly affecting the property rights and interest of a state.

This is the conclusion deduced by Mr. Justice Shiras from an exhaustive examination of the cases bearing on the subject in Missouri v Illinois, 180 U. S. 208 (45 Law Ed. 497), and a review of the cases by Mr. Justice Brewer in South Dakota v. North Carolina, 192 U. S. 286 (48 Law Ed. 448).

The cases illustrating the soundness of this deduction may be thus classified:

New Jersey v. New York, 5 Pet. 285 (8 Law Ed. 127); Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. 657 (7 Law Ed. 1233); Florida v. Georgia, 11 How. 293 (13 Law Ed. 702); Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall. 39 (20 Law Ed. 67); Missouri v. Iowa, 7 How. 660 (12 Law Ed. 861); Florida v. Georgia, 17 How. 478 (15 Law Ed. 181); Alabama v. Georgia, 23 How. 505 (16 Law Ed. 556); Louisiana v. Mississippi, 202 U. S. 1 (50 Law Ed. 913); Missouri v. Kentucky, 11 Wall. 395 (20 Law Ed. 116), and Maryland v. West Virginia, 217 U. S. 1 (54 L. Ed. ....), recently decided by this Court, were cases relating to the boundary lines of the respective states bringing the suits.

In Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How. 18 (14 L. Ed. 249), it appeared that the state had constructed lines of transportation connecting with the Ohio river, a navigable stream, from the tolls upon which the state derived a revenue, and the defendant, a corporation of another state, had constructed a bridge across said river, by reason of which the navigation was obstructed and the revenues of the state decreased. The court sustained its jurisdiction in this case because of the injury resulting directly to the State of Pennsylvania.

The case of Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U. S. 208 (45 Law Ed. 497), involved a threatened injury by the State of Illinois to the health and prosperity of the inhabitants of Missouri and an injury to that portion of the bed or soil of the Mississippi River which lies within the territory of Missouri.

In South Dakota v. North Carolina, 192 U. S. 286 (48 Law Ed. 448), the title to the bonds sued on was vested absolutely in the State of South Dakota, and they were not held in a representative capacity, as in the case of New Hampshire v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76 (27 Law Ed. 656), as they were given outright unconditionally to the plaintiff state in that case.

In Florida v. Georgia, 17 How. 478 (15 Law Ed. 181), the United States was permitted to intervene because she was the proprietor of a large part of the land situated within the disputed boundary, ceded by Spain as a part of Florida. The State of Florida was also deeply interested as a proprietor.

In the exercise of their jurisdiction, the federal courts have often felt called upon to decide whether or not the state had such an interest in the subject matter of litigation as to uphold or defeat the jurisdiction of the court.

To determine in whom the real interest resides or inheres, the court will look beyond the nominal parties. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Hickman, 163 U. S. 53 (46 Law Ed. 78). From the record in the cause it will ascertain whether or not the judgment or decree will operate upon the pecuniary or material interests of the state, or upon the interests of individuals only. In the case last cited this Court in its opinion says: "Was the state the real party plaintiff?" In answering this question, the court discusses the practice after the adoption of the Eleventh Amendment, and shows that in determining whether or not a state is the real party plaintiff or defendant, it will go behind the mere allegation as to the nominal party; and, applying this principle, says:

> "It may fairly be held that the state is such real party when the relief sought is that which inures to it alone, and in its favor the judgment or decree, if for the plaintiff, will effectively operate. Such a case was Ferguson v. Ross, 3 L. R. A. 322, 38 Fed. 161. There an action was brought in the name of Ferguson, a shore inspector, against Ross and others, to recover a penalty. The statute of New York authorized the suit to be prosecuted in the name of the inspector, but all the moneys recovered were payable into the treasury of the state, and it was held by the circuit court for the eastern district of New York that the action was one in which the real party plaintiff was the state. It was for its sole benefit that the action was brought, and it alone was to be benefited by the recovery."

The case from which we have just quoted was a suit brought in a state court of Missouri against certain individuals constituting the State Board of Railroad and Warehouse Commissioners of the state, and in which the state court had refused to order a removal to a federal court. The question involved was, on the motion for removal, whether or not the state was the real party in interest. The Missouri court held that it was, and the state not being a citizen within the meaning of the removal act, of course there could be no removal, if indeed the state were the real party in interest, and not the board of commissioners.

In considering the question whether or not the state was the real party in interest, the Court says:

> "It is true that the state has a governmental interest in the welfare of all citizens, in compelling obedience to the legal orders of all its officials, and in securing compliance with all its laws. But such general governmental interest is not that which makes the state, as an organized political community, a party in interest in the litigation, for if that were so the state would be a party in interest in all litigation: because the purpose of all litigation is to preserve and enforce rights and secure compliance with the law of the state, either statute or common. The interest must be one in the state as an artificial person."

As stated by this Court, the supreme court of Missouri held that the state had a direct pecuniary interest in the result of the litigation, by virtue, first, of its possible liability for costs, and, secondly, because, were the litigation pushed to the extreme, there might be penalties imposed which would, when collected, pass into the school fund of the state. This Court holding that these considerations, actuating the supreme court of Missouri to decide as it did, were not sufficient to make the state the real party in interest, and says:

> "We are of opinion, therefore, that the party named in the record as plaintiff is the real party plaintiff, and that the voluntary assumption by the state of the costs in some contingencies of the litigation, or the indirect and remote pecuniary results which may follow from a disobedience of the orders of the court, do not make it > the party to whom alone the relief sought inures, and in whose favor a decree for the plaintiff will effectively operate."

So, it is by invoking this principle that the court will look beyond the mere allegations of the pleadings, with reference to parties, and ascertain and determine, for the purposes of its jurisdiction, who are the real parties in interest. Ex parte Ayers, 123 U. S. 443 (31 Law Ed. 216).

In Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 711 (27 Law Ed. 448), though nominally a suit between individuals, the Court held that the real party to be affected by the action of the Court was the state, because its judgment must operate against the state itself. And may we not say, converso, that if the judgment or decree of the Court does not operate in favor of the state it is not, nor can it be, a party plaintiff?

In Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U. S. 769 (27 Law Ed. 468), it was held that a suit to compel the officers of a state to do the acts which constitute a performance of its contracts by the state is a suit against the state itself, although the state is not nominally a party to the suit.

The cases could be multiplied illustrative of the principle that the court will and must look to the effect of its judgment or decree in determining the question as to whether the state is the real party whose rights or interests will thereby be affected so as to make it a plaintiff or a defendant in the suit, as the case may be.

Alabama v. Burr, 115 U. S. 413 (29 Law Ed. 435), was a suit at law brought in this Court by the State of Alabama against citizens of the States of Massachusetts and New Jersey. The defendants demurred generally to the declaration. The demurrer presented the question whether the facts in the declaration were sufficient to support the action. The court in considering the demurrer concluded that the state in her declaration failed to show any such acts affecting the interests of the plaintiff as authorized her to maintain the suit. The Court in its opinion said that the injury to innocent stockholders by the wrongful acts of the company and the defendants was direct and immediate, because their property was taken and fraudulently converted to the use of the defendants or other wrongdoers. "To the state, however," said this Court, "the injury, if any, was both indirect and remote, because the state had no direct claim upon, or interest in, the property which was misappropriated." Therefore, the Court, by a unanimous opinion, sustained the demurrer and dismissed the action.

New York v. Connecticut, 4 Dall. 3 (1 Law Ed. 715), was an application by the plaintiff for an injunction to stay proceedings in certain ejectment causes brought in the State of Connecticut. The prayer for injunction was argued with great force and ability. The plaintiff was not a party to the ejectment suits, but it was contended that New York was interested to preserve peace and good order, to protect individuals, to indemnify those who trusted to her faith and even to prevent dismemberment of her territory: that this political and moral obligation and regard for her public improvements and fiscal operations, created an interest of the highest character in the government of New York, and one entitling her to maintain this bill for the purpose of its prayer. But the Court held that the State of New York was not a party to the suits below, nor interested in the decision of those suits, and that the injunction ought not to issue. Thereupon the attorney general of the State of New York said to the Court: "In every grant by New York, there is a reservation of gold and silver mines, and of five acres per cent for roads The bill might, besides, be amended, by averring the state to be interested in a residuum of the land, if that would be sufficient to sustain the prayer for an injunction." Mr. Justice Washington replied: "The amendment would not satisfy me; for my opinion is founded upon the fact, that New York is not interested in the suits below." The actions of ejectment were brought by grantees of Connecticut against grantees of New York to obtain possession of the land.

An examination of all the cases decided by the federal and state courts discloses no instance wherein the state has been permitted to maintain an action or suit, the judgment or decree of which would not inure to the state. In other words, the courts have placed the right of suit on the part of a state upon the same principle with reference to interest, that is always applied in suits by individuals.

An Accounting Cannot Be Maintained by Virginia in This Suit.

One part of the prayer of the bill in this case is > "that all proper accounts may be taken to determine and ascertain the balance due from the State of West Virginia to your oratrix in her own right and as trustee" (R., pp. 16, 17).

Whether this bill may be maintained for an accounting as to matters claimed in her own right we shall presently consider; but that it cannot be maintained in her representative capacity as a trustee seems to us quite clear. The suit in her capacity as trustee relates to the unfunded part of the debt in the hands of third parties, from which Virginia has been released, and which is alleged by Virginia to be one-third of the original debt existing on January 1, 1861.

It is a cardinal principle that no bill can be sustained for an accounting when the plaintiff in its own right is not interested in the result of such accounting. Under no circumstances can Virginia be interested in any account that may be taken as to the unfunded part of said debt which is claimed by Virginia and her creditors to be West Virginia's equitable proportion. There are several grounds for this lack of interest:

First, because Virginia and her creditors agreed to the amount which Virginia should assume as her part.

Second, because her bill and its exhibits show she will receive no part of the proceeds of the unfunded debt if West Virginia should pay any part thereof, but that all of it belongs and will go to the holders of said certificates, which represent such unfunded part.

Third, because West Virginia's liability, if any exists, is direct to the creditors and not to Virginia, as heretofore shown by the Wheeling Ordinance, the West Virginia Constitution of 1862 and the acts of the General Assembly of Virginia.

To sustain this suit on the ground of an accounting would violate one of the cardinal principles underlying this branch of the jurisdiction of a court of equity. It is elementary law that the person seeking an account must have an interest of some sort to promote as a result of the accounting. If there be no such interest, the bill can not be maintained.

Nicholas v. Anderson, 8 Wheat. 365 (5 Law Ed. 637).
Ball v. Carew, 13 Pick. 28.
McCabe's Appeal, 22 Pa. St. 427.

In Nicholas v. Anderson, supra, a bill in equity was filed by and in the name of the attorney general of Virginia, under the authority of a special act of the legislature of that state, passed on October 15, 1813, for the better locating and surveying of the lands given to the officers and soldiers on continental and state establishments. The act provided that all persons holding officers' and soldiers' warrants by assignment should pay down to the principal surveyor, at the time of the delivery of such warrants, one dollar for every hundred acres thereof, exclusive of the legal surveyor's fees, toward raising a fund for the purpose of paying all contingent expenses, etc. The act further provided that the deputations of officers should appoint two principal surveyors, who were accordingly appointed, one of whom was the defendant, and who immediately took upon himself the duties of the office, and exacted, in virtue of the act of 1783, from all the holders of the military warrants, the one dollar per one hundred acres as provided in the act. The bill charged that the defendant had received a large sum of money in this way and had refused to account for the same to the complainant and the agents and attorneys appointed for this purpose under the act of 1813. It also charged a misapplication of the money; and that the deputations of officers, under the act of 1783, did appoint superintendents, etc., but that most of them had long since died, and that the surveyors had declined to act for many years. The bill proceeded to state the substance of the act of 1813, which authorized one Colonel John Watts, the surviving superintendent, agent to settle with defendant, and to receive the moneys remaining unappropriated in his hands, and, if not paid, to sue for and recover the same in the name of the attorney general of Virginia; and then charged that the defendant refused to account with Watts, and concluded with a prayer for an account, discovery and general relief.

To this bill the defendant demurred: and the circuit court of Kentucky, upon argument, sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill. The case then came to this Court by appeal.

Mr. Justice Story, who delivered the opinion of the Court, after stating the case in substance as here stated, said:

> "The question in this case is, whether the demurrer was well taken. In support of the decree, two points are stated at the bar: 1st, that the plaintiff has not shown any interest in the subject, entitling the State of Virginia to maintain the bill: 2nd, that if there was originally any resulting authority to the state to compel an account, that power, by the erection of Kentucky into an independent state, devolved on the latter state, the defendant having been, and still continuing to be, a citizen of that state: and that it was not competent for the legislature of Virginia, in 1813, to pass a law which should bind a citizen of Kentucky to account for official duties which were not performed in virtue of any appointment made by the government of Virginia.
> "It is unnecessary to consider the last objection, because we are of opinion that the first is fatal to the bill. The act of 1783, for the better locating and surveying the lands given to the officers and soldiers on continental and state establishments, authorizes the deputations of officers, therein named, to appoint superintendents, in behalf of their respective lines, for the purpose of surveying the lands; and also to appoint two principal surveyors, and contract with them for their fees, etc. The third section of the act then provides, 'that every person or persons holding officers' or soldiers' warrants, by assignment, shall pay down to the principal surveyors, at the time of the delivering such warrant or warrants, one dollar, for every hundred acres thereof, exclusive of the legal surveyor's fees, toward raising a fund for the purpose of supporting all contingent expenses; or, at the option of such holder or holders, the same may be held up until warrants of all the original grantees have been surveyed; the said surveyors to account for all the money so received to such person or persons as the said deputations may direct.' This is the clause upon which the bill is founded. And it is apparent, that in terms it provides for an accountability, not to the state, but to persons to be appointed by the deputations of officers; to those for whose benefit the fund was raised, and was to be applied, and not to the state, which had no interest whatsoever in it."

We are now brought to the second ground of recovery stated in the bill, which relates to

That Part of the Debt Not Held by Third Persons, But Which Virginia Avers She Holds in her Literary and Sinking Funds, in Her Own Right and Not as Trustee.

As to this part of the bill, we refer the Court to the answer: and, so far as pertinent to this phase of the case, the answer of West Virginia is as follows:

"This respondent denies that there was in addition to the above mentioned liability to the general public any other indebtedness evidenced by bonds held by and due to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund of the said State of Virginia as created under her laws, amounting, the former to $1,462,993, and the latter to $1,543,669.05, or to any other sums, as of the same date, as in the said bill is alleged, because this defendant avers that the commissioners of these two funds were and are mere state agencies, and public officials of the state, created by said State of Virginia to have the custody of and to preserve certain of her financial resources and obligations to be made available for specific purposes when necessary, and which now belong exclusively to Virginia and are held for her sole and exclusive use and benefit. Respondent denies that any of the bonds or certificates so alleged to be held by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund were ever negotiated or sold by the State of Virginia, or that the same constituted a part of the public debt of that state on the first day of January, 1861, and denies that the certificates representing > one-third of such bonds are now a part of the said public debt; and respondent avers that the State of Virginia has long since voluntarily canceled all of said bonds and the same are no longer of any force or validity."

It will be seen that the answer of the defendant controverts the allegations that the bonds held by the Commissioners of the Sinking and the Literary Funds of the State of Virginia constitute any part of the debt of Virginia within the meaning and contemplation of the said Ordinance of 1861, or of the constitution of West Virginia of 1862, and denies that such bonds so held constitute, or ever constituted, a part of the public debt of Virginia existing on the first day of January, 1861.

The commissioners of these two funds are mere state agencies or instrumentalities created by the Commonwealth of Virginia, to care for and preserve certain of her own financial resources, available for specific purposes, and which belong exclusively to Virginia. A few of the old bonds of Virginia issued prior to 1861 were by her converted into immediately available money by being deposited with these commissioners, and were therefore never sold and the title never transferred from her so as to create a liability against the state herself, and hence at no time was there ever any right of action or liability on account of these old bonds so deposited with the said commissioners which could properly be asserted against the old state. In other words, these few old bonds deposited with these commissioners did not create any debt against the State of Virginia. At no time or under any circumstances could these bonds have been made or become a legitimate subject matter of controversy or suit against the Commonwealth of Virginia. To make them such, would present the grotesque spectacle of a sovereign state suing herself for an accounting and payment to herself of her own funds, already under her absolute control.

Again: There can be no liability in favor of the Commonwealth of Virginia against the State of West Virginia on these bonds so held. The moneys in the sinking fund which purchased these bonds previous to the first day of January, 1861, were raised by the revenues of the entire state before the division, and they were therefore the property of such entire state; and being owned by the state itself, the debtor, they were a dead asset both as to that portion of the state which passed into the new state and the State of Virginia as she remained, and Virginia claiming to be such owner has no more right to institute and prosecute a suit thereon against West Virginia than would West Virginia if a similar bond had fallen into her possession. If there is any liability in respect to said bonds it is a liability of the State of Virginia to the State of West Virginia for a portion thereof.

Then, if this were the status of Virginia as to the old bonds held by the commissioners of her Sinking Fund and Literary Fund prior to 1861, and which remained unchanged at the time of the formation of the State of West Virginia, could their refunding and the issuance of the deferred certificates as to the one-third of them, alter this status with reference to her right of suit thereon, or as to any part of them? The propounding of the question must evoke a negative answer.

The idea of debt necessarily implies an obligation payable by the debtor to some third party—a creditor existing independently of the debtor, and over whom, as to the obligation asserted, the debtor can have no control, and in the use or disposition of which the debtor has no right or interest whatever.

Upon what principle or ground or reason can Virginia claim that the old bonds placed by her with her commissioners of the Sinking and Literary Funds, were or are now any part of her ante bellum debt? We are wholly unable to perceive any. In fact, there is none.

If it be contended that the commissioners of the Sinking and Literary Funds are distinct entities from the state, persons clothed with an existence distinct and separate from the commonwealth, with the right to assert a liability against Virginia on account of these old bonds acquired by them prior to the erection of the territory contained within the boundaries of West Virginia into a state, then this Court cannot entertain jurisdiction of this suit, because these commissioners are necessary parties thereto; and the commission, having been created and existing by vrtue of the laws of Virginia, must be a citizen of Virginia, and if a distinct entity, it must necessarily be a corporation having its domicile in Virginia, where it was created.

Thus, it is seen that, in any aspect of the case, this Court has no jurisdiction of this suit so far as the certificates belonging to these commissioners are concerned. This feature itself of this cause can constitute no ground of controversy between the parties to the bill.

In the case of Roe v. Marchand, 86 Va. 107 (9 S. E. 995), we find the court saying:

> "A debt is an obligation due from one person to another, payment of which the latter has a legal right to enforce."

See also the case of Harris v. Larsen, 24 Utah 139, 1414 (66 Pac. 782).

The learned Master to whom this cause was referred had before him the question whether or not the bonds held by Virginia through the agency of her Literary and Sinking Funds constituted any part of the debt existing on the first day of January, 1861.

After careful consideration he deduces the following conclusion:

> "I am satisfied that the great weight of reason and authority is against the contention of the plaintiff, and I therefore find that the Sinking Fund with interest, and the Literary Fund with interest, within the meaning of the decree, were not a part of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia on the first day of January, 1861" (Rep., p. 28).

True, Virginia has excepted to this part of the report; but the reasons assigned by the Master for his conclusion are so cogent, and the authorities cited and relied on by him in his report so conclusive, that further consideration of the question is not necessary. Therefore, we contend that Virginia cannot maintain this suit because of any claim by her on account of the certificates held by the Literary and Sinking Funds.

Virginia Is Not Entitled to Contribution from West Virginia.

The third ground stated in the bill upon which Virginia seeks relief alleges that Virginia has paid off or retired, of principal and interest of said debt, a sum considerably in excess of $25,000,000, which she owns in her own right, and on account of which she avers that she has

> "a just claim against West Virginia for contribution to the extent of West Virginia's equitable liability therefor" (R., p. 13, Par. XVI of bill).

By reference to exhibit 3 of the bill (R., pp. 26, 38, and especially pp. 27-32), it will be seen that Virginia, by this act of her legislature, makes a full and detailed statement of the whole debt existing on January 1, 1861, stating it with reference to four distinct periods, to-wit: as of January 1, 1861; July 1, 1863; July 1, 1871; and July 1, 1882. Ascertaining by this statement the entire debt as of January 1, 1861, she by this act fixes as her just proportion thereof two-thirds of the entire debt. This statement purports to show the accrued interest and the various payments made by Virginia on account of said debt and its interest. It shows that she credits herself with every dollar paid by her on account of this debt, and deducts the aggregate of such payments from her assumed just proportion of two-thirds of said debt. By repeated declarations she avers this to be her just proportion, at the same time declaring the residue, one third, to be West Virginia's just proportion of said debt. It further shows that no part of any sum paid by Virginia on said debt was ever paid on account of any part of the one-third of said debt alleged to be West Virginia's just proportion. In fact, as shown by the record Virginia has paid nothing on account of any part of said debt she claims West Virginia should pay.

The answer of West Virginia with reference to this feature of the bill is as follows:

> "For further answer to said bill respondent avers that if any sum has been paid by Virginia, even though amounting in the aggregate to $25,000,000, including principal and interest to date, calculated at the rate of 6 per centum per annum, it was paid by her on account of her admitted just and equitable proportion of said public debt created prior to January 1, 1861; and if she has any claim at all against West Virginia on account of said alleged payment, which is not admitted, but is denied, it can only be for such amount as may be ascertained upon the basis and according to the principles embodied in section 9 of the ordinance of the Virginia convention, as hereinbefore stated. So this respondent denies that she is liable for any part of the obligations mentioned in paragraph XV and paragraph XVI of the plaintiff's bill, alleged to have been taken up and paid on account of said public debt, and denies that the said Commonwealth of Virginia has, in her own right, a 'just claim' against West Virginia for contribution on account thereof.

"Respondent, for further answer to said paragraph XVI of said bill, avers that all accounts, vouchers and other records relating to the said public debt of Virginia, showing the payments made thereon, if any, and all other facts connected therewith, are now and always have been in the exclusive possession and control of the plaintiff, and respondent has no knowledge or information concerning the alleged payment of $25,000,000, or any other sum, on account of said debt existing prior to January 1, 1861, and therefore denies that plaintiff has paid said sum of $25,000,000, or any part thereof, and demands strict proof." (R., p. 157.)

Thus the answer positively denies any payment by Virginia on account of said debt which entitles her to contribution from West Virginia, thereby placing Virginia upon proof of this feature of her bill. The record is entirely barren of any proof in support of this allegation. Virginia could not properly take proof to bring this feature of the bill in issue, by reason of her failure to file a replication to the answer. In fact, the evidence, as shown by the contents of exhibit 3 of the bill, instead of supporting the bill in this regard, proves the truth of this part of the answer.

The cardinal principle of contribution is founded in and controlled by the doctrine of equity and natural justice, whereby one of two common debtors who has paid more than his just share of the common debt shall be permitted to call upon the other to contribute such sum to the one who has paid it all as will equalize the burden between the two.

The Bill Multifarious.

The question whether the bill is multifarious is yet open for discussion and decision. This Court, in disposing of the demurrer in this case, says:

> "Consideration of the objections of multifariousness, misjoinder of parties and of causes of action, may properly be postponed until the final hearing of a bill filed by the Commonwealth of Virginia against the State of West Virginia, which seeks an adjudication of the amount due the former by the latter as the equitable proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia which was assumed by West Virginia at the time of its creation as a state."
>
> Virginia v. West Virginia, 206 U. S. 290 (51 L. Ed. 1068).

And in a subsequent opinion, in referring the cause to a master, the Court said:

> "The answers to these inquiries to be without prejudice to any question in the cause."
>
> Virginia v. West Virginia, 209 U. S. 514 (52 L. Ed. 914).

One of the grounds of the defendant's demurrer filed to the plaintiff's bill was that of multifariousness, consisting in uniting two separate and distinct demands in the same bill. One of the grounds for an accounting set out in the bill is the claim or demand which Virginia asserts in her own right under two acts passed by the legislature of Virginia, on the 3d of February, 1863, and the 4th of February, 1863. This part of the bill appears in paragraphs VIII. and IX. of the bill at pages 7 and 8 of the record. The first act, under which it is alleged that certain property was transferred by the Commonwealth of Virginia to the State of West Virginia, reads as follows:

> "That all property, real, personal and mixed, owned by, or appertaining to this state, and being within the boundaries of the proposed state of West Virginia, when the same becomes one of the United States, shall thereupon pass to, and become the property of the State of West Virginia, and without any other assignment, conveyance or transfer or delivery than is herein contained, and shall include among other things not herein specified all lands, buildings, roads, and other internal improvements or parts thereof, situated within said boundaries, and vested in this state, or in the president and directors of the literary fund, or the board of public works thereof, or in any person or persons for the use of this state, to the extent of the interest and estate of this state therein; and shall also include the interest of this state, or of the said president and directors, or of the said board of public works, in any parent bank or branch doing business within said boundaries and all stocks of any other company or corporation, the principal office or place of business whereof is located within said boundaries standing in the name of this state, or of the said president or directors, or of the said board of public works, or of any person or persons, for the use of this state." (R., pp. 7, 8.)

By the fifth section it was enacted:

> "That if the appropriations and transfers of property, stocks, and credits provided for by this act, take effect, the State of West Virginia shall duly account for the same in the settlement hereafter to be made with this state, provided that no such property, stocks and credits shall have been obtained since the reorganization of the state government." (R., p. 8.)

The bill then charges that the property transferred to the state of West Virginia under this act was received and enjoyed by that state, and consisted of a number of items, the value of which amounted in the aggregate to "several millions of dollars," the bank stocks alone having realized to the state about "six hundred thousand dollars." (R., p. 8.)

The second act is as follows:

> "1. That the sum of One Hundred and Fifty Thousand Dollars be, and is hereby appropriated to the State of West Virginia out of moneys not otherwise appropriated, when the same shall have been formed, organized and admitted as one of the states of the United States.
>
> "2. That there shall be, and hereby is appropriated to the said State of West Virginia when the same shall become one of the United States, all balances, not otherwise appropriated, that may remain in the treasury, and all moneys not otherwise appropriated that may come into the treasury up to the time when the said State of West Virginia shall become one of the United States; provided, however, that when the said State of West Virginia shall become one of the United States, it shall be the duty of the auditor of this state to make a statement of all the moneys that up to that time have been paid into the treasury from counties located outside of the boundaries of the said State of West Virginia, and also all moneys that up to the same time have been expended in such counties, and the unexpended surplus of all such moneys shall remain in the treasury and continue to be the property of this state." (R., pp. 8, 9.)

And the bill alleges that the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, "together with other sums belonging to the State of Virginia," were received and collected by the State of West Virginia, after its formation. It is also alleged in said bill in clause four of paragraph XVIII., at page 14 of the record:

> "The State of West Virginia has, since her creation as a state, received from the State of Virginia real and > personal property, amounting in value to many millions of dollars, and held and enjoyed the same, but upon expressed condition that she should duly account for the same in a settlement thereafter to be had between her and the Commonwealth of Virginia." (R., p. 14.)

This feature of the bill is intended to embody the demand made by the commonwealth of Virginia in her own right, separate and distinct from any claim or demand of the creditors of Virginia.

The other feature of the bill presents the claim of Virginia, for an accounting with West Virginia for the latter's proportion of the public debt of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861.

It is alleged in the bill that on the 20th of August, 1861, the commonwealth of Virginia, in convention assembled, at the City of Wheeling, adopted an ordinance "to provide for the formation of a new State out of the portion of the territory of this state," and then quotes section 9 of the ordinance. (R., pp. 6, 7.)

It then alleges that West Virginia was admitted into the Union on the 20th of June, 1863, under a constitution which contained the following provisions:

> "5. No debt shall be contracted by this state except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the state, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, or defend the state in time of war."
>
> "7. The legislature may, at any time, direct a sale of the stocks owned by the state, in banks and other corporations, but the proceeds of such sale shall be applied to the liquidation of the public debt, and hereafter the state shall not become a stockholder in any bank."
>
> "8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this state, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years." (R., p. 9.)

As is shown in the bill and elsewhere in this brief, Virginia settled with the holders of the old public debt by issuing new bonds for two-thirds of the amount thereof, which amount she declared to be her equitable proportion of such debt; and the creditors agreed thereto, and accepted the bonds. Virginia arbitrarily declared that the other one-third of the amount of her debt was the proportion for which West Virginia was liable, and for such one-third she issued certificates; and her creditors agreed thereto and accepted the certificates and released Virginia from all liability therefor. The bill then alleges:

> "By each of the acts for the settlement of her debt above recited, it was provided that the bonds of undivided Virginia so far as not funded in the new obligations given by your oratrix, should be surrendered to and held by your oratrix, who either by the express terms of the settlement provided for by said acts, or as a just and equitable consequence therefrom, received and holds said original bonds so far as unfunded in trust for the creditor who deposited the same with her, or his assigns; and certificates to this effect were given by your oratrix to each creditor whose old Virginia bond was so surrendered to her." (R., p. 12.)

And it is also further alleged in the bill that:

> "All of the bonds and obligations and other evidence of the indebtedness of the original State of Virginia outstanding and contracted on January 1, 1861, as stated in paragraph 1 of this bill, except a comparatively insignificant sum, not amounting to one per cent of the aggregate of those liabilities, have been taken up and are now actually held by your Oratrix, and she has the right to call upon West Virginia for a settlement with respect thereto." (R., pp. 12, 13.)

The several acts of the legislature of Virginia under which the debt was adjusted and the contracts made under which the certificates issued by the state have been deposited with the commission in trust for the purpose of bringing this suit, are exhibited with and made part of the bill; and it is alleged that "this suit has been instituted at the request and direction of the said Commission, and in strict conformity with the provisions of said Act of March 6, 1900." See paragraph XX. of said bill, at p. 15 of Record.

Virginia seeks to obtain a decree in her own right for an alleged indebtedness against West Virginia, "evidenced by her bonds and other liabilities held by and due to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and Literary Fund of the State, as created under her laws amounting, the former to $1,462,993.00, and the latter to $1,543,669.05." in addition to the other claims made in her own right. See par. I. of bill, at p. 3 of Record

Another feature of the bill is that which sets up a claim on the part of Virginia in her own right against West Virginia for the unfunded debt represented by the certificates held by the Literary and Sinking Funds, financial agents employed by Virginia as part of the policy of facilitating the administration of her state government.

A further demand made by Virginia in her own right is that for contribution, which is purely an equitable demand. This we have already discussed, and again call the court's attention to this feature of the case to present more clearly the proposition of multifariousness.

In Haines v. Carpenter, 1 Woods 262 (Fed. Cas. No. 5905), a demurrer was filed to the bill, one ground of which was multifariousness. In discussing this point the Court said:

> "By multifariousness is meant the improperly joining in one bill, distinct and independent matters and thereby confounding them: as, for example, by uniting in one bill several matters perfectly distinct and unconnected against one defendant, or the demand of several matters of a distinct and independent matter against several defendants in the same bill. 1 Coop. Eq. Pl. 182; Saxton v. Davis, 18 Ves. 72. In this bill the controversy raised by the heirs at law of the testatrix, touching the validity of the bequest of the will, is united with the claim of the heirs of George W. Graves, the husband of testatrix, to the property disposed of by the will; they claiming that the property descended to them, and did not belong to the testatrix, and could not therefore pass by her will, and with the suit of Elias W. Dennis, a creditor of the succession, whereby he seeks to recover judgment against the estate, and with a demand for an account to be rendered by the executor. I do not think the adjudged cases furnish a better illustration of a multifarious bill. A bill by a creditor sought an account against an executor and trustee of the testator's estate, and also to set aside a sale made by the executor and trustee to a purchaser who was made a party to the bill; it was held demurrable for multifariousness, for the purchaser had nothing to do with the general settlement of the accounts of the estate, and ought not to be involved in any litigation respecting it. Salvage v. Hyde, Jac. 151. So when devisees and legatees brought a bill against the trustees and executors under the will and against a mortgagee of part of the estates, alleging collusion between the trustees and executors and the mortgagee, and that they refused to compel the mortgagee to account for the rents and profits, or to redeem the mortgage, and the bill prayed for an account of the testator's effects, and that the mortgage might be redeemed: the bill was held on demurrer by the mortgagee to be multifarious, for the mortgagee had nothing to do with the general settlement of the accounts of the estate. Pearse v. Hewitt, 7 Sim. 471. The case when unconnected parties are allowed to be joined in a suit are where there is one common interest among them all, centering in the point in issue in the cause. Ward v. Duke of Northumberland, 2 Anstr. 469."

In this case there was a uniting in the bill of different claims in different rights, and the court held that this was the uniting of several matters of a distinct and independent nature against several defendants in the same bill. This decision was subsequently affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, in 91 U. S. 254.

In Cassels v. Vernon, 5 Mason 332 (Fed. Cas. No. 2503), the bill was objected to on the grounds that the plaintiff united in his bill a claim for money as administrator of Mrs. Cassels, and also a claim in his individual capacity. The court in discussing this objection said:

"The bill is certainly incorrect in this union of inconsistent claims; and if the objection had been taken upon demurrer, it would have overthrown the bill.

unless an amendment was allowed. Courts of equity will not permit distinct and independent titles to be set up in the same bill, for that would be to allow multifariousness; much less will it permit inconsistent titles, or alternative titles, for that might tend to very inconvenient consequences in point of evidence. It is the duty of the party who seeks the assistance of the court, to state his own title directly, without any alternatives, and not to put the court upon the duty to select, out of many, any one, which it may ultimately think, upon the evidence, can be supported. See Salvage v. Hyde, Jac. 151; Edwards v. Edwards, Id. 335; Mole v. Smith, 1 Jac. & W. 665. This difficulty, however, could have been gotten rid of by an amendment; and coming on after a full answer, and a hearing by consent of parties, the shortest course will be to dismiss the bill as to all claims, except that made in the representative character."

In Jones v. Foster, 50 Miss. 47, the pertinence of the case and the points of law applicable here appear in the syllabus, which we here copy:

"Where J., as guardian of certain minors, sold real estate on time, under an order of the probate court, and took notes for the purchase money, and F. becoming the purchaser; and afterwards, J. sold other real estate, as administrator, and F. became the purchaser again, and executed notes for the purchase money, J. filed his bill to enforce his lien on the notes payable to him, both as guardian and as administrator; held, that the bill was bad for multifariousness.

"The bill cannot join several distinct, unconnected subjects, against the same defendant or against several defendants.

"A party cannot be pursued in the same suit in the double capacity of guardian and administrator, because the liabilities are separate and independent. Wren v. Gayden, 1 How. 365. The complainant, representing in his own person, separate and independent capacities and rights, and the defendant F. is pursued in respect to separate and distinct estates, acquired in different rights. Where several subjects are united, it must > appear, that as to the subject matters and the relief, all the defendants are connected, though differently, with the entire subject in dispute."

In Van Mater v. Sickler, 9 N. J. Eq. 483, the court said at page 484:

> "Second. The bill is multifarious. One object of the bill is to settle the personal estate of Isaac B. Van Mater. The complainant, as next of kin, calls on the defendant, who is the personal representative of the intestate, to answer in that capacity. But the complainant also, as an heir at law, calls upon the defendant to account for certain rents and profits which have come into his hands. It appears, from the bill, that the persons entitled to the rents, claim them as heirs at law, through their mother, who was the wife of the intestate. There are others than the heirs at law entitled to the rent, who, as next of kin, are interested in the distribution of the estate which the defendant represents. It is manifest, therefore, that these accounts cannot be settled in the same suit."

In May v. Smith, Busbee's Eq. 196 (N. C.) (57 Am. Dec. 594), the bill was filed by Peter May as the administrator with the will annexed of Reading Anderson, and part of the prayer is "that the defendants may account with the plaintiff for the assets of the deceased in their hands;" and another prayer is that the defendants may account "for the effects belonging to your orator deposited in their hands by the deceased." The court in holding that the bill could not be sustained said:

> "Here are two distinct and independent causes of action united: one to call in and collect the assets of the deceased; and the other to follow the effects of the plaintiff, effects due to him individually and in his own right. At law, an executor or administrator can not join a count for a debt due to him individually with one in his representative capacity. Neither can they be joined in equity; Adams' Eq., 2d Ed. 567; Darone v. Fanning, 4 Johns. Ch. 199; Bedsole v. Monroe, 5 Ired. Eq. 315. And the reason assigned is, that different decrees and proceedings might be > required: for convenience, therefore, the joinder will not be permitted. For this cause the defendant might have demurred."

In Bosley v. Phillips, 3 Tenn. Ch. 649, a widow filed her bill to charge the defendant with a fund alleged to have been entrusted to her for delivery to the complainant by the husband, on his deathbed, as a gift causa mortis; and upon its being held by the supreme court, that the personal representative of the husband was a necessary party to the suit, the complainant took out letters of administration on the husband's estate, and asked leave to file an amended bill individually and as administratrix, praying relief either in her own right or in her representative capacity. The court refused to permit the amendment on the ground that to do so would be to allow the uniting in the same bill in chancery of distinct and hostile claims.

In Sylvester v. Boyd, 166 Mass. 445, the plaintiffs filed a bill against James O. Boyd and others. One of the prayers of the bill was that an account be taken of Boyd's doings as trustee in order that justice be done to the plaintiffs. None of the other defendants had any interest in the money alleged to have been misappropriated by Boyd, and none of them had any interest in his doings generally and his account as trustee. The plaintiffs also charged the making of a conveyance of valuable real estate and personal property to Peckham, which they averred was in violation of the duty of Boyd as trustee. The court in sustaining the demurrer said:

> "It is clear that different causes of action are joined which cannot properly be tried together, and that the demurrers should be sustained on the ground that the bill is multifarious. Cambridge Water Works v. Somerville Dyeing & Bleaching Co., 14 Gray 193; Metcalf v. Cady, 8 Allen 587; Sanborn v. Dwinell, 135 Mass. 236; Keith v. Keith, 143 Mass. 262."

In Leslie v. Leslie, 84 Fed. 70, a bill was filed seeking to enforce the performance of a trust in real property, and also to quiet complainant's title to the same property. The court in holding the bill multifarious, said:

> "Under the state procedure, the complaint, as the pleading was there styled, would have been bad on account of a misjoinder of causes of action. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. sec. 427: Reynolds v. Lincoln, 71 Cal. 183, 9 Pac. 176, 12 Pac. 449. The general rules of equity practice which obtain in this court conduce to the same result. The bill is multifarious, in that it joins two distinct and unconnected grounds of equitable relief. 1 Fost. Fed. Prac., secs. 71-74."

In Inman v. New York Interurban Water Co., 131 Fed. 997, the bill was filed to settle the right of ownership of stock of a corporation, and asking relief depending upon the ownership of such stock. The court held the bill multifarious, saying:

> "To settle such right and to ask relief which depends upon the right are two independent, disconnected and unrelated questions, and the bill which attempts to join them in one suit is multifarious. Shields v. Thomas, 18 How. 253, 259 (15 L. Ed. 368); Walker v. Powers, 104 U. S. 245 (26 L. Ed. 729)."

In Cumberland Valley Railroad Company's Appeal, 62 Pa. St. 218, the ninth point of the syllabus reads:

> "Charging two sources of right by a plaintiff renders a bill multifarious."

Point eleven of the syllabus of the same case is:

> "A bill is multifarious by the joinder of distinct, independent and separate causes of complaint, requiring different defenses and different decrees."

In Alexander v. Alexander, 85 Va. 353, especially at page 363, the court in discussing the doctrine of multifariousness, quoting from Lord Cottenham in Campbell v. Mackey, 1 My. & Cr. 603, says:

> "It is utterly impossible to lay down any rule applicable universally, or to say what constitutes multifariousness as an abstract proposition. For 'the cases upon the subject are extremely various, and the court, in deciding them seems to have considered what was convenient in the particular circumstances rather than to have attempted to lay down any absolute rule.' Yet, it will seldom, if ever, be found difficult to determine whether multifariousness exists in the particular case, if we will only bear in mind these cardinal rules > upon the subject, namely, that a bill will always be deemed multifarious, where several matters joined in the bill against one defendant are so entirely distinct and independent of each other that the defendant will be compelled to unite, in his answer and defense, different matters wholly unconnected with each other, and as a consequence the proofs applicable to each would be apt to be confounded with each other, and great delays might be occasioned respecting matters ripe for hearing by waiting for proofs as to some other matter not ready for hearing."

As has been seen, the certificates held by Virginia in her own right through the agency of the Literary and Sinking Funds, constituted no part of her debt, and are therefore eliminated from this suit. Therefore, now the only claim asserted by Virginia with reference to the debt is by virtue of her alleged holding of the certificates or canceled bonds in trust as to that part of the debt which Virginia claims should be paid by West Virginia to the holders thereof. If anything can be recovered at all in this suit on account of said debt, it must be that part which Virginia alleges she holds in trust for the creditors. She does not pretend to claim anything in her own right by virtue of any part of this unfunded debt. She has no interest in it, but is simply suing in her capacity as trustee for the sole use and benefit of the private persons who are holders of these certificates. This raises a very different controversy from that involved as to the claim asserted by Virginia in her own right.

To settle the claim of Virginia asserted in her capacity as trustee, it is necessary to decide whether or not the ordinance is to control the question, or the provision inserted in the constitution of West Virginia adopted in 1862, or whether the ordinance and the constitution shall be read in pari materia. In addition to this, the Court must determine whether or not the assumption by West Virginia of a just proportion of this debt was direct to the creditors themselves, so that the obligation inures to them only, or whether it was to Virginia, who might collect the same and distribute it to the creditors. Furthermore, in deciding this question of the right of Virginia to sue as trustee many other matters must be considered and decided in order to reach a proper conclusion as to what constitutes a just proportion of this debt to be borne by West Virginia.

The claim asserted by Virginia in her own right arises under the two acts of February 3 and 4, 1863 (R., pp. 7, 8; App. to R., pp. 128, 131)—acts passed by Virginia long after the adoption of the ordinance and constitution by which an assumption of a just proportion of the public debt was made. The determination of the amount of the claim under these acts depends upon the extent of the property received by West Virginia and its market value at the time received. In this part of the bill Virginia as trustee, representing the creditors who hold the unfunded debt, has not a particle of interest. A very different character of evidence is required to establish it, and it is absolutely a distinct and separate claim from that with which Virginia is concerned as trustee.

It is true that courts of equity will so act in the administration of justice, if they may properly do so, as to avoid a multiplicity of suits; but in the language of Judge Woods in Haines v. Carpenter, Fed. Cas. No. 5905, "Courts of equity will not allow a multifarious bill as a remedy for a multiplicity of suits."

In presenting the question of multifariousness, we have done so upon the assumption, which we think we may justly indulge, that this Court will be governed by its rules of practice applicable to cases involving an exercise of its original jurisdiction. In cases of this character, this Court has in many instances determined that its proceedings should be framed according to those which had been adopted in the English courts in analogous cases, and that the rules of courts in chancery should govern in conducting a case to its final determination.

Virginia asserts a claim for money against West Virginia; with reference to a part thereof, she asserts it as trustee; with reference to another part she asserts it in her own right. These claims are derived from different sources. It seems utterly irreconcilable, with the principles of justice, that she should be permitted to uphold this demand upon any other doctrines than those which obtain in a court of equity in cases of like character when asserted by the individual citizen. The application of any other principle would involve every controversy between states in the mazes of uncertainty and doubt; and all interstate communication involving transactions resulting in litigation, in the utmost confusion and capriciousness. Virginia cannot enter this Court and invoke any other doctrines than those which prevail in cases of common right as recognized by courts of equity. This Court will not embarrass itself by settling this controversy upon any other grounds or by invoking any other considerations. It is simply a contest between two litigants in a court of equity, whose conduct must conform to its exaction and be measured and determined by its principles.

We here call the Court's attention to that part of the argument made by the late Honorable John G. Carlisle, upon the demurrer to the bill which relates to its multifariousness, and for the convenience of the Court we here copy it:

Mr. Carlisle's Argument.

"We confidently submit that the outline of the bill heretofore given and the exhibits made part of it show conclusively that it is multifarious, and that the demurrer ought to be sustained on that ground, if any good cause of action is shown over which this court has jurisdiction.

"Virginia suing in her own right upon a separate and independent cause of action alleged to belong exclusively to her is not the same party as Virginia suing as trustee upon a different cause of action for the use and benefit of others who have no interest in her claim.

Moreover, the state could not sue in equity in her own right in one bill, upon two causes of action so entirely separate and distinct from each other as the claim for money and property alleged to have been delivered to the defendant under the acts of the legislature, and the claim founded upon the compact for the defendant's just proportion of the old public debt, even if she had paid that debt and was entitled to contribution. The foundations of the two causes of action are wholly different, and they are of a wholly different nature and require different judgments or decrees. They involve different questions of law and fact, and a defense which would be good against one would be wholly inapplicable to the other."

" 'Multifariousness,' says Foster, 'consists in the joinder of two or more distinct and unconnected grounds for equitable relief, each of which might be the foundation for a separate bill. This may occur in three ways—by misjoinder of plaintiffs; by misjoinder of defendants, and by misjoinder of grounds for equitable relief held by and against the same parties.'

> " Foster, Fed Prac., sec. 71; Calvert on Parties, Book I, ch. VII.

" Story says:

> " 'By multifariousness in a bill is meant the improperly joining in one bill distinct and independent matters, and thereby confounding them; as, for example, the uniting in one bill of several matters perfectly distinct and unconnected, against one defendant, or the demand of several of a distinct and independent nature against several defendants in the same bill.'
>
> " Story's Equity Pl., sec. 271.

" Again, it is stated by Story (section 533):

> " 'The result of the principles to be extracted from the cases on this subject seems to be that where there is a common liability and a common interest, a common liability in the defendants, and a common interest in the plaintiffs, different claims to property, at least if the subjects are such as may without inconvenience be joined, may be united in one and the same suit.'

"In Daniel's Chancery Practice, page 335, it is said:

> "'It may be that the plaintiffs and defendants are parties to the whole of the transactions which form the subject of the suit and nevertheless those transactions may be so dissimilar that the court will not allow them to be joined together, but will require distinct record.'

"In Brown v. Guarantee Trust Co. (128 U. S. 404) this Court said:

> "'To support the objection of multifariousness because the bill contains different causes of suit against the same person, two things must occur: first, the ground of suit must be different; second, each ground must be sufficient as stated to sustain a bill. Bedsole v. Monroe, 5 Iredell Eq. 313; Larkins v. Biddle, 21 Ala. 252; Nail v. Mobley, 9 Ga. 278; Robinson v. Cross, 22 Conn. 171.'

"See also Shields v. Thomas, 59 U. S. 253 (18 How.).

"In Walker v. Powers, 104 U. S. 245, a case analogous to the present, there was a misjoinder of plaintiffs and a misjoinder of causes of action. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, and the case of Emals v. Emals, 14 McArthur (N. J. Eq.) 114, and Sawyer v. Noble, 55 Me. 273, were cited and approved.

> "'In order to determine whether a suit is multifarious, or, in other words, contains distinct matter, the inquiry is not, as this defendant supposes, whether each defendant is connected with every branch of the case, but whether the plaintiff's bill seeks relief in respect of matters which are, in their nature, separate and distinct.'

"In Church v. Citizens' Street Railway Company, 78 Fed. 529, the court said:

> "'Multifariousness consists in stating against the same party two or more independent causes of action in the same bill; or it may consist in stating one or more causes of action against a portion of the defendants and another cause of action against another portion of the defendants.'

"In that action the plaintiffs, who had purchased stock in a corporation, attempted to secure relief for themselves in their own right on one cause of action, and also to secure relief against the same defendants for themselves and all other stockholders on another cause of action. The court held the bill multifarious.

"In Metropolitan Trust Co. v. Columbus & Hocking Ry. Co., 93 Fed. 689, Judge Taft said:

"'It is also true that a cause of action in favor of one in his own right is as distinct from a cause of action in favor of the same person as trustee as it is from that of a different person. And therefore that a defendant against whom a trustee attempted to unite in the same bill with a cause of action asserted by him as trustee a wholly distinct cause of action in his individual right might object on the ground of multifariousness. In the case before us the defendant railway company might therefore be heard to urge this defect in the bill, because it asks for an enforcement of two different liens held in different rights.'

"But the court held that the objection to the bill for multifariousness could not be taken by Zohorst and the Second National Bank, 'for,' said the court 'as to that issue made by the complainant as trustee the right is the same.' And again the court said: (p. 691):

"'Upon that issue the complainant as trustee and in its own right has precisely the same interest. And the union of the two causes of action does not embarrass

> Zohorst or the bank in the slightest; for as to them, the causes of action raised but one narrow question.'

"The difference between that case and the case at bar is obvious at a glance. In the case at bar the bill alleges two entirely separate and distinct causes of action arising out of two unconnected transactions, in one of which it alleges an interest in the plaintiff state, and in the other an interest as trustee, and thus presents two distinct series of issues to be investigated and decided. And, besides, it is perfectly clear that the State of Virginia has not the same interest in the cause of action alleged in her own right and in the one asserted as trustee; nor can the State of West Virginia make the same defense to both.

"In Hall v. Fisher, 20 Barb. (N. Y.), the plaintiff sued in its own name and also as administrator, alleging that he and his intestate were during the lifetime of the latter tenants in common, the intestate owning three-fourths and the plaintiff owning one-fourth of a lot of land; and his claim was that the defendants should account to him individually and to him as administrator for their share of rent and profits. The court held that the cause of action should have been separately stated. It said:

> "'How else can the defendant, if he has a defense of a different character as to each co-tenant, avail himself of such defense? He might in this case have one defense against the plaintiff as to his personal claim and another defense as to the interest whose rights he claims to represent as administrator. It cannot be regular for a plaintiff to include in the same action claims in his individual right and as administrator of another. It was never allowed at common law and is not sanctioned or allowed by any statute, not even the Code.'

"It is evident that the State of Virginia, having been by contract with her creditors discharged from all liability for the one-third of the old debt represented by the certificates, has no pecuniary interest whatever in the alleged claim against West Virginia for which she sues as trustee; and it will not be contended, we presume, that the owners of the unfunded one-third of the ante-war debt, whether it is represented by the canceled bonds held in trust by the state or by the certificates, have any interest whatever in the claim of Virginia for money and property alleged to have been transferred to West Virginia under the acts of 1863. The unfunded one-third of the old bonds formerly held by the Virginia Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund is in the same position as that belonging to the other creditors. Virginia has solemnly and repeatedly declared that she was not liable for the one-third, has refused to pay it or any part of it, and has canceled the bonds and issued to the Sinking Fund and Literary Fund the same kind of certificates issued to other creditors. The fact that the commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund are agencies of the state, would simply show that the state owed that part of the debt to herself. But the state has released herself from the obligation for one-third of the bonds originally held by these funds and has thereby withdrawn from them that proportion of the sum which she originally intended they should have. Unless, therefore, the two funds, as agencies of the state, now have a valid claim against West Virginia, their demands have been fully satisfied and extinguished. In any aspect, the claim is asserted by Virginia to recover from West Virginia for contribution on account of money which she (Virginia) has never paid.

"The claim against West Virginia under the compact cannot be divided into separate parts, so that Virginia can sue in her own right or for the commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund for the part represented by the certificates held by those two funds, and also sue as trustee for another part held by different parties. The claim is an entirety and the amount is to be ascertained in solido, in the manner provided by the compact, and is to be paid in the manner provided by the compact. Whatever the amount might be, it was all payable to Virginia herself, and not to the bondholders, who never had a cause of action against West Virginia, even if the state had been suable; and they cannot create a cause of action for their own benefit, in the name of the state, by the process of having Virginia transfer the indebtedness, or a part of it, to them by the enactment of statutes or the issue of certificates or otherwise, and then transferring it back to the state as trustee. But whether the state is, or could be, legally a trustee, or whether, if she be legally a trustee, she could maintain an action in this cause in that capacity, makes no difference in the decision of the question of multifariousness, for the bill and exhibits show that for nearly, if not all, of the unfunded one-third of the debt she actually sues as trustee in this action and not otherwise; and that is sufficient to sustain the contention that there is a misjoinder of parties and a misjoinder of causes of action. Even, therefore, if it should be held that the state is suing in her own right for a judgment and recovery of the amount represented by the certificates held by the two funds and as trustee for the holders of the other certificates, it would furnish another substantial reason for holding the bill to be multifarious. Besides, it would show that there is a conflict between the personal interest of the trustee and the interests of the cestuis que trust, for whatever the trustee might receive in her own right in the distribution of the sum recovered would, to that extent, diminish the portions of the other beneficiaries; and it is a well established rule that plaintiffs whose interests are conflicting cannot unite in the same action—a rule which ought to be rigidly enforced, especially when one of the plaintiffs sues as trustee for the others, and consequently controls the entire proceeding.

" Walker v. Powers, 104 U. S. 245."

The argument of Mr. Carlisle, from which the foregoing extract is taken, is filed in this Court in a printed brief, and will be found also in West Va. Compilation, Vol. I., pp. 157-219.

It will be seen, therefore from the positive statements of the bill, that the plaintiff has sought to unite and assert in this suit at least four different demands; three whereof are claimed to be due to her in her own right, in which her creditors have no interest whatever, and as to which there must necessarily be a separate and distinct defense made by the defendant—a claim for which a decree must be entered, if entered at all, in favor of the Commonwealth of Virginia alone. Two of these demands asserted in her own right arise from an entirely different source from the other demand asserted in her own right, one of which is based upon statutes passed long after the adoption of the ordinance of Virginia and the constitution of West Virginia, and in which the measure of relief to which Virginia is entitled, if she is entitled to any, must be determined upon very different grounds and considerations from those which must determine the liability of West Virginia, if any exists, with reference to the claim by Virginia asserted in the bill as trustee for her creditors; and the other of which claims asserted by Virginia in her own right, being that for contribution, is based upon purely equitable grounds, not necessarily predicated upon the right of accounting, and is of course a subject in which the creditors have not a particle of interest.

The Plaintiff's Suit Barred by Laches.

It seems to us that, under the circumstances of this case, a final and complete answer to the claim asserted by Virginia in her representative capacity as trustee, is her laches, or that of those whom she represents as a nominal plaintiff in this suit, especially as to that part of the bill which seeks an accounting as to the unfunded debt, and as to which Virginia herself disclaims all liability.

West Virginia was admitted into the Union on June 20, 1863, and any liability which existed against her with reference to any part of said debt existed and could have been asserted against her at that time. Instead of taking any steps looking to the settlement of West Virginia's just or equitable proportion of said debt, if any existed, Virginia in 1866, three years after West Virginia's admission into the Union, brought a suit in equity in this Court touching the boundaries of the two states, which terminated March 6, 1871, when the case was decided in favor of West Virginia.

On March 30, 1871, just twenty-four days after the decision of the case just mentioned, Virginia passed an act arbitrarily making a division of the debt herself, without consulting West Virginia, on the basis of two-thirds to herself and one-third to West Virginia, and without any authority issued the so-called West Virginia certificates for such one-third to the holders of the original debt, who, so far as the record in this case discloses, are still the owners of said certificates, Virginia canceling the bonds representing the old debt which had been surrendered to her by the holders thereof, and holding said bonds, as alleged by her, in trust for the owners of said certificates. In 1879, with these certificates still outstanding, and so far as the record discloses still in the hands of the former owners of the bonds evidencing the original debt, Virginia passed another act relating to the whole debt, refunding the entire debt under the provisions of the act of 1879, and as to so much of the original debt as had not been funded under the act of March 30, 1871, Virginia under this act of 1879 issued certificates for the one-third of such unfunded debt, which certificates were to be taken and held as a full and absolute release of the State of Virginia from all liability on account of such certificates.

This act of 1879 further provided that Virginia would

> "negotiate, or aid the creditors holding all such certificates issued under this act or previous acts in negotiating with the State of West Virginia for an amicable settlement of the claims of such creditors against the State of West Virginia."

It will be seen from the foregoing that with this last act of 1879, and the other two acts passed subsequently, namely, the acts of 1882 and 1892, the provisions of which funded the entire debt, the holders of which so far as the record discloses were the holders of all the certificates, Virginia simply assumed to negotiate with West Virginia to secure the payment of these certificates by West Virginia to the holders thereof. The bill itself makes no claim for Virginia to any part of the unfunded debt represented by these certificates, held by third parties, but Virginia has simply constituted herself the holder thereof in trust for the creditors, the real claimants as to the part of the debt represented by these certificates, the owners and holders of said certificates being the owners and holders of the bonds evidencing the original debt of the State of Virginia created before and existing on January 1, 1861. An examination of the certificates issued under the acts of March 30, 1871 (R., pp. 83, 84), March 20, 1879 (R., p. 36), and February 14, 1882 (R., pp. 43-4), specifically designates and identifies the bond or bonds representing the former debt, and each certificate shows which of the original bonds was surrendered, the amount thereof assumed by Virginia, and the balance thereof not assumed by Virginia, but for the payment of which the holder of the original bond, being the holder of the certificate, was referred by Virginia to West Virginia. Therefore, every certificate issued by Virginia was surrendered to the owner of the bond, and when Virginia funded any bond upon the two-thirds basis assumed by her she delivered to the holder of the old bond in lieu thereof a new bond issued by Virginia for two-thirds of the original debt and a certificate for the other one-third; or, in the language of the certificate, the balance of such bond, designating the amount, "to be accounted for by West Virginia." So, at the time of the delivery of these certificates and new bonds under these various acts, the holder of the original debt was then also the holder of the new bond for two-thirds of the original debt and was at the same time the holder of the certificate representing the other one-third. Such owner, so far as the record shows, is still the holder of the certificates, and was such holder at the time the acts of 1871, 1879, 1882 and 1892 were enacted and put into operation.

The record fails to disclose any change of ownership of these certificates. If such change of ownership did take place by sale or transfer to other parties, there is no allegation to that effect, nor is there any proof showing such sale or transfer.

We say that the owners and holders of the original bonds evidencing the debt of Virginia created prior to and existing on January 1, 1861, are still the owners and holders of the new bonds issued by Virginia and the certificates for the residue, upon the well recognized principle of law that a fact once shown to exist is presumed to continue to exist until the contrary is shown.

1 Greenl. Ev., §41.

McKenzie v. Stevenson, 19 Ala. 691.

In St. Louis A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Eggman, 161 Ill. 155 (43 N. E. 620), objection was made to the introduction in evidence of an ordinance, on the ground that it was not shown to be in force at the time of the accident in question. The court, overruling this objection, says:

> "It having been shown that the ordinances were passed prior to the day on which deceased was killed, the presumption is that they were still in force on that date; for when a fact or state of things is once shown > to exist the presumption is that the fact or state of things continues to exist as before until the contrary is shown, or until a different presumption is raised."

The authorities in support of this proposition are numerous, and there are none to the contrary that we have been able to discover.

Could the holders and owners of these certificates retain them for a period of thirty-five years, and then arrange with Virginia to bring suit for their payment in her name against West Virginia and obtain a decree, even if such a suit was authorized under the constitution of the United States? Certainly not.

Laches is peculiarly a doctrine of equity. Mr. Pomeroy, in the third edition of his great work, Vol. 1, §418, discussing the maxim, "Equity aids the vigilant, not those who slumber on their rights," says:

> "The principle embodied in this maxim, the original form of which is, Vigilantibus non dormientibus aequitas subvenit, operates throughout the entire remedial portion of equity jurisprudence, but rather as furnishing a most important rule controlling and restraining the courts in the administration of all kinds of reliefs, than as being the source of any particular and distinctive doctrines of the jurisprudence. Indeed in some of its applications it may properly be regarded as a special form of the yet more general principle, He who seeks equity must do equity. The principle thus used as a practical rule controlling and restricting the award of reliefs is designed to promote diligence on the part of suitors, to discourage laches by making it a bar to relief, and to prevent the enforcement of stale demands of all kinds, wholly independent of any statutory period of limitation. It is invoked for this purpose in suits for injunction, suits to obtain remedy against fraud, and in all classes of cases, except perhaps those brought to enforce a trust against an express trustee."

Discussing the rationale of the doctrine of laches, a recent work declares:

> "The rule that the enforcement of a right may be barred by laches is an application of the maxim vigi- lantibus, non dormientibus, subvenit leges. Thus it has been declared with general approval that only conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence can call a court of equity into activity, and that stale demands will not be aided where the party has slept upon his rights and acquiesced for a great length of time. The doctrine is based on grounds of public policy and its aim is the discouragement, for the peace and repose of society, of stale and antiquated demands."

18 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 97, citing the authorities, both English and American.

Another recent and reputable work says:

"Long delay in asserting a demand may defeat the remedy by raising a presumption of payment or satisfaction. Delay is always a suspicious circumstance, and if prolonged may create a presumption against the validity of a right which might otherwise be deemed established."

16 Cyc. 160.

In Piatt v. Vattier, 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 405, Mr. Justice Story, in refusing relief in that case, and especially in the opinion at page 416, says:

"And we are of opinion that the lapse of time is, upon the principles of a court of equity, a clear bar to the present suit independently of the statute. There has been a clear adverse possession of thirty years without the acknowledgment of any equity or trust estate in Bartle; and no circumstances are stated in the bill or shown in the evidence which overcome the decisive influence of such an adverse possession. The established doctrine—or, as Lord Redesdale phrased it, in Hovenden v. Annesley, 2 Sch. & Lef. 637, 638, 'the law of courts of equity'—from its being a rule adopted by those courts independently of any positive legislative limitations, is that it will not entertain stale demands. Lord Camden, in Smith v. Clay, 3 Brown's Ch. Rep. 640, note, stated it in a very pointed manner. 'A court of equity,' said he 'which is never active in relief against conscience or public convenience, has always refused its aid to stale demands, where the party has slept upon his > rights or acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call forth this court into activity but conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence. Where these are wanting, the court is passive and does nothing; laches and neglect are always discountenanced, and therefore from the beginning of this jurisdiction there was always a limitation of suit in this court.' The same doctrine has been repeatedly recognized in the British courts, as will abundantly appear from the cases already cited, as well as from the great case of Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Jac. & Walk. 1. It has also repeatedly received the sanction of the American courts, and was largely discussed in Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. Rep. 93, and Decouche v. Saratiere, 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 190. And it has been acted on in the fullest manner by this court, especially in the cases of Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. 481 (5 Cond. Rep. 142); Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. 489 (5 Cond. 648); Willison v. Matthews, 3 Peters 44, and Miller v M'Intire, 6 Peters 61, 66."

In Goddin v. Kimmel, 99 U. S. 201, which was a suit brought by the creditors of a decedent for the recovery of real estate and personal property, and seeking to have the same subjected to the payment of the debts of the decedent, the syllabus of the case is as follows:

> "In cases of concurrent jurisdiction, courts of equity consider themselves bound by the statutes of limitation which govern courts of law; in many cases they act upon the analogy of the limitations at law; but even where there is no such statute governing the case, a defense founded upon the lapse of time and the staleness of the claim is available in equity where there has been gross laches in prosecuting the claim, or long acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights."

The court in its opinion in this case says:

> "There is a defense peculiar to courts of equity founded on lapse of time and the staleness of the claim where no statute of limitations governs the case. Such courts in such cases often act upon their own inherent doctrine of discouraging for the peace of society antiquated demands by refusing to interfere where there has been gross laches in prosecuting the claim, or long acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights. Badger v. Badger, 2 Cliff. 154; Roberts v. Tanstall, 4 Hare 269; Stearns v. Page, 7 How. 819."

The doctrine here announced is supported by an unbroken line of authorities throughout the various state courts of the Union, among which appear those of Virginia and West Virginia.

In Hatcher v. Hall, 77 Va. 573, we find in point 1 of the syllabus the following as a statement of the law regarding laches:

> "It is an inherent doctrine of courts of equity to refuse relief where there has been gross laches in prosecuting rights or long and unreasonable acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights. This doctrine is founded on considerations of natural justice and public policy, and is always firmly enforced, especially where the immediate parties to the transaction are dead."

It will be observed that the doctrine here announced has its foundation in want of diligence and the policy of discouraging by courts of equity the assertion of stale demands. It is especially applicable, of course, where all the parties to the transaction are dead. The reason of this is the difficulty of establishing a claim to the satisfaction of the court in the absence of satisfactory sources as to evidence. The doctrine is enforced in other cases where the parties may all be living. Here, the parties claiming the right never sought the aid of Virginia to bring this suit against West Virginia in her own name until after the lapse of about thirty-five years. Neither did the creditors apply direct to West Virginia for payment. Those persons who were familiar with the territory of the two states at the time of the formation of the new state, who knew its value as well as the value of the personal estate in both states in 1863 and in 1871, also those who knew the extent of the loss suffered by both states as an incident of the civil war, the officers of the government who were thoroughly cognizant of the situation in this regard as to both states, are all dead; in view of which the obtainment of evidence necessary to fix an equitable basis upon which to determine West Virginia's liability, if any existed, is no longer accessible. Furthermore, the witnesses necessary to fix the value or values of the property alleged to have been transferred by Virginia to West Virginia are likewise dead, and the Court cannot obtain any reliable or satisfactory evidence as to what property was turned over by Virginia to West Virginia, to recover which this suit is in part brought; nor can the evidence as to its value be obtained.

The laches of these creditors suing through Virginia, as well as that imputable to Virginia herself, is absolutely inexcusable. No legal excuse for such laches is offered in the bill or in any manner attempted to be shown. It seems to us that this delay to assert these claims in the name of Virginia, both those demanded in her representative capacity and those in her own right, has been so long continued and is so inexcusably gross as to afford evidence of the injustice of the claim, if not of its actual abandonment on the part of the State of Virginia as well as the creditors.

It is well settled that delay in the assertion of a right, when it does not operate as a statutory bar, may operate in equity as evidence of assent, acquiescence or waiver unless satisfactorily explained.

Kelly v. McQuinn, 42 W. Va. 774.
Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 469.
Bryant v. Glover, 42 W. Va. 10.
Nelson v. Carrington, 4 Munf. 332.
Coles v. Ballard, 78 Va. 139-147.
Eubank v. Barnes, 93 Va. 153.

In Jones v. Perkins, 76 Fed. 82, the second point of the syllabus is as follows:

> "To support the defense of laches it need not be shown that defendant has been injured by the delay."

In the course of the opinion, we find the following:

> "It is contended on behalf of the complainant in the case at bar that it must appear to the court, where laches is urged as a ground of defense, that detriment has come to defendant from the delay; that his position has been changed to his injury, or that he has been deprived of evidence which an earlier prosecution of the suit would have enabled him to obtain. This position is not tenable. There are cases where a longer delay than is here complained of has been excused by circumstances, where a court could clearly say that it caused no prejudice to the defendant, but these are exceptions.

> The doctrine of laches as a defense presumes that the lapse of time is constantly destroying the evidence of rights, and that the death of witnesses and the loss of documentary evidence is its ordinary consequence."

From the case of Speidell v. Henrici, 15 Fed. 753, the decree in which was affirmed in 100 U. S. 377, we take the following:

> "A suitor in equity is required to be 'prompt, eager, and ready' in the pursuit of his rights. Diligence is an essential condition of equitable relief, and unexplained negligence is never encouraged. 'Nothing can call forth a court of equity into activity but conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence. When these are wanting the court is passive and does nothing. Laches and negligence are always discountenanced, and, therefore, from the beginning of this jurisdiction, there was always a limitation of suits in this court.' Smith v. Clay, Amb. 645, quoted with approval in Brown v. County of B. Vista, 95 U. S. 160.
>
> "So, also, says Mr. Justice Swayne in the case last referred to: 'The law of laches, like the principle of the limitation of actions, was dictated by experience, and is founded in a salutary policy. The lapse of time carries with it the memory and life of witnesses, the muniments of evidence, and other means of proof. The rule which gives it the effect prescribed is necessary to the peace, repose, and welfare of society. A departure from it would open an inlet to the evils intended to be excluded.'
>
> "And again: 'Courts of equity refuse to interfere after a considerable lapse of time, for considerations of public policy, from the difficulty of doing entire justice, when the original transactions have become obscure by time, and the evidence may be lost, and from the consciousness that the repose of titles and the security of property are mainly promoted by a full enforcement of the maxim, vigilantibus et non dormientibus jura subserviunt.' 1 Story Eq. Jur., §529."

May the doctrine of laches be imputed to a state? We find in the case of Atty. Gen. v. Central R. Co., 68 N. J. Eq. 198 (59 Atl. 348), in the opinion at page 360 of the reporter, the Court applying the doctrine of laches to the demand of a state, using this language:

> "The equitable rules relating to the effect of laches and acquiescence are enforced against the state when it is a suitor for equitable relief, as well as against private suitors. Atty. Gen. v. Del. & B. B. R. Co., 27 N. J. Eq. 1, and cases cited at page 27."

So we find in In re Hepburn, 3 Bland (Md.) 95, the Court holding that laches is available as a defense against the state.

There are a number of cases decided by this Court holding that laches is not imputable to the government: Armstrong v. Morrill, 14 Wall. 120; Lindsey v. Miller, 6 Pet. 666; U. S. v. Dalles Military Road Co., 140 U. S. 599; U. S. v. Thompson, 98 U. S. 486; Redfoed v. Parts, 132 U. S. 239. Yet this Court holds that the government may suffer loss through the negligence of its officers. If it comes down from its position of sovereignty and enters the domain of commerce, it submits itself to the same laws that govern individuals there.

> Cook v. U. S., 91 U. S. 389. See also French Republic v. Springs Co., 191 U. S. 427, 438.

So, too, when the government is only a formal party, and the suit is brought in its name to enforce the rights of individuals, as in the case at bar, and no interest of the government is involved, the defense of laches and limitation will be sustained as though the government was out of the case and the litigation was carried on in the name, as in fact, for the benefit of private parties.

> U. S. v. Navigation Co., 142 U. S. 510, 538.
> U. S. v. Beebe, 127 U. S. 338.
> Moran v. Horsky, 178 U. S. 205, 214.
> U. S. v. Am. Bell Tel. Co., 167 U. S. 224, 265.
> McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. 9.

So where the government is suing for the use and benefit of individuals or for the prosecution of private and proprietary instead of public or governmental rights, it is clear that it is not entitled to the exemption of nullum tempus and that the ordinary rule of laches applies in full force.

French Republic v. Springs Co., 191 U. S. 427, 438.
Maryland v. Baldwin, 112 U. S. 490.
Curtner v. U. S., 149 U. S. 662.
U. S. v. Beebe, 127 U. S. 338.
U. S. v. Navigation Co., 142 U. S. 510, 538.

So it is held in Miller v. State, use, etc., 38 Ala. 600, that while the statute of limitations does not apply to actions by the state, still it does extend to a suit brought in the name of the state for the use of a particular township to recover lands which constitute a part of a certain section.

In view of the well settled doctrine of courts of equity, and which this Court always applies in proper cases, that stale demands are not countenanced and that gross neglect or inexcusable delay in bringing suit to enforce an equitable claim will constitute a bar even to an otherwise meritorious demand, there can be no doubt that Virginia can not maintain this suit so far as it seeks to establish a claim against West Virginia with reference to the unfunded debt held by third parties. This ground of defense is based upon the fact that Virginia is not asserting this claim in her own right but only in her representative capacity as trustee, and that if a decree as to this part of the case can be obtained no part of it can enure to her benefit. Indeed, she asserts this in her bill, alleging that whatever is obtained in this suit is payable to the holders of these certificates. This is none other than an individual claim, and not a case involving the rights of Virginia, either pecuniary or otherwise. In fact, she declined to bring any suit except at the special request of the owners and holders of these certificates. There is no reason or excuse for this delay of thirty-five years on the part of the owners of these certificates in exerting an effort to have West Virginia pay it. It does not answer the charge of laches to say that the holders of these certificates could maintain no suit. They could not maintain a suit against Virginia. They could have been diligent in asking West Virginia to pay, and in case of refusal, in arranging to have Virginia bring this suit long before it was brought with reference to this unfunded debt, the payment of which is to enure to them. But we deny the right of Virginia to sue for the creditors. They offer no excuse for this delay.

If West Virginia was liable for the payment of any part of said public debt, she has been liable since her admission into the Union, June 20, 1863, forty-three years before the bringing of this suit.

Why this long delay? The only just inference is that they did not regard these claims as constituting a valid demand against West Virginia. Indeed, they evidently knew that they could not be asserted against West Virginia; and the institution of this suit on the account of the holders of these certificates was a mere speculative matter in which Virginia would have no part except at their request and with the understanding that she should incur no costs or expenses in such suit. This long delay certainly affords conclusive evidence against the justice of the demand made by these holders through and in the name of Virginia as plaintiff against this defendant, and was evidently undertaken for the purpose, if possible, of constraining West Virginia by means of this suit to concede their inequitable demand and settle with them for these certificates, notwithstanding their lack of inherent justice and right, and in this way possibly create a demand for these certificates of a fictitious character, and speculate upon them in the markets.

No other construction can be placed upon the long delay of the holders of these certificates in taking steps to bring suit. Virginia could have brought this suit long before she did if she had a right to maintain it, with the same show of right as she could do in 1906.

We therefore confidently insist that, if there were no other ground of defense in this case as to the certificates issued in 1871, that of the laches of the holders thereof is an ample and complete defense.

PART II.

On Exceptions of the Plaintiff and the Defendant to the Report of the Special Master.

In this part of the brief for West Virginia we will consider the facts of the case as shown by the record in connection with the exceptions filed by the plaintiff and the defendant to the report of Hon. Charles E. Littlefield, the Special Master. Questions of law will be argued incidently only. For convenience, we will take up the several paragraphs of the decree of reference in the order they are set out in the report of the Special Master, who will hereafter be referred to as the "Master."

PARAGRAPH I. OF THE DECREE.

> "1. The amount of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia on the first day of January, 1861, stating specially how and in what form the same was evidenced, by what authority of law and for what purpose the same was created, and the dates and nature of the bonds or other evidence of said indebtedness."

No exceptions were filed to the report of the Master under this paragraph by West Virginia. Virginia did file an exception to the finding of the Master as follows:

> "For errors of law apparent in the record, complainant respectfully excepts to the statements contained in the Master's report in regard to the Literary Fund, save and except so far as they show the creation, existence, and amount of such fund, and especially does complainant except to the Master's conclusions that the Board of the Literary Fund (a corporation) had no right to sue and be sued and that the fund was the unconditional property of the State and subject to its control and > ownership, while the said fund was under the law held and controlled by the board and the State in trust for educational purposes alone. See Master's Report, pp. 6 to 30, and acts in Appendix to Record, pp. 205-208."

There is no dispute of fact between the parties as to the report of the Master under this paragraph. The only dispute refers to a question of law. Virginia contended originally that the three items known as the Sinking Fund of $1,369,243.92, the Board of Public Works Fund of $150,895.00 and the Literary Fund of $1,116,843.35 were parts of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia on the first day of January, 1861. The Master found against her contentions. Virginia excepted only to the report of the Master in his conclusion as to the Literary Fund, thereby conceding that the other two funds mentioned were no part of the public debt of Virginia. The Master argues the question at some length in his report, and decided it as he does therein on the ground that Virginia on the first day of January, 1861, was the absolute owner of the bonds in the Literary Fund, as well as those in the Sinking Fund, and that they were not outstanding in the hands of any one who could assert them against the state. In other words, the state could not owe a debt evidenced by said bonds and at the same time be the absolute owner of such bonds with power to do with them as she pleased. It seems to be clearly shown that these funds were simply methods of bookkeeping for the convenience of the state in the administration of her fiscal affairs. It was immaterial whether these funds were fixed and defined by the constitution or by statute. The fact remains that it was absolutely within the power of the state at any time she so willed to destroy these evidences of debt and declare the accounts closed. The funds that Virginia paid for these evidences of debt had been raised by some form of taxation from the people and property of the united state, and in law there can be no reasonable dispute on the question whether or not these bonds had been legally paid and canceled. The officers of the Board of the Literary Fund were by the law the chief executive officers of Virginia. No individuals had any rights or powers in connection therewith. We do not deem it improper to say at this point that the counsel representing Virginia in the argument before the Master did not really deny the position here taken, and we think that the Master could truthfully have said that his conclusions were conceded by the Attorney General then in office and representing the State of Virginia.

PARAGRAPH II. OF DECREE.

> "2. The extent and assessed valuation of the territory of Virginia and of West Virginia, June 20, 1863, and the population thereof, with and without slaves, separately."

There is no dispute as to any question of fact under this paragraph and no exceptions to the findings of the Master by either the plaintiff or the defendant.

We respectfully call the Court's attention to the alternative findings under this paragraph, which were made at the request of the defendant. (Master's Rep. pp. 37-8).

PARAGRAPH III. OF DECREE.

> "3. All expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of the debt was contracted."

The plaintiff and the defendant have each filed numerous exceptions to the findings of the Master under this paragraph. For convenience, we will first take up the exceptions filed by West Virginia to the conclusions of the Master under this paragraph, and then we will discuss the exceptions of Virginia thereto.

Exceptions of West Virginia.

Kanawha River Turnpike and Kanawha River Improvements.

Items 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 (Record, p. 373) were for the following sums:

Kanawha Turnpike	$152,130.54
Kanawha Turnpike	2,593.92
Kanawha Turnpike	7,189.65
Kanawha Turnpike	80,955.28
Kanawha River Improvements	59,572.36
Total	$302,902.15

These were found to be expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia. There is no real dispute as to the facts in relation to this sum, as understood by us.

There is one matter of fact in relation to the alternative finding of the Master, found at the bottom of page 70 of his report, to which we will refer later.

We differ from the Master and except to his findings on the ground that the Commonwealth of Virginia, after expending these sums of money for the purposes set out on the Kanawha River Improvements and the construction of the Kanawha Turnpike, did by her act of March 16, 1832 (App. p. 86), sell and transfer to a private corporation the turnpike and the river on which, and for the improvement of which, this money was expended; and the turnpike and the river so far as travel and navigation thereon were concerned, became the private property of this private corporation by reason of such sale and transfer by the Commonwealth, and for a period of more than twenty-five years prior to the first day of January, 1861, the only interest that the State of Virginia had in the subject matter of such expenditure was that of a stockholder of this private corporation. We do not agree with the argument of the Master and of Virginia that it was immaterial what the commonwealth did before the first day of January, 1861, with the subject created by such expenditure. The principle would be the same if the commonwealth had sold the turnpike for a money consideration and had made a large profit thereon. She could not have more effectually dispossessed herself of the power and control thereof than she did when she sold this turnpike and these river improvements for ten thousand shares of stock in the private corporation, to which she transferred this property. The title to such turnpike and to such improvements still remained in the James River and Kanawha Company, a private corporation.

That this corporation was a private one is conclusively determined by the decision of the Supreme Court of Virginia in the case of James River and Kanawha Company v. Early, 13 Gratt. 541. This decision was rendered in 1856, and without any thought or imaginary possibility of any future difficulty in relation to this matter. The Supreme Court of Virginia specifically held in that case that the fact, that the state owned a large interest in the stock of the Company, did not in the slightest degree release it from liability for neglect of its officers, and that the rights of the state therein were no more than those of any other stockholder.

Conceding for the purpose of this argument only, that the original expenditure made by the commonwealth through the agency of the James River Company, was an expenditure within the meaning of the decree and the ordinance, we submit that this action of Virginia in selling this turnpike and these improvements should eliminate this whole item from this account. Can it be presumed for a moment that if the commonwealth, after paying $10,000 for the land on which the asylum at Weston was afterwards built, had decided not to build thereon and had sold this land for either money or stock in some private corporation or for other thing of value, she then could have charged under this head to West Virginia as an expenditure the amount she had originally paid for such piece of land? Let us take another example: If the commonwealth had sold, prior to the first day of January, 1861, the Covington and Ohio Railroad, so far as it had been completed, for money or other thing of value, could the sum exepended thereon by Virginia have then been included in this account as a state expenditure within the present limits of West Virginia? Is it not an insult to the intelligence of the able men, including Senator Carlisle, Senator Vanwinkle, Senator Boreman, and the many other men of ability who composed the convention which passed the Ordinance of August 20, 1861, to think that they intended to include under the word "state expenditures" property which had been built, constructed or purchased by the state, and then sold before the date of the separation to an individual or private company?

In the original account filed by Virginia before the Master in thi cause is the following item:

"Interest on bonds of the City of Wheeling, $15,115.64."

This item was set up by Virginia and seriously claimed as a expenditure within the limits of the State of West Virginia during th period contemplated by the ordinance, because it had been paid b the commonwealth as interest on some bonds guaranteed by her, whic bonds were made by the City of Wheeling, a municipal corporation No doubt Virginia would be now claiming this expenditure as suc if the defendant had not discovered and shown to the satisfaction o the counsel of Virginia, that in the year 1866 this sum with interes had been fully and completely repaid to the State of Virginia by th City of Wheeling. Then the counsel of Virginia withdrew this iten from the account. While West Virginia never admitted that a loa to a muncipal corporation was a state expendit within the mean ing of the decree or ordinance; but if Virginia desires to be consisten with her claim with reference to the Kanawha River Turnpike an Kanawha River Improvements, she should also have insisted tha this amount originally loaned by the commonwealth to the city o Wheeling should be included in this account.

The James River and Kanawha Company kept the control of th Kanawha Turnpike and of the improvements on the river after th first of January, 1861, and also after the separation of the states. Al that West Virginia obtained therein was by reason of the stock own ership of Virginia in this private corporation. The ownership of th property of the James River and Kanawha Company remained in th corporation, and the ownership never was invested in West Virgini at all.

By reason of the fact that the Chesapeake and Ohio railway par alleled this turnpike, all its value to the company was taken away This happened after the Civil War, however.

Record, page 820-A, shows defendant's Exhibit "G-1." On page 1 of that exhibit it will be seen that there was expended by the State o Virginia the sum of $1,216,666.30 on the James River Canal, Blu Ridge Canal, and Kanawha Road and River, which construction wor and improvements were turned over to the James River and Kanawha Company, a private corporation, under the act of March 16, 1832, in return for 10,000 shares of stock of the par value of $100 each in said James River and Kanawha Company. It will be further seen that the State of Virginia thereafter subscribed for 20,000 shares of stock in the same company and paid the sum of $2,000,000 in money therefor. It shows the good faith of Virginia in selling these properties to the private company. It shows that she received what she believed to be the real value of these improvements in 1832. She certainly regarded this stock as a good investment, or she would not have paid $2,000,000 in money for 20,000 shares more of it.

In addition to this purchase of 20,000 shares of stock in this company, for which the money was paid, the same record shows that the state loaned to this company large sums of money. The state also guaranteed large amounts of the bonds of this company, which bonds the state afterwards assumed as an original proposition by the act of March 23, 1860, and they are now included in the total of the debt set up under the first paragraph of the decree in this cause. In return for assuming these bonds as an original obligation and for the loans made by the state directly to the company, she received 72,000 shares of the stock of the company.

The Master speaks (Rep., p. 42), of the construction of the provision of the West Virginia constitution and the Wheeling ordinance relating to West Virginia's assumption of a just proportion of the debt, so as to produce an equitable result. If there is any place requiring such application anywhere in this case, it surely is here. Can it be called equitable in any sense of the word to charge against West Virginia as a "state expenditure" money which the old state spent in building a turnpike, which turnpike the old state, before the separation of the two states, sells and receives the proceeds? It seems rather shocking to one's equitable sense to propose such a thing. It also seems rather shocking for a plaintiff to ask a court of equity, a court of conscience, to grant such relief. If this suit had been brought solely for the purpose of recovering that one series of items, would not a court of equity have dismissed the suit upon demurrer? Assuredly it would.

On page 70 of this report, under the head "Alternative Finding," the Master says: "There is nothing in the record to show whether this transfer was actually made." He meant whether the property of the James River Company, including this Kanawha Turnpike and these improvements of the Kanawha River, were ever actually transferred to the James River and Kanawha Company. The case set out above, of James River and Kanawha Company v. Early, 13 Gratt. 541, and the case of Higginbotham's Executor v. Commonwealth, 25 Gratt. 627, both quoted in the Master's report, the reports of the Board of Public Works, the reports of the James River Company, numerous acts of the legislature of Virginia, which are included in the appendix, pages 86 to 112, show conclusively and prove absolutely that the transfer was duly made under the provisions of the act of March 16, 1832. Moreover the Exhibit "G-1" (R., p. 820-A), agreed to by the accountants of the plaintiff and defendant, shows conclusively that the transfer was made by the State of Virginia of all the properties above mentioned to the James River and Kanawha Company according to the provisions of the said act of March 16, 1832.

Brandonville, Kingwood and Evansville Road $10,595,73; Clarksburg & Buchanan Turnpike $19,259.36; and Kingwood and West Union Turnpike $18,140.61.

These three items, which are numbered 25, 28 and 35 in the report and record, were found to be state expenditures by the Master, to which finding West Virginia excepts. It is a question of law, whether or not they shall be charged to West Virginia. It is agreed that each one of these was a turnpike company duly chartered by the commonwealth, that the commonwealth was a stockholder in each one, and that each was a private corporation and managed by a board of directors; and while in this condition the commonwealth generously appropriated the above sums, which were expended upon the property of these private corporations. The state had no more title and no more rights to the property of the corporation after such expenditure than it had before. Under the acts appropriating the money it would appear that these sums were gifts to these corporations. If these gifts had been made to individuals and they then had expended the money within the limits of West Virginia, would it be claimed for a moment that such gifts came within the purview of the decree or ordinance? Can any gift to a private individual or corporation be a "state expenditure"? We think not. If Virginia had given this money to a corporation resident of Maryland, or of Virginia itself, and such corporation had chosen to expend the same on a public utility project, such as a turnpike, railroad or canal within what are now the limits of West Virginia, would it have been a "state expenditure" in the meaning of this ordinance? Clearly not.

In the first account filed by Virginia before the Master (R., p. 373, Item 17) she claimed the sum of $7,882.92, which she had paid for stock in a Maryland corporation. This Maryland corporation had built a piece of road in the southwest corner of Garrett county, Maryland, which connected with some Virginia roads at each end. These Virginia roads were built and owned by Virginia. On reflection, at the hearing before the Master, counsel of Virginia asked leave to withdraw this item, and did so. Was it not as reasonable to charge this sum to West Virginia as the one under consideration?

It must not be forgotten that not a single one of these three turnpikes, built by private corporations, were open to free travel by the public, as turnpikes now are almost universally within the United States. Every such corporation in the state then charged and collected tolls on each and every one of these roads, as well as tolls on each and every one of the navigable rivers; and some of the road companies paid good dividends on the investment of the moneys therein, as shown by the record in this cause. Can a gift by the state, however generous might have been the impulse of the giver, which simply increased the toll collecting value of the property of a private corporation, and which did not increase the state's power or rights or financial interest therein, be called a "state expenditure," any more than the purchase of stock in that private corporation by the state could be called a state expenditure? Certainly not; but this last question will be elsewhere discussed under the exceptions of Virginia to this same paragraph.

Item 55, Surveys—$60,873.19.

This item is discussed under Paragraph III., page 75, and Paragraph IV., page 134, of the Master's report. It was agreed by the accountants that under the head of "Surveys" there was spent an aggregate of $250,206.56. It was claimed by the defendant that neither this sum of money nor any part thereof could be both a state expenditure under Paragraph III. and an item of the ordinary expenses of the state government under Paragraph IV. The Master has seen fit to hold that it can be both: that is to say, that such part thereof as can be shown to have been expended in the territory now West Virginia should be charged as a state expenditure, and such part as could not be shown to have been expended at any particular place should be charged as an ordinary expense of the state government. It is admitted that the total sum was expended as a part of the expenses of a state officer performing certain duties prescribed by a state statute. The Master said: "It is a narrow and close question." (Report, p. 76). It does not seem to us to be either. When we take into consideration the fact that in every other instance all the salaries of state officers, without exception, such as judges and the executive officers, and the cost of the work done by them and the expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties, are all charged in this report as ordinary expenses of the state government, we can see no reason for this exception. In fact, it seems to us very clear that this sum of $250,206.56 is properly chargeable as a whole to the ordinary expenses of the state government; just as the other salaries and expenses of office of state officers are charged, as stated above.

Therefore, we earnestly contend that the said sum of $60,873.19, allowed as a state expenditure under this Paragraph, should be stricken out, and that there should be charged to ordinary expenses of the state government, under Paragraph IV. on page 134 of the Master's report, the said total sum of $250,206.56.

Item 150, Loan to the Town of Bath—$2500.

If it were not for the fact that there is a principle concerned in this small item we would not except to the finding of the Master. This was a loan to the Trustees of the Town of Bath, and they were compelled to give bond with good security, payable to an agency of the state, to wit, the Board of Public Works, for the punctual payment of the interest annually to the state on this loan. The Master finds that this interest was paid to the state and that the auditor of the state described it as a loan and carried it on the books of the state as such. We do not agree with the Master that this action on the part of the State of Virginia in so carrying it has no weight, and we respectfully submit that the auditor's books quoted by the Master and the action of the state from the time of the loan up to the separation of the two states, and the action of the trustees of the Town of Bath in paying the interest thereon annually, conclusively fixes its status as a loan, and therefore is no charge against West Virginia. Further on under this paragraph we will discuss the question whether a loan by the state can possibly come under the head of "state expenditures." The Master holds that it cannot.

This loan is also recognized by the trustees of the Berkeley Springs, in their report to the legislature of West Virginia, 1869, which report is printed in the back part of the House Journal of the West Virginia Legislature of 1869, along with reports of state officers, other boards, etc. (What is now known as the town of Berkeley Springs, in Morgan county, West Virginia, was formerly known as the town of Bath.) This particular report of 1869 is a comprehensive one, and one of the signers thereto is no less a famous personage than David H. Strother, known in literature by his pen-name of "Porte Crayon." It is pointed out in this report (p. 4) that "the Berkeley Springs and adjacent property do not belong to the state of Virginia or to West Virginia (as its successor)." On page 3, in discussing the finances of the property, the report says:

> "That there were old debts standing against the property * * * * * to wit:
> "To the estate of Philip C. Pendleton, deceased, $2,000, money borrowed for the purpose of building a row of baths, with a large pool attached, for the use of the ladies.
>
> To the Board of Public Works, Richmond, Virginia, $2,500, money borrowed for the purpose of constructing a graded road from Sir John's Station to the Springs." (Sir John's Station is a station on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.')

Thus, the law authorizing the loan, the auditor of Virginia's books, the creditor, and the books of the trustees, the debtors, all recognize it as a loan.

This concludes the discussion of the exceptions of West Virginia to the Master's report so far as the third paragraph is concerned.

Exceptions of Virginia under Paragraph III.

Virginia specifically excepts under Paragraph III., only to the finding of the Master that certain moneys paid by her for stock in turnpike, bridge and railroad companies, which were private corporations, and that certain moneys loaned by her to such corporations, are not allowed as state expenditures within the meaning of the decree and the ordinance. These items are divided as follows, as shown on pages 375, 376 and 377 of the record:

Items 57 to 65, inclusive, Bridge Companies	$78,412.50
Items 66 to 69, inclusive, Navigation Companies, aggregating	210,500.00
Items 70 to 147, inclusive, Turnpike Companies, aggregating	803,555.83
Item 6 (R., p. 372) Berryville and Charles Town Turnpike Company	11,932.52
The total aggregate of these items	$1,104,400.85

All these items can, to a certain extent, be discussed at the same time, as the same general principle of stockholding investment runs through them all.

Item 6, Berryville & Charles Town Turnpike Company, $11,932.52, in some respects differs from the others, and Item 66, Coal River Navigation Company, $96,000 (R. p. 375), is somewhat like the principle in Item 6, and so far as they are alike will be discussed together.

The Berryville and Charles Town Turnpike Company was a private corporation, chartered by the State of Virginia. It was duly authorized to and did construct a turnpike from Berryville, Clark county, Virginia, to Charles Town, Jefferson county, now in West Virginia. There is now of this road in the present limits of West Virginia 58⅓ per cent. Virginia subscribed and paid for stock in this company of the par value of $20,455.74. The special fact in relation to this corporation is that it gave a deed of trust on its property, which was this turnpike, to secure loans to the company. This deed of trust or mortgage was foreclosed in the year 1858, and the physical property of the company sold. The purchaser at this sale was the State of Virginia, and the price paid was $7,236.97. West Virginia admits her liability for 58⅓ per cent of this last sum, but denies any liability whatever as to the stock subscription. This reason is in addition to the other reasons hereinafter given, which will apply to all stock subscriptions. There is no dispute between the parties as to the facts here related (R., pp. 454, 455).

The case of the Coal River Navigation Company is somewhat like this. This is item 66 on page 375 of the Record, and is included by Virginia in her exception to the finding of the Master in relation to Items 66 to 69, inclusive, aggregating $210,500. This particular item is for the sum of $96,000. This is another instance where the state bought stock of a private corporation, in this particular case of the par value of $96,000. The corporation, on July 30, 1858, executed a mortgage or deed of trust on the property of the company to secure a large amount of indebtedness set out therein. The company failed to pay the debts so secured, and the trustees named therein, under the authority thereof, on October 25, 1865, sold all the property of this company to private persons. (R., pp. 990, 1003.) We thus see, as to these two corporations, on the first day of January, 1861, the State of Virginia was not even a stockholder in either. The corporations had in a legal way disposed of their entire properties, and all the state had was stock in a defunct corporation, and the corporations still owed large debts. West Virginia did not, under the laws of nations, nor under the acts of Virginia transferring to her property within her limits, obtain anything from Virginia in these particular cases.

The exception of Virginia to the finding of the Master disallowing this total sum of $1,104,400.85, is based on her claim that purchases of stock in corporations doing business and owning property within the present limits of West Virginia, were state expenditures in the meaning of the ordinance and the decree. The position of West Virginia on this important question is that these were but investment of the funds of the state in private companies with the expectation at least of absolute security of the money invested and in many instances with the expectation of producing large dividends from the investment. These corporations were not the agents of the state for the investment of public funds, and were not controlled by the state as a sovereign. They were under the absolute control of the stockholders, subject to the general laws governing corporations. This was definitely settled in Virginia by the decision of its Supreme Court in 1856.

The case of James River & Kanawha Co. v. Early, 13 Gratt. 541, was an action to recover for the negligence of the corporation. In discussing the question of the liability of the company, the court said:

> "It is not a public corporation representing the public and administering public funds for the benefit of the public, but it is a joint stock company which has undertaken the construction of a work, useful to the public certainly, but intended for the private emolument of the stockholders in dividends of the profits" (p. 552).
>
> "That the State owned a large interest in the stock of the company will not vary the case * * * * a mere interest taken by the commonwealth in the stock would not be sufficient to bring an action against the company for neglect of its corporate duty within the influence of the decision in the case of Sayre v. The Northwestern Turnpike Road, 10 Leigh. 454 * * *" (p. 553).

As persuasive authority on the same line the case of Moore v. Schoppert, 22 W. Va. 282, is pertinent. This case was decided in 1883. It arose upon the attempt of the county court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to take possession of a certain toll-house of the Cross-Road and Summit Point Turnpike Company, a Virginia corporation. This corporation is Item 71 on page 375 of the record, and is included as such in the exception of Virginia to "Items 70 to 117, inclusive, turnpike companies aggregating $803,555.83." The county of Jefferson, apparently going on the theory that this road and other property of this company belonged to it as grantee from the State of Virginia under the act of February 3, 1863, (App. to R., p. 128) took possession of a toll-house and a lot of land on which it was situated, and this action of ejectment was instituted by this Virginia corporation, the Cross-Roads and Summit Point Turnpike Company, in the name of Moore, its president, to recover this piece of property. As elsewhere shown in this case, West Virginia granted to the counties in which the roads were situated all the stock received by it in the road corporations under the act of February 3, 1863. In this case the Supreme Court of West Virginia distinctly recognized and enforced the corporate ownership of the turnpike company of the property connected therewith. We quote the second syllabus, as follows:

> 2. "The effect of the legislation of the re-organized government of Virginia and of this state is to transfer to and vest in the different counties of this state the stock or interest of the State of Virginia and of this state in the roads of incorporated turnpike companies and to confer upon the respective county courts of this state the management and control of the stock or interest thus transferred, and also to give to said county courts control of any such roads or parts thereof lying in any county as such county may by agreement, condemnation, or otherwise acquire, or of such roads as may have been entirely abandoned by any such corporation or the private stockholders thereof; but it does not give to the county courts jurisdiction and control over any turnpike road belonging to any incorporated company, which is or shall be managing and controlling its road according to its charter, further than the right to control and represent as a stockholder the stock or interest acquired by the county from the state in such company, and to regulate the tolls of such company" (p. 289).

The Court in this case further says:

> "From the facts as they now appear in this case, it is evident that the county of Jefferson has no other interest in the house and lot in controversy in this action than that of a stockholder representing and controlling the stock formerly owned by the State of Virginia in the Cross-Roads and Summit Point Turnpike Company."

This case clearly shows the attitude of the courts of last resort of the State of West Virginia towards these corporations; and this decision, made twenty-seven years ago, has never been overruled or extinguished, but has always stood as the law of West Virginia in relation to these corporations. The fact remains as to each and all of these items mentioned in this exception, that Virginia subscribed and paid for and received shares of stock in each and every one of these corporations. These shares of stock in her possession were her own private property, subject to sale or any disposition the state chose to make thereof, and which under the laws of nations would not have passed to the State of West Virginia upon the separation, although the actual property of these corporations lay wholly or partly within the present limits of the State of West Virginia. The title of the State of West Virginia to these stocks is based alone upon the act of February 3, 1863 (App. to R., p. 128). This act provided, as set out in the eighth paragraph of the bill, that West Virginia should duly account for these stocks in the settlement thereafter to be made with Virginia. This provision is practically a contemporaneous construction of the meaning of the ordinance on this subject. West Virginia certainly was not to pay for this property but once. Certainly it was not intended that she should pay the cost of the stock under the ordinance, and then pay for the value of the stock under the said act of February 3, 1863.

In the account filed by Virginia under Paragraph III. she included value of shares of stock in two banks, and insisted that the money invested by Virginia in such stock be allowed as state expenditure. The Master found against her on this contention, and, unless the general exception put at the end of their printed pamphlet of exceptions covers it, Virginia did not except to this finding of the Master.

Certain it is that she did not deem it of sufficient importance to specify those two cases in her exceptions, and we feel justified in the conclusion that she has abandoned her contention as to same. She is not very consistent in such abandonment, because there is no difference in law as to money being a "state expenditure," which is expended by the state in the purchase of stock in a corporation, whether that corporation be the Northwestern Bank of Wheeling, or the Wheeling, West Liberty and Bethany Turnpike Company. As will be set out later, Virginia purchased between 1832 and 1840, 4,500 shares of the stock of the Northwestern Bank of Wheeling, and in her original account attempted to charge West Virginia with $450,000 paid therefor as a state expenditure. In the year 1857 (R., p. 499), Virginia sold 1,082 shares of this stock for the sum of $113,671.42. If an expenditure once made, as claimed in the case of the Kanawha Turnpike and Kanawha River Improvements, could never be changed by the subsequent action of Virginia prior to the separation of the two states, then Virginia was not just to herself when she withdrew from said charge of $450,000 the value of these 1,082 shares of stock, which were sold, paid for, and delivered to the purchaser in 1857. We refer to this here to show an example that Virginia dealt with these stocks as a private person would. It is further shown in this record, especially under Paragraph VI. of the Master's report, that Virginia received large dividends from many of these investments.

Against sustaining this exception of Virginia is the undisputed fact that Virginia did not expend this money or any part thereof in West Virginia. The corporation in each particular case, through its board of directors and other officers, expended the money. There was no control in the state over this expenditure beyond such as might have been given by stock ownership. The legal entity which made the expenditure, was actually the corporation. The title of the property was in the corporation; and the corporation as such managed and controlled the property. In the case of the Northwestern Turnpike, the state, through its own officers, directed the expenditure of the money. The same was true in the case of the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike, and of the Covington and Ohio Railroad.

In these three notable instances no one but a state officer or agent had any authority whatever. But in those corporations named in this exception the corporation alone, through its duly elected officers, expended its own money for its own corporate purposes.

On page 12 of the exceptions filed by Virginia is the following:

"VI. COMPLAINANT'S SIXTH EXCEPTION."

> "In addition to the five exceptions above set forth, complainant respectfully asks that all of the alternative statements contained in the Master's report, made at the request of and pursuant to objections interposed before the Master by the complainant, and not covered by any of the foregoing exceptions, may be taken and treated as exceptions made by the complainant to said report because of and with respect to the errors of law appearing on the face of said report and of the record returned therewith, in the particulars to which said alternative statements respectively refer."

We have seen no brief of Virginia in this case, and we are at a loss to know whether counsel for Virginia intends this to mean that every alternative statement made by the Master at her request will be insisted upon at the hearing or not: but in the event that counsel shall do so, we desire to call attention to certain alternative findings made by the Master under Paragraph III., which we will take up in the order in which they are found in the report.

The first one of these is "Item 3. Winchester and Potomac Railroad, $170,532.00." This item is discussed at length by the Master (Report, pp. 47-64). The total item is $270,000, made up of the sum of $120,000 paid for stock of this corporation by Virginia, and the sum of $150,000 loaned by Virginia to this corporation upon security therefor being given. The property of this corporation consisted of a railroad running from Winchester, in the county of Frederick in Virginia, to Harper's Ferry on the Potomac River, in the county of Jefferson, now in West Virginia. This road was constructed under the acts of Virginia of 1831, and was one of the early railroads projected in the United States. 63.16 per cent of the mileage thereof is in West Virginia. The legislation dealing with this road prior to the separation of the two states, consisted in incorporating the same, authorizing the subscription of stock, authorizing the loan, and then by the act of February 24, 1846, Virginia commuted the loan and the stock into an annuity of $5,000.00 a year forever (App., p. 30). This annuity was paid annually up to and including the year 1861 (R., p. 489). The ledger account on the books of the Internal Improvement Fund of Virginia which carried the subscription of $120,000 to the stock, was closed with the explanation that the stock had been surrendered for this annuity. All these facts are undisputed. With the beginning of the Civil War the Court will take judicial notice of the fact that no railroad running from Winchester to Harper's Ferry could pay annuities. This annuity accumulated during the years of the war from 1861 to 1865.

The first question that arises is the state's subscription to the capital stock of this corporation. This stands, we think, on the same basis as the subscription of the state to the stock of turnpike companies, banks, and other private corporations; and the same principles and argument apply here that we have applied to the other cases of such stock subscription. They were not "state expenditures," nor were they "ordinary expenses of the state government"; they were merely and only investments. The special circumstances in this case of the annuity we will advert to presently.

As to the loan, we are fixed in our opinion. All the loans mentioned in the record, as was this one also, were secured in some way or manner. This record discloses three of them: the one under discussion; Item No. 15 (R., p. 373) Kanawha Board Bonds; and Item No. 150 (R., p. 377), Town of Bath. The first two have the principal and interest both secured by mortgage, and the third had the payment of the annual interest forever secured by a bond. Specific and careful provision was made in each case for this security. We deem the statement of this proposition sufficient to prove itself. In none of these cases was the money expended by Virginia. In each case it was expended by the borrower.

In this case of the Winchester and Potomac Railroad Company, Virginia, by acts passed on February 22, 1866, and April 25, 1867 (App., p. 31-2), provided that the corporation could pay to the State of Virginia in bonds of that state at par the sum of $83,333.33, which was designated in the act as the "principal sum owing, together with all interest due thereon," and upon such payment the claim of the state against said company was to be "lifted and discharged." The Master finds (Rep., p. 64) that there was paid into the treasury of Virginia in 1866 in bonds under these acts, $118.518.12. A calculation will show that this was the principal sum of $83,333.33, plus the unpaid annuity from 1861 to time of payment, together with interest thereon. Under the act of 1846 this annuity of $5,000 was to be in lieu of interest on the debt due by this company to Virginia and of dividends on the stock of Virginia in the company, and so long as said $5,000 was paid the payment of the principal of the debt was to be postponed. Thus, we see that in 1867 Virginia capitalized the annuity of $5,000 at six per cent, making the principal sum of $83,333.33. She then exacted from the debtor the unpaid annuity with interest, and then she assigned to the company in consideration thereof all her right, title and interest and beneficial ownership in the loan and stock held by her in said company. In the event that the Court should find that West Virginia would be chargeable with this sum otherwise, then we confidently refer to this action of Virginia as an absolute release of all such claim.

Again: The act of February 3, 1863, (App. p. 128,) provides that there shall be transferred to West Virginia the "stocks of any company or corporation, the principal office or place of business whereof is located within the said boundaries" of West Virginia. The principal office of this railroad company was at Winchester, now and then in Virginia. Hence, none of the stock was transferable to West Virginia. Virginia evidently so understood it, for after the Civil War she legislated about this road, made contracts with it, and otherwise dealt with it, without regard to West Virginia, and quite in contrast with her acts after the war in connection with the Covington & Ohio Railroad. By reference to pages 35 to 49 of the Appendix to the Record, it will be seen that the acts of Virginia respecting this last named railroad were concurrent with acts of West Virginia.

Item 15, Kanawha Board Bonds—$60,000.

This item is referred to above as one of the loans set up in the record, made by Virginia to the James River and Kanawha Company, and secured by mortgage. The bonds were delivered to a private corporation, which had the power to do as it pleased with such bonds and the money derived from the sale thereof. The Master found that West Virginia was not chargeable therewith (Rep., p. 71).

Item 53, Harper's Ferry Raid—$189,715.59.

The Court will take judicial notice of the John Brown Raid and what it meant. It was an invasion of the State of Virginia by an outside armed force. The fact that Brown accidentally entered territory that afterwards became a part of the State of West Virginia, and that this large sum of money was expended in the transportation of troops, pay of soldiers, quartermasters' supplies and subsistence of the soldiers called from all over Virginia and most of them from the territory still Virginia, does not under the meaning of this paragraph and the ordinance make this a state expenditure within the limits of West Virginia. It was a most extraordinary event—an invasion of the sovereignty of a state, and an armed conflict with the officers of the state. After the prosecutions of the invaders were ended, and punishment inflicted by the execution of the judgment of the court, the local evidence of the fact that this large sum had been spent partly in Jefferson county, now in West Virginia, disappeared as quickly as fog before the morning sun. The soldiers returned to their homes in Virginia. This subject is referred to again herein under Paragraph IV.

Item 54, School Commissioners—$830,865.37.

The Master (Rep., p. 74) gives a very succinct statement of this item and the reasons why he disallowed the same. It was the total of the annual appropriations for the education of poor children, which were assigned to the counties now forming the State of West Virginia. It was no more of a "state expenditure" in West Virginia than the payment of the salaries of the judges of the courts was such an expenditure in that state. Hereafter, when this subject is again reached under Paragraph IV., we will state some reasons why we think that the most of it should be eliminated from this cause. Certain it is that there is no error in the refusal of the Master to allow it as an expenditure under Paragraph III.

Item 56, Trans-Alleghany Lunatic Asylum—$27,000.

Virginia never erected any public building in that part of her territory now in West Virginia. The only building she commenced in what is now West Virginia was an asylum at Weston in Lewis county, and called in the account by the above name. Prior to January 1, 1861, the sum of $125,000 was appropriated for purchase of the site and the construction of this building. On January 1, 1861, there remained of this appropriation the sum of $27,000 in bank to the credit of the board of directors of this asylum and in the hands of the treasurer of such board (R., pp. 484-5). The restored government of Virginia in January, 1861, took over this sum of $27,000 and placed the same in two banks in the City of Wheeling to the credit of the State of Virginia, and used the same for the purpose of the restored government. It needed money at that time to defend the loyal portion of the state. This money was not expended before January, 1861. It was the property of the state, and the state had the right to take it and use it for other purposes. Some time later, the state appropriated large sums of money for the purpose of completing this asylum, but that does not affect the fact that this $27,000 had not been expended at all on January 1, 1861; in fact this sum was never used for that purpose.

Item 148, Fairmont Bank $50,000; and Item 149, Northwestern Bank of Virginia at Wheeling, $341,800.

These two items were on account of the investment by Virginia of that much money in the purchase of shares of stock in these two banks. As stated heretofore, the original purchase by Virginia in the Northwestern Bank was somewhat larger, and Virginia in 1857 sold 1,082 shares, making a certain profit thereon. She covered this money into her treasury, and on the hearing before the Master she withdrew the original claim of $450,000 and reduced it to this amount, by reason of such sale.

The attitude of Virginia in this cause has been that where an expenditure had once been made, as claimed by her, no act of hers thereafter in connection therewith would affect or alter the fact. In other words, that such expenditure, when once made, should be charged in this account against West Virginia, regardless of the fact that Virginia may have sold the subject matter thereof prior to the first day of January, 1861, to some private person or corporation. These bank investments were extremely profitable. It will be seen by reference to page 176 of the Master's report under Paragraph VI. of the decree, that he reports the dividends from these identical stockholdings during the period of the accounting as $786,666.98. If Virginia intends to abandon the claim asserted by her for the amount of these bank stocks, and to attempt to distinguish the money invested in them from moneys invested in navigation or bridge company stocks, it must be because the money invested was paid back in double quantity in dividends. If West Virginia is to be charged with the moneys invested, Virginia certainly would be charged with the moneys received on the investment. We, of course, adhere to our original position, that money invested by Virginia in the stocks of all these private corporations was not a state expenditure in the meaning of the decree and the ordinance, but, as shown by the Master in his report by his excerpts from the constitution and laws of Virginia, was intended by the State of Virginia as the investment of funds in private corporations for profit. This view is made well-nigh conclusive by the fact that Virginia, by statute, prohibited the sale or transfer of any of these stocks when productive or could likely be made productive.

PARAGRAPH IV. OF DECREE.

"4. Such proportion of the ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia since any of said debt was contracted, as was properly assignable to the counties which were created into the State of West Virginia on the basis of the average total population of Virginia, with and without slaves, as shown by the census of the United States."

This paragraph, like Paragraph III., is based on the Wheeling ordinance. The ordinance used the language "a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government since any part of said debt was contracted." The decree uses the language "government of Virginia," instead of the words "state government." The parties to this controversy have apparently proceeded on the proposition that the language of the decree was intended to mean the same as that of the ordinance. The agreed period for the beginning of this account is the 19th day of March, 1823. There are no disputes as to the amounts under this paragraph. The only questions are whether certain items come under the head of "the ordinary expenses of the state government."

First, we take up the exceptions filed by West Virginia to the findings of the Master under this paragraph to which she objects. As before stated, in this part of the brief the aim is to state the facts only, and discussions of questions of law are merely incidental, and indulged in in connection with the facts only so far as necessary to make clear the position of West Virginia, and justify her exceptions.

Item No. 1, Tobacco Receipts $353,123.96; Master's Report, p. 114.

An explanation is needed to show what this means. Virginia, in her original exhibit (printed as Appendix A hereto and an exhibit herewith) under this paragraph, entered into many details. She divided the ordinary expenses, as based on her theory, into five divisions, to wit: (1) general expenses of the government; (2) administrative expenses of the Board of Public Works; (3) maps, expenses of surveys, and inspection of internal improvements; (4) general expenses of the Literary Fund; and (5) interest charges.

Under general expenses of the government there were included the following subjects, to wit: General Assembly, officers of the government, criminal charges, court charges, lunatic asylums, penitentiary, militia, public warehouses, tobacco sales, slaves transported and executed, and many other smaller items. She gave credit on the total of these items for funds derived from the sale of articles made in the penitentiary, and for fees and other moneys earned by her officers and persons whose salaries and wages were paid by the state and which were charged to this account of ordinary expenses of the state government. One of the subjects of state supervision in Virginia was the inspection of tobacco. The Court will take judicial notice of the fact that for two centuries at least tobacco had been an extremely important product of Virginia. The state appointed certain officers, called inspectors of tobacco, and paid them certain sums as salaries, and they collected from the owners of this tobacco certain fees for inspecting their tobacco. These fees were covered into the state treasury as a part of the state's moneys, and the Master finds (Report, p. 116) that the sum set out above was actually paid into the commonwealth's treasury from this source. West Virginia believes that she is entitled to a credit of this sum from the total amount of the ordinary expenses of the state government, and believes it to be very inconsistent with the original admissions of Virginia under this identical head to refuse to allow to West Virginia this credit. Virginia herself says that it is correct to allow a credit of $275,000 for moneys received from the sales of goods manufactured in the state penitentiary. The expenses of the penitentiary are charged to ordinary expenses, and the credit is given by Virginia. Under the laws of Virginia at that time, certain slaves were transported to foreign countries and sold. The owners of such slaves were paid an appraised price from the state treasury. The moneys derived from the sale of these slaves, $272,000, were credited on the total of the ordinary expenses. She had certain state officers called weigh-masters of live stock. They collected certain fees from the persons for whom they did services, and these fees were paid into the state treasury, and Virginia voluntarily gave credit therefor in her statements filed with the Master under this paragraph. We are therefore surprised at her contention that the amounts collected by the inspectors of tobacco and turned into the treasury should not likewise be a credit. When the account of ordinary expenses is charged with all the salaries of all state officers and employees and all expenses of carrying out the state laws, it seems that as a matter of principle it would necessarily follow that credit must be given for all sums of money earned by, through or under the administration of the affairs of the state by such officers and employees, and we utterly fail to see any difference between the amounts earned by inspectors of tobacco and the amounts earned by weigh-masters of live stock and the other items as above set out and conceded by Virginia in her original exhibit No. 4 under this paragraph, printed as an appendix hereto. We must therefore insist upon this claim of West Virginia, and respectfully ask that this exception be sustained, and that said sum of $343,123.96 be deducted from the total of ordinary expenses of the state government.

Exceptions to Item No. 5, maps (board of public works), $11,446.48, will be discussed along with exceptions to Item No. 27, general expenses connected with surveys, $106,983.67.

Items No. 7, International Exchanges, $2,836.19; No. 9, Printing Treasury Notes, $375.74; No. 18, Attorney General fees for prosecuting Seldon, Withers & Co., $500; and No. 19, part of $5,000 expended under the act of February 14, 1844, are in our opinion not properly charged as a part of the ordinary expenses of the state government, but a discussion of each would take too much time and space. This is especially true when we have under this identical head an item of $18,574,747.84, to the allowance of which as an ordinary expense we earnestly object. We therefore waive the exceptions of Items 7, 9, 18, and part of 19 as set out above.

Item 5, Maps (Board of Public Works) ----$ 11,446.48
Item 23, Sundry Board of Public Works expenses ----------$ 36,728.50
Item 27, General Expenses connected with Surveys ----------$106,983.67

These three items are found on pages 118, 128 and 134 of the Master's report. The general subject has already been discussed herein, and is also discussed on page 75 of the Master's report at Item 55, Paragraph III. We are of the opinion, as heretofore stated, that the amount allowed by the Master on the last named page of his report, $60,873.19, was improperly allowed as a state expenditure, and that the whole of the three above items, 5, 23 and 27, together with the additional amount, should be allowed as an ordinary expense of the state government, and no part thereof as a state expenditure. This would make the total of Item 27, $250,206.56. There are sundry parts of these Board of Public Works expenses which to our mind seem clearly improper to be classed as ordinary expenses, yet considering the comparative smallness of the amounts we will not further insist, for the same reasons that are given above as to other small amounts.

Item 16, Calling out Militia at Wheeling in 1836 .....$ 1,099.00

The Master has allowed both of these items as a part of the ordinary expenses of the state government (Rep., p 129). Virginia set up this amount, less a few deductions, as a state expenditure within the limits of West Virginia, and the Attorney General of Virginia stated her position to be that any moneys, which could be shown to have been spent in West Virginia, no matter for what purpose, were to be classed herein as state expenditures. In some instances, she has classed exactly similar expenditures when expended in West Virginia as state expenditures under Paragraph III., but when expended in Virginia she has classed them as ordinary expenses under Paragraph IV. It seems to us that under no possibility of the use of language, can it be said that exigencies of the kind for which these moneys were spent could be called "ordinary." The invasion of a state by an outside armed force for the purpose of freeing the slaves, and thus taking away from the people of the state more than $300,000,000 worth of property, was certainly somewhat "extraordinary". It would even come under the definition of one of the accountants of the plaintiff, who, when he testified in this case, said that every expense which was not "ordinary" was "extraordinary". It is true, as stated by the Master, that the maintenance of a military force was admitted as an ordinary expense by the defendant. But the defendant found on an examination of this item, that the state had maintained such military force ever since its formation, and such maintenance and the laws therefor were general, and in existence on the 19th day of March, 1823, when this account began, and were in existence until the end of this account, as they had been from the year 1788 at least. After the happening of the two events, they were brought to the attention of the legislature of Virginia, and the appropriations were made, we believe, in each case at least two years afterwards. They were most unusual and extraordinary. No fixed provision of any kind had ever been made in anticipation of them. The fact is that only two such events happened between March 19, 1823, and January 1, 1861. This statement applies to the whole State of Virginia. It should be noted that, in the preparation for the presentation of evidence in this cause, every expenditure made by Virginia during the entire period of the accounting, has been carefully scrutinized, and counsel for the plaintiff have set up everything that could by any possibility be charged to this defendant. Thus, we see that the great State of Virginia, extending from the Atlantic ocean to the Ohio river, comprising an area of 66,000 square miles, only had within its immense borders, two calls for the militia in thirty-eight years. To provide funds to meet the expenses of these two extraordinary events, special acts of the legislature, long after the happening of the events, were passed; and the legislature itself fixed the status of the Harper's Ferry case by saying that the moneys therefor were appropriated for the "defense of the commonwealth". One could as well call the expenses of Virginia in defending her soil against the British soldiers in the war of 1812-14 an ordinary expense of the state government. It is true that the expenditure at Wheeling of the $1,099 might be called a part of the criminal expenses; that is, a part of the expenses for enforcing the penal laws of the state, and be allowed on that score; but the same reason does not apply to the Harper's Ferry raid. This historical event stands out as one of the spectacular and extraordinary occasions in the history of the United States; and now, more than fifty years after its happening, the chief actor therein, John Brown, is still looked upon as a martyr in more than half of these United States, and his memory honored as such by the erection of monuments and public celebrations and the like.

Historically, it is simply impossible to say that this was an ordinary event, an ordinary occasion, or that the cost thereof was an ordinary expense. Its status in history is fixed otherwise.

Item 24, Interest on Public Debt, Aggregate $18,547,747.84.

This is the largest item in this account under this paragraph. We do not understand that there are any disputes of fact in relation thereto, but there are certain facts in the record which we think are proper here to be summarized, and which will have a bearing on the discussion of law relating to this item and found in Part III. of this brief. It is not the purpose of this part of the brief to make extended discussions of any questions of law, as heretofore stated.

In plaintiff's original Exhibit D-1 (which was their statement of ordinary expenses of the state government under Paragraph IV., and printed as Appendix A hereof), there is set out a partially detailed account of this interest. Certain credits were there given, amounting to $2,418,116, which were deducted from the total interest paid by the state during the period of accounting in this cause, and that deduction leaves the balance as at the head of this section of the brief, to wit: $18,547,747.84. It is our purpose to take up those deductions and other sums which appear on pages 1056, 1058 and 1059 of the printed record.

As a preliminary to this discussion, we state an undisputed fact, that the entire amount received from the sale of bonds of the State of Virginia was used for the purpose of either constructing some sort of a public work by the state directly, or for the purchase of stock or bonds of some corporation, of which turnpike, bank, railroad, navigation, or bridge companies were the most usual. There was expended during the said period by Virginia in its subscriptions to the capital stock of banks within her present territory the sum of $2,108,591. There was expended in the purchase of stock of turnpike and road companies wholly within the same territory the sum of $1,897,747. There was expended in the purchase of stock of bridge companies in the same territory the sum of $49,622. There was expended on account of purchase of stock of navigation companies in the same territory the sum of $908,173. There was expended for the purchase of stock of railroad companies wholly within the same territory the sum of $13,713,256. There was expended as loans to railroad companies within the same territory the sum of $2,930,000. There was expended in the direct construction of the Blue Ridge Railroad within the same territory $1,604,824. There was expended in the construction of the Covington and Ohio Railroad in the State of Virginia the sum of $1,640,668. There was expended for the construction of turnpike and roads wholly on state account, and not for the purchase of any stock in the companies, within the same territory, $791,888. There was expended directly on state account in the same territory in the construction of turnpikes and roads extending into and between the territory now constituting the two states, the sum of $247,289. This last sum is Virginia's proportion on a mileage basis of the actual cost of the construction of such roads. There was expended in the purchase of stock of the Alexandria Canal Company the sum of $272,000. There was expended in the purchase of stock of the Winchester and Potomac Railroad Company and in a loan to said company, the sum of $270,000. On a mileage basis, $41^2/_3$ per cent of this road is in Virginia and $58\frac{1}{3}$ per cent in West Virginia. There was expended for the purchase of stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company (a Maryland corporation) the sum of $250,000. There was expended for construction work and improvements on the James River Canal, Blue Ridge Canal, and Kanawha Road and River $1,216,666. Stock was taken for this upon the transfer of the canals and Kanawha Road and Kanawha River improvements to the James River and Kanawha Company. There was expended in the purchase of stock of the James River and Kanawha Company directly the sum of $2,000,000 additional. There were cash loans made by Virginia to this company of $890,000. Virginia loaned to this company bonds of the par value of $1,597,000. She guaranteed for this company bonds of the par value of $2,260,000. By the act of March 23, 1860, she assumed all of these bonds as her original debt and took in lieu thereof stock of the James River and Kanawha Company. The expenditures above named, together with others paid in interest on the bonds, amounted to a total of $9,547,582.

(R., pp. 820 L. & M.). These expenditures aggregated a sum in excess of $36,000,000, all of which was expended in the present State of Virginia except $302,000 on the Kanawha Road and Kanawha River. Practically all of this immense sum was paid for in bonds, which either formed a part of the public debt on the first day of January, 1861, or which had been retired through the operations of the Sinking Fund, or by the payment thereof by the state.

It will be seen that each and every one of these expenditures was of an extraordinary character for a state to make. They could not have been then called and would not be now called "ordinary expenditures of the state government."

While these immense expenditures were being made in the territory of the present State of Virginia, there was only expended in the counties now forming West Virginia, according to the claim of the Commonwealth of Virginia in this case, out of the moneys derived from the sale of bonds for the construction of roads, etc., and for the purchase of stocks, the sum of $4,200,000. (West Virginia does not concede that this sum was expended in the meaning of the ordinance and the decree, and the Master finds that only $2,811,000 was so expended in West Virginia, to which amount West Virginia excepts, because too large.) It will thus be seen that according to the claim of Virginia, out of a total of $40,000,000 spent for the purposes above set out, nine-tenths thereof was spent in the present State of Virginia, and one-tenth in the present State of West Virginia.

Naturally these immense investments in stocks and loans were not without some returns to the state, and Virginia recognizing this fact, made certain deductions in her "interest schedule" annexed to her original exhibit D-1 under the fourth paragraph. Credit is there given for certain sums paid as interest, as follows:

Interest on bonds in the Literary Fund	$1,324,051.00
Interest on state stock	$312,214.00
Interest on state stock	639,670.00
Interest on James River and Kanawha Company bonds	142,181.00
Total	$2,418,116.00

But in addition to the amounts collected by the state and included in the said total sum of $2,418,116, there are many other large items of income from these investments of the moneys made by the commonwealth which should be deducted if West Virginia is to be charged with any part of this interest as an ordinary expense of the state government.

There was received by Virginia the following sums from the following classes of corporations on account of investments made by Virginia therein of the moneys arising from sale of bonds, to wit:

Dividends on Bank stock	$5,936,000.00
Dividends and interest from Railroad Companies	1,748,000.00
Dividends and interest from Canal Companies	321,000.00
Dividends and interest from Turnpike Companies	119,000.00
Dividends and interest from James River and Kanawha Co.	926,000.00
Tolls from James River Company	588,000.00
Interest and annuity, Winchester & Potomac Railroad Co.	76,000.00
Tolls and Interest:
Northwestern Turnpike, Southwestern Turnpike, Staunton & Parkersburg Turnpike	$ 77,000.00
Total	$ 9,791,000.00

In this sum of $9,791,000 there is included the sum of $1,094,000 for which credit has been given. The true total is therefore $8,697,000.

There was received by the commonwealth from investments in the territory now forming West Virginia, for which no credit has been given to West Virginia in this account anywhere, the following sums:

Dividends from Banks	$786,666.00
Dividends from Turnpike Companies	15,000.00
Dividends from Bridge Companies	6,000.00
Total	$807,666.00

Of these large sums it is probable that part of the bank dividends arose from stock which was not purchased with money derived from sale of the state's bonds; but it is certain that all of the balance was wholly derived from investments made by the commonwealth with moneys derived from the sale of such bonds, and it is further a certainty that nearly all of the bank dividends from the West Virginia counties and a goodly portion of the bank dividends from the Virginia counties were derived from the stocks which were paid for by the issue of bonds of the commonwealth. It is certain that in Virginia, from companies whose stock was purchased with the proceeds of bonds, and from works which were constructed by the commonwealth with the proceeds of bonds, there was derived as dividends and interest and paid into the treasury, the sum of $3,855,000; but credit was given by the commonwealth in this account for only $1,094,000 thereof, leaving a balance of $2,761,000 so derived, for which no credit is given in this account. There should be added to this last named sum at least $1,500,000 for the dividends received from banks, the stock of which was purchased by the commonwealth out of the proceeds of her bonds. This last named sum is probably too small, but the record does not show the exact amount.

This extraordinary condition of affairs seems to us to constitute very strong reason indeed why this interest on the public debt should not be charged as an ordinary expense of the state government. Investments for profit made by the commonwealth cannot be considered as performing one of the usual, customary or ordinary duties of a state government. This is proven by the investigations made by the commonwealth through Chief Justice Marshall, and many other able men of Virginia before her system of internal improvements was commenced. The matter was in fact considered for a great many years, and many discussions for and against the inauguration thereof were had. Many reports were written by able commissions and many messages on the subject were penned by able executives. It was recognized then as a work of extraordinary character and one outside of the usual, ordinary functions of a state government.

West Virginia is charged by the Master under Paragraph III. as her portion of the ordinary expenses of the state government, the sum of $2,811,000. Of this amount about $100,000 was expended prior to the year 1831. A further sum of about $500,000 was expended between 1830 and 1840. Another sum of about $500,000 was expended between 1840 and 1850. The balance between 1850 and 1861, and the greater part of this balance of $1,900,000 was expended between 1855 and 1861. These facts were known to the Master when he made up his report, yet he finds that $18,500,000 of interest on the public debt is an ordinary expense of the state government under the peculiar circumstances of this case. The result of this finding is that West Virginia would pay from one-fourth to one-tenth, as this Court may determine, of this huge sum of money. For argument's sake we will suppose that this court will determine that a just proportion of these ordinary expenses to be paid by West Virginia under the ordinance would be one-fourth. That would make West Virginia liable for more than $4,600,000 of this interest on the public debt. This sum would be treble the amount of interest that Virginia actually paid on the amount found by the Master to have been expended by the commonwealth within the present limits of West Virginia.

It must be remembered that under Paragraph VI. of the decree, it is shown that West Virginia paid into the treasury of the commonwealth more than $6,100,000 in taxes during the period. While West Virginia receives credit in the settlement under the ordinance for this amount, she does not receive any interest thereon or on any part thereof. Certainly, it would have been just and equitable for the Master to have offset the interest on the state expenditure of $2,800,000 by the use of the $6,100,000.

It must be further remembered that the men who passed or adopted the ordinance knew of this expenditure for interest on the public debt; knew what items entered into the expenses of the state government; knew what expenditures had been made by the state within the limits of the counties now forming West Virginia. It is shown by the historical records of Virginia that many of them had been members of the legislature of Virginia; that many of them had been members of the constitutional convention of 1851, wherein these matters were very thoroughly discussed; that one citizen of the territory now West Virginia had been at that time (1861) for many years auditor of the commonwealth; that this auditor had made annual reports, some of which have been filed as exhibits in this cause. These reports were large volumes, and gave the annual details of the moneys received and expended by the commonwealth. It gave the details of the bonds issued and sold, and the purposes for which their proceeds were used. In addition, there were the annual reports of the Board of Public Works, which contained all the reports made to them by the state engineer and all the other officers and employees of the state under their authority. A glance at these reports will show how full and complete they were as to the cost of all of these public works.

A controversy had existed for at least forty years concerning the expenditure of the public moneys derived from bonds on these public works. Citizens of the territory now within West Virginia had for that period claimed that a gross injustice was done to the people west of the mountains, and justified their contention by giving details thereof; and even to this day, with the lapse of fifty years for the passion and prejudice and the deep-seated feeling of injustice suffered at that period to pass away, we submit that no unbiased person will say that West Virginia received her share of these public improvements, when it is considered that out of $40,000,000 expended therefor Virginia only claimed to have expended one-tenth in the present limits of West Virginia. Virginia spent during this period $20,000,000 and more in purchasing stock and making loans for, and directly building, railroads in her present territory. Between 1855 and 1860 she expended $1,146,000 in the direct construction of one railroad in West Virginia, and that was done, as is plainly to be seen, for the benefit of the Virginia Central Railroad, which was built from her capital at Richmond to a point within fifteen miles of the present limits of West Virginia, and which, as it was then seen, could not be made a successful financial venture unless it reached the Ohio river and tapped the paying traffic of that region and that of counties now in West Virginia. This road and its connections would carry this rich traffic, by way of Virginia's capital, to her eastern seaboard, and prove, as it was believed, of immense benefit to that part of the old state.

The division of the old state was not the growth of a few weeks of civil war, but it was the result of what the people of the counties now forming West Virginia believed and said was the gross injustice done to the counties west of the mountains by the larger population east thereof. The counties of West Virginia found an opportunity in 1861 to do that for which many had hoped for half a century preceding that date.

The record in this cause shows that in 1860 the slave population of Virginia amounted to 490,000 people. Of these only 18,000 were inhabitants of the counties now forming West Virginia. Two-thirds of this number of 18,000 were inhabitants of a half dozen border counties. Slaves were then the most staple and productive property. At $350 apiece this property was worth over $170,000,000, of which about $6,000,000 belonged to the people of the counties now forming West Virginia, and $164,000,000 to the people of the counties now forming the State of Virginia. The estimate of $350 per slave is a very low one indeed. If we were to take the estimate placed upon this class of property by the owners thereof, as shown by the census of the United States for 1860, the value would be more than double our figures. The auditor of Virginia estimated the slaves to be worth $612.63 each. (Auditor's report for 1858-59, p. 392.)

By the constitution of 1851, which the majority east of the mountains imposed upon the state, it was decreed that none of these slaves under twelve years old, although property and subject to sale, should be taxed, and those above the age of twelve years were taxed at a very small rate which amounted to $1.20 a person. The assessor's books show, as set out in the record, that the assessment of these slaves in number was much less than that shown by the census of the United States. Certain it is that the slaves above twelve years of age would easily average the price of five to seven hundred dollars apiece, but for the selfish reasons of the owners they practically escaped taxation. All the property of the people west of the mountains, except their small and decreasing number of slaves, paid its full share of taxes and had no such exemptions.

By reason of this unjust system of taxation the people living in the territory now West Virginia, from March 19, 1823 to January 1, 1861, the period of accounting in this cause, paid very many thousands of dollars in taxes above their just share. The system worked a double injustice; for the people west of the mountains not only paid their just share of taxes, but they were compelled to pay in addition what the people east of the mountains ought to have paid and did not pay. This unjust system of taxation was put and kept upon the western counties by an equally unjust scheme of representation in the General Assembly of Virginia, whereby the basis of representation in that body was arbitrarily fixed to favor the eastern part of the state. It provided among other things, that the owner of slaves should have three votes for every five slaves owned by him. By the political power thus given them by their slaves the owners thereof in eastern Virginia practically exempted their slaves from taxation; and also by this unjust power they enacted laws to protect them in the ownership of this property, which entailed great expense upon the state; such items, for instance, as "slaves transported and executed," $311,000; "transportation of free persons of color to Liberia," $26,103.50; "fugitive slave fund," $5201; as well as no inconsiderable part of the large disbursements for military and militia expenses, criminal expenses and penitentiary expenses. By reference to Appendix A hereof, it will be seen, that from 1820 to 1861 the disbursements out of the treasury of Virginia for "criminal expenses," were $1,785,632.11, exclusive of $1,188,212.34 of "court charges;" and that the disbursements, during that period, on account of military expenses, embraced in such items as the "militia," "public arsenals," "public guard," "guards in the country," "military contingent," "armory—manufactory and repairs of arms," etc., etc., aggregated $1,325,000. This does not include disbursements on account of the penitentiary, of $844,000, nor the cost of the Harper's Ferry raid, $255,745.77 (Rec., p. 374). It should be remembered that there was not in the entire territory of Virginia, which is now West Virginia, on the 1st day of January, 1861, a single mile of state-built or state-aided railroad, nor a mile of canal, nor a state building; not even a school, not a public institution of any kind. The asylum for the insane, at Weston had just been commenced. The capitol and all the buildings appertaining thereto, the university, the asylums, the institutes, armories, arsenals, and all other public institutions, as well as all the railroads and canals constructed wholly or partly by state money, and in which millions of such money had been expended, were all located in eastern Virginia and fell to that part of Virginia upon the formation of West Virginia.

With this knowledge and under these conditions the ordinance was framed and passed. It was believed to be just that West Virginia should pay for the state expenditures within her limits during the period of the contraction of this debt; and also should pay a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government during the same period. These two sections taken together necessarily imply a distinction between these two classes of expenditures. They were made with complete knowledge at first hand of the history of the state for the period. Is it right, reasonable, or just to hold that this ordinance was intended to mean that West Virginia was to pay the full amount of all these expenditures, and in addition thereto to pay a large amount of the interest on the public debt which had been expended in the limits of Virginia, the objects upon which it had been expended being still the property of Virginia and situated within her territory? Is it not more reasonable and just to believe that they intended that the state expenditures should be paid, and that the just proportion of ordinary expenses of the state government meant those expenses which were then, had been in 1823, and are now the usual and customary expenses attached to the running of any state government, to wit, the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, together with those of the state educational system and the state eleemosynary institutions? No stretch of the imagination can include investment in private corporations as a part of the usual and customary functions of a state.

Again, as stated above, the interest on the moneys with which West Virginia is charged is largely in excess of the interest on the moneys expended in West Virginia.

The act of February 3, 1863, which transferred certain property of Virginia within the limits of West Virginia to the new state, is so near to the time of the passage of the ordinance and the adoption of the constitution of 1862, that it becomes entitled to weight as a contemporaneous construction of these documents. It is inconceivable that in a little over a year after the adoption of the ordinance they would have passed the act just spoken of if they believed they were to pay the value of the properties received by the act and in addition interest on the money which created the properties?

We can think of no more apt illustration of the falsity of the finding of this interest as an ordinary expense of the state government, than that of the ordinary family. Every one can apply this to himself, whether he be a lawyer or a layman. Every family has certain usual expenses, which can be as justly termed "ordinary expenses of family government and maintenance," as those in this case are termed "ordinary expenses of the state government and maintenance." We use the word "maintenance" advisedly, because the language of the ordinance undoubtedly means those ordinary expenses which are necessary to maintain a state government. The ordinary expenses of a family would surely include food, clothing, a house in which to live, gotten by rent or otherwise, furniture, expenses of education, expenses of illness, and the expenses necessary and incident to the care of a house and things of like nature for the necessities and comfort of the household. With these expenses upon him, if the head of the family should determine upon an investment in the purchase of a corner lot and the erection of a building thereon, for rental, or should invest in stocks for the purpose of receiving dividends, and the funds not being in hand, he would have to borrow the same and pay interest thereon, is it possible to say that the interest on this loan, made for this purpose, wholly unconnected with the usual expenses and purposes of family government and maintenance, is an ordinary family expense?

That was the condition of Virginia in 1822. She owed no public debt. She had no interest to pay. She entered upon this system of borrowing money for purposes wholly unconnected with her usual and customary duties as a state government. Surely this expenditure was extraordinary; the purpose was extraordinary; this payment of interest then was extraordinary and unusual. Can this principle be changed by the fact that Virginia enlarged these expenditures, enlarged her issue of bonds, and necessarily continued and enlarged her payment of interest?

Item 26, Expended for Primary Schools, $2,400,331.11.

The differentiation of the sum of $2,400,331.11 from other funds expended for primary schools, which were derived directly from taxation, is partly based on the source from which it is derived. Virginia had what was known as the Literary Fund. This fund was mostly in hand when our period commenced on March 19, 1823. Some accretions were made to it from time to time from forfeitures, fines and escheats. None of the principal of this fund was expended. This sum of $2,400,331.11 came from the income derived from the investment of the principal of this Literary Fund in bonds, stocks and loans, from which was derived dividends and interest, and these dividends and interest were expended by the state for educational purposes. As stated above, most of the principal of this fund was in hand when our period commenced, and Virginia remained the owner of all of it when our period ended on January 1, 1861. This fund was during that period the property of the entire state. It had come from the property of the entire state, as shown by the record, and it is an historical fact, that the nucleus of the fund was the money collected from the government of the United States by the Commonwealth of Virginia on account of Revolutionary War claims.

A brief analysis of this fund and statement of the methods of its production are pertinent at this point. This analysis is made from the figures found in the record, pages 538-B to 538-H. These figures are agreed to by the accountants of each party. They show that on the 19th of March, 1823, there was in the Literary Fund, in cash and moneys invested, $1,240,000; that on the first day of January, 1861, there was $2,200,000; there was received during the period from all sources $4,869,000; and that there was paid out in cash and charged off on account of losses $3,907,000.

The accretions to the fund, making up the sum of $4,869,000, are divided as follows:

From counties now forming West Virginia under laws then in existence....	$114,395.00
From counties now forming Virginia....	401,972.00

These sums under the law were permanent additions to the fund that in a little over a year after the adoption of the ordinance they would have passed the act just spoken of if they believed they were to pay the value of the properties received by the act and in addition interest on the money which created the properties?

From counties now forming West Virginia under laws then in existence....	$114,395.00
From counties now forming Virginia....	401,972.00

These sums under the law were permanent additions to the fund and became part of the principal, which was in no way to be expended. These permanent additions were invested from time to time, as they came in, like other parts of the principal, and only the income thereof was permitted to be expended.

There was received from the United States war claims $182,441. This was a permanent addition, and comes under the rule set out above as to the funds.

There was received as dividends on stock and as interest on loans made to persons or corporations other than the commonwealth, the sum of $1,059,695. Of this sum $800,764 were dividends on bank stock owned by this fund, and $155,291 were dividends on James River Company stock owned by this fund.

There was received directly from the treasury of the commonwealth,

1.	United States war claims ---------- This sum was a permanent addition to the fund and was not to be annually expended like its income.	$ 77,216.00
2.	Capitation taxes ---------- This sum was expended annually through the Literary Fund, as received.	751,481.00
3.	Interest on investments in state bonds--	2,230,445.00
4.	Dividends on James River Co. stock----	50,686.00
	Total ----------	$4,869,000.00

The expenditures made from this fund, which are charged to the account of "ordinary expenses of the state government" under the ordinance and the decree in this cause, are as follows:

For account of Primary Schools—
Paid from income from investments ----------	$2,400,331.00
Paid from capitation tax	655,908.00	$3,056,239.00
University of Virginia ----------		613,000.00
Institution of Deaf, Dumb & Blind ----		40,821.00
Virginia Military Institute ----------		28,500.00
Salaries and expenses of Board ------		85,322.00
Total ----------		$3,823,882.00

Each and every one of these items of expenditure, as stated above, are charged to the account of "ordinary expenses of the state government". We have admitted that the sum of $655,908, paid out of capitation taxes, should be charged against us, for the reason that this sum was taken from the taxes collected from the whole state, and West Virginia has received under Paragraph VI. credit for the amount of taxes paid in by her counties to this fund. We have not seriously objected to the amounts paid to the University and to the other institutions named above. We have not objected that the salaries and expenses of the board were charged as part of the ordinary expenses of the state government. We have insisted, and still insist, that the sum of $2,400,000 is not a proper charge, because of the reasons set out above and for the further reasons hereinafter given.

The analysis of the figures above given plainly shows that no moneys were expended out of the capital of the Literary Fund as it existed on March 19, 1863. There was added to the capital of this fund during the period $960,000, of which $260,000 came from the United States on war claims, and this was the property of the whole state. The additional sum of $516,000 thereof came from redemption of lands, escheats, and things of like nature. Of this sum about two-sevenths came from counties now in the state of West Virginia. The balance of this capital account came from income of the fund which was not expended, and went back into the fund as a permanent addition thereto.

Virginia has seen fit to give credit against the item of interest on the public debt under Paragraph IV., the sum of $1,324,000, being a part of the interest received from the commonwealth on state bonds. Why she did not also give credit for the $926,919 interest received by this fund from the same source, and the $50,686 received from the commonwealth as interest on James River Company stock, we are at a loss to understand. West Virginia is charged twice in this account with these two sums, once as interest on the public debt, and once as expenditures from the Literary Fund. Common justice requires that, if the Court shall be of opinion that it is proper to charge this sum of $2,400,000 to the account of ordinary expenses under the particular circumstances herein detailed, it certainly will deduct this total of $977,606, either from this item, or from the item of interest on the public debt in the event that the Court shall overrule our exception to the finding of the Master in reference to the interest on the public debt. But counsel for West Virginia are confident this Court will sustain our exception to this item of interest and deny the right of Virginia to charge the same as part of the ordinary expenses of the state government.

Virginia in her original exhibit D-1 under Paragraph IV. of the decree (printed as Appendix A of this brief) gives credit against the total of the ordinary expenses therein claimed for many items of income. These credits aggregate the sum of $838,000. She recognized the fact that where moneys were paid into the state treasury, which were the result of expenditures made from that treasury and charged in this account as ordinary expenses of the state government, the account should be credited with such receipts. As hereinbefore set out, some of these receipts were moneys received from the sale of goods made by convicts in the penitentiary, moneys received from the sale of supreme court reports which were printed and sold by the state, moneys received from the sale of slaves, which under statute were transported and sold. This admission on the part of Virginia of these credits is a complete and authoritative answer to the position of the Master, that the particular source from which money was derived was immaterial to him, so far as this account is concerned (Rep. p. 134). Virginia admits the right of West Virginia to investigate the source of the moneys paid out for the items claimed by her as ordinary expenses of the state government. She thereby further admits the principle of the right to credits against this account of ordinary expenses for all income into the treasury that arose from the labor of state employees or the management of state institutions or the investment of state funds. In fact, credit should be given against this account of ordinary expenses for all income into the treasury that arose from sources other than taxes in some form or moneys borrowed.

What was the difference in principle between moneys earned by a state convict by his labor and moneys earned by the loan or investment of the state Literary Fund by its labor? Each is measured alone by the work done by it. Each is a producer. The expenses connected with the work of each were paid by the state and are charged in this account as ordinary expenses of the state government. Why should not the earnings of each be treated in the same manner?

We submit that the finding of the Master on this Item 26 is erroneous, and the exception of the State of West Virginia thereto should be sustained.

Exception as to Apportionment.

The defendant further excepts to the following finding.

> "I find that the method adopted by the plaintiff of ascertaining 'the average total population,' is the clearest and most accurate approximation upon which the ordinary expenses can be apportioned to 'the average total population,' as the object to be ascertained, is the population in existence, at the time of the ordinary expenses to be apportioned, were paid, and I therefore adopt the plaintiff's method." (Rep., p. 141.)

Paragraph IV. of the decree provides that the proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government chargeable to West Virginia, be ascertained "on the basis of the average total population of Virginia, with and without slaves, as shown by the census of the United States" (R., p. 173). As understood by West Virginia, this meant the average total population of each census, beginning with the period commencing on the 19th day of March, 1823, and ending on the 31st day of December, 1860. This made five census periods, 1820, 1830, 1840, 1850 and 1860. We conceive the language of the decree to mean that the average of these five census periods should be taken. Nothing in the decree or elsewhere, so far as we can find, directed the Master to divide these expenss into four periods, one of seven years and three of ten years.

As shown by the Master's report (p. 139), the only state expense which increased in proportion faster than the population, was the item, "interest on the public debt". In fact, outside of this one item, as claimed by the plaintiff, the ordinary expenses of the state government were in proportion to the population greater in the first decade. For instance, when the population, with slaves, of Virginia in the period between 1823 and 1830 was 928,558, and of West Virginia was 136,808, the ordinary expenses of the state government, after deducting the claimed interest charged, were $3,394,301.

In the period of 1840 to 1850, when the population of Virginia had increased to 1,120,000 and the population of West Virginia had increased to 302,000, the ordinary expenses outside of this claimed interest charge, had only increased to $5,365,000. The population of West Virginia had more than doubled, but the ordinary expenses of the state government outside of the claimed interest charge, lacked one million and a half dollars of doubling. It will be observed that the first period only covered seven years and the last ten years. The interest charge of the third decade as found by the Master is greater in amount than the total charges for ordinary expenses in the first decade. The interest charge in the fourth decade exceeds in amount the total of the charges, other than interest, in the third and fourth decades. It also exceeds in amount the total of the charges in the first, second and third decades, after the interest charges have been deducted therefrom.

The percentage of the increase in the population of the territory composing the two states was greater in that which is now West Virginia. The percentage of the increase of the expenditures of the state government, outside of the claimed interest charge and the taxes under the constitution of 1851 for school purposes and the Harper's Ferry Raid of 1859, were quite uniform. As shown elsewhere herein, the interest charges were based on the extraordinary expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia in the construction of railroads, canals, and other works of like nature, and in the purchase of stocks in railroad companies, canal companies, and other companies of like nature, and in banks. About $40,000,000 was expended by the commonwealth for these purposes Nine-tenths of these expenditures and purchases were made in what are the present limits of the Commonwealth of Virginia. One-tenth of these expenditures and purchases was made in what are the present limits of the State of West Virginia. It does not seem to us to be an equitable way of ascertaining "a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government" to apportion three-fourths of this interest to the decade when West Virginia's population was the largest. We submit that even if the Court should overrule the exception of West Virginia to the finding of the Master, which holds that interest on the public debt is an ordinary expense of the state government, it should nevertheless sustain the exception of West Virginia to this finding of the Master on apportionment.

We further submit that the Master was not called upon to render any decision on this claim of apportionment made by Virginia, as it is plainly not included in the decree of reference.

Exceptions of Virginia to the Finding of the Master Under Paragraph IV. of the Decree.

Virginia does not file any specific exceptions to any finding of the Master under Paragraph IV. Unless they intended to insist upon the same general exceptions as set out herein under Paragraph III., Virginia has no exception to the findings under Paragraph IV. The language of Virginia's general exception would include many findings of the Master under this paragraph.

The items asked for by Virginia, and which were not allowed by the Master, consist largely of one general class, to wit: buildings erected in the present State of Virginia in connection with public institutions. The following is a list thereof:

Item 6, Deaf, Dumb and Blind Institution	$ 80,661.94
Item 11, Virginia Military Institute, new building	151,000.00
Item 12, University of Virginia, repairs and improvements to buildings, and water supply	25,000.00
Item 13, Improvements, Capitol Square	12,278.47
Item 15, Penitentiary Lot, new hospital building	13,947.48
Item 17, Medical College of Virginia, additions and improvements to buildings	25,000.00
Item 19, Eastern and Western Asylum	344,295.57
Item 20, Gun House at Alexandria	900.00
Item 21, Cannon House, Surry County	110.00
Item 22, Cannon House for Richmond Artillery	1,079.00

All of these items were either for the purchase of real estate or the erection of buildings on real estate owned by the commonwealth. The only building in the territory now West Virginia was the asylum at Weston, called the Trans-Alleghany Lunatic Asylum, which was charged to West Virginia as a state expenditure. If such an expenditure of money should come under the first section of the ordinance as a state expenditure, then it would be utterly inconsistent to ask that expenditures of the same kind when made in Virginia should be classed as ordinary expenses of the state government. They were permanent investments, and are still owned and used by the State of Virginia. They were not expenditures for the maintenance of the inmates of those institutions. We submit that the Master's finding thereon was absolutely correct and should be sustained.

Three other items, which were claimed by Virginia as ordinary expenses of the state government, and which were not allowed by the Master, are as follows:

Item 2, Constitutional Conventions ---	$258,906.28
Item 4, Boundary lines ----------	16,704.78
Item 5, Maps of the Commonwealth ---	16,628.04

These items are in the same class in so far as they were moneys expended for occasional acts done in pursuance of law. There were two constitutional conventions within the period, one in 1829 and one in 1851, but they were not ordinary events in any sense of the word. During the period, under special acts of the legislature, certain boundary lines between Virginia and some of her neighbors were ascertained and established, and the sum of money above named as item 4 was specially appropriated for the purpose. The ruling of the Master should be sustained for the very good reasons given by him on p. 117 of his report.

The legislature also saw fit on certain occasions to have made a map of the state. These occasions were rare, and the duty was specially performed under a special act of the legislature. They were unusual in the sense that none of these acts were done except when the legislature specially ordered it, and when the specific order was complied with the whole matter was ended. We submit that the ruling of the Master thereon was correct. (Rep., p. 118.)

PARAGRAPH V. OF DECREE.

"5. And also on the basis of the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia."

The exceptions of West Virginia under this paragraph are to the finding of the Master of the "fair estimated value" of the real estate in the counties now forming Virginia and in the counties now forming West Virginia. The assessed valuation of the real estate, on June 20, 1863, in the counties of Virginia was $296.085,460.31; and in the counties of West Virginia, $82,449,252.04.

In finding the valuation of property it has been conceded by both parties that the best evidence obtainable was the assessed valuation made by sworn officers of the state, chosen for the purpose. Their sworn returns of such valuation are primi facie correct. The acts were judicial in their character. The only other valuation of official character was that made by the officers of the United States in taking the census of 1860; in which each person for himself put down the real valuation, as conceived by him, of his property, real and personal. This valuation was at least three times as large as the assessed valuation. However, the Master took the assessed valuation as the basis; and the question now under discussion is whether he was justified in taking fifty per cent of the assessed valuation as the fair estimated valuation of such real property. He applied this rule to the whole of Virginia and to fourteen counties of West Virginia. This was done on the theory that the ravages of the war had depreciated the values equally in the ninety-nine counties of Virginia, but had only affected the values in fourteen of the forty-eight counties of West Virginia. We contend this is unfair to West Virginia.

Some evidence was taken by Virginia (R., pp 739-785). This was given by witnesses who had admittedly seen but a small part of Virginia and who necessarily knew the exact condition only in a small part of the state. Historically speaking, it is a known fact that up to the 20th of June, 1863, not one-third of the counties of Virginia had been in any way touched by invading armies, and no ravages could have been committed in the other counties where the sentiment of the people was apparently unanimously in favor of the Confederate cause. The evidence of these witnesses is, we claim, incompetent, is very vague, indefinite, and altogether unreliable. None of them were qualified by reason of travel or knowledge during the particular period to speak of the conditions except in a very small territory. The evidence shows conclusively these facts. It is not the character of evidence sufficient to overthrow the official records of the State. Virginia cannot impeach the integrity of her sworn officers in this manner. Each county had an officer called Commissioner of Revenue and some counties had two or more of these officers. It was their sworn duty to assess the properties situated therein. They had the power to reduce assessments of real estate where the value thereof had been reduced by the destruction of any of the buildings or things of like nature thereon. The fact that the assessments of 1863 were made after the allowance of such reductions or depreciation in values, shows the mistaken ideas or the lack of information of these witnesses. The assessing officer fixed the value at the time he saw the property, while these witnesses estimated the value of such property which they casually saw a half century thereafter.

It is a well known historical fact that in the early period of the war there was a great conflict in many parts of the forty-eight counties now forming West Virginia. This is especially true of the southern and eastern counties thereof. It is a further fact that during practically the entire period of the war a destructive internecine conflict continued in at least one-half of the counties of West Virginia between those sympathizing with the Union and those sympathizing with the Confederacy. This condition was much more destructive of property than anything that had been actually done by the armies in the present State of Virginia prior to June 20, 1863.

We submit that there is no reliable or convincing testimony in this record sufficient for the Master to reduce the value of assessed real property in Virginia one-half in order to arrive at what is termed "the fair estimated value" thereof on the 20th of June, 1863. We further submit that if the testimony is sufficient to convince this Court that fifty per cent of the assessed value of real estate in Virginia was the fair estimated value, then the same rule should apply to West Virginia, and there should have been an equal reduction of the assessed value of the lands in the counties now forming West Virginia.

The fact must not be lost sight of that up to the 20th of June, 1863, the outlook for the success of the Union armies was not particularly bright; and the belief was pretty general, at least within the lines of the Confederacy, that the separation of the states therein from the Union was complete. Many parts of Virginia in the early period of the war reaped large benefits in a money way by the opportunity of her people to sell war supplies at an advanced rate.

It is proved by the evidence of witnesses that in West Virginia there was a decided emigration of many people, according to their sympathies. Those who sympathized with the southern cause sought protection within the lines of the Confederate forces and mostly within the counties now forming Virginia. Those who sympathized with the Union sought protection beyond the Ohio River within the certain lines of Union control. Many of these never returned, but settled upon the cheap lands of the West, and were lost as citizens forever to the State of West Virginia. Virginia still retained, up to the 20th of June, 1863, her labor supply of slaves. It will be remembered that in the Virginia counties, according to the census of 1860, there were 472,000 slaves, while there were only 18,000 in the counties of West Virginia. It is further shown in the record that three-fourths of those were in the counties which, during the greater part of the Civil War, gave allegiance to the Confederate government. Thus, one state had its labor supply at hand and the other state had its labor supply either in the army of one or the other contending parties, or had seen it migrate to the West. It will be remembered that the counties of West Virginia furnished the two contending armies, or used as home guard soldiers, a force of 60,000 men out of a population of only 376,000 white persons, as shown by the census of 1860.

We respectfully insist that under these circumstances the assessed valuation of the real estate should stand as the "fair estimated value of the real property" in the two states.

Exceptions of Virginia.

The first exceptions of Virginia under this paragraph relates to the finding of the Master of the fair estimated value of the real and personal property in the counties of Virginia as of January 1, 1861, on the ground that the same is not responsive to the paragraph or any other paragraph of the decree. This finding of the Master was made at the request of the defendant under the following clause in the decree:

> "The master will make his report with all convenient speed and transmit therewith the evidence on which he proceeds, and is to be at liberty to state any special circumstances he considers of importance, and to state such alternative accounts as may be desired by either of the parties, subject to the direction of the Court."

It seemed to West Virginia that January 1, 1861, was a much more proper and pertinent date on which to find the fair estimated value of property, than the 20th of June, 1863, and for that reason the defendant requested the Master to make such finding.

Virginia also excepted to the finding of the Master under this paragraph, because he included the value of slaves in his statement of personal property in Virginia, and because he adopted the assessed value thereof as the fair estimated value. We are utterly unable to see any point in either of these exceptions. Slaves constituted the most valuable personal property that Virginia had. Their productive value, as well as their salable value, was much greater than all the other personal property in the whole state. They were assessed annually by the Commissioners of Revenue, and that assessment, made by more than one hundred commissioners representing each county in the state, (all appointed by law and sworn to perform an official duty to the best of their ability), is certainly entitled to more weight than the personal testimony of a few witnesses given forty-seven years after the event. We submit that Virginia cannot at this late day impeach her own official records in any such way or manner.

The last exception of Virginia under this paragraph relates to the question whether or not these assessments were made on the basis of Confederate currency.

It is shown by a comparison of the assessments of 1860 and 1863 that there was relatively the same proportion of such personal property as horses, sheep and cattle, and that the increase in the assessed value thereof in many counties was not noticeable, while the greatest seems only to have been a thirty or forty per cent increase. The claim by Virginia that they had been increased at least four times was found to be utterly and entirely refuted by their own records. This question was considered by the Master, and in view of the official records he found against the contention of Virginia thereon. We respectfully submit that this finding was correct. We further submit that all the exceptions filed by Virginia to this paragraph should be overruled.

PARAGRAPH VI. OF DECREE.

> "6. All moneys paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during the period prior to the admission of the latter State into the Union."

West Virginia excepted to the report of the Master under this paragraph, because of his refusal to allow any of the four items following as payment of money into the treasury of Virginia from counties now in West Virginia, namely:

Item 7, Dividends from Banks in West Virginia counties	$786,666.98
Item 8, Dividends and interest in Turnpike Companies in West Virginia counties	13,595.48
Item 9, Dividends from Bridge Companies in West Virginia counties	6,028.51
Item 10, Dividends from Interstate Turnpike Companies (proportion)	1,355.92

These four items aggregate $807,646.89. The Master refused to allow them on the ground that they were not public payments, but were simply dividends received by the state on stock owned by it and held in its private capacity. In view of the holding of the Master under Paragraph III. of the decree, that the purchase of the stock of banks and of turnpike, bridge and navigation companies was not a state expenditure within the meaning of the ordinance or decree, we believe that his holding in the present case is the correct one; and if this Court should approve his holding in that respect, we desire to withdraw these exceptions. But if this Court should hold that the purchase of these stocks by the commonwealth was a state expenditure in the meaning of the ordinance and decree, then we insist that these four items should be allowed, and that our exceptions be sustained. Certainly, if West Virginia is to be charged with the cost price of the stocks, she should be credited with the income received therefrom. The Commonwealth of Virginia, in her original account, and even in her amended accounts, filed under Paragraph III. of the decree, claimed the sum of $391,800, expended for the purpose of bank stocks, as state expenditures. In her exceptions filed to Paragraph III. no mention is made of the refusal of the Master to allow this sum on said account.

It is but human to wonder whether this apparent withdrawal of this item was caused by the showing made by the defendant under Paragraph VI. Virginia certainly must have recognized that if West Virginia was to be charged with the value of these stocks, then she should also be credited with the dividends received therefrom. The dividends received on the bank stock were very large, but those received on the stocks in the turnpike, bridge and navigation companies were so small in amount that the total thereof would have no appreciable influence upon the grand total of $1,104,000 that was expended in the purchase of these stocks, and which total sum Virginia desires to charge to West Virginia under said Paragraph III.

The Master found that

Item 1, Bonus received from Banks	$96,253.62
Item 20, Merchants and Mechanics Bank stock sold (bonus stock)	43,103.35
Item 22, Northwestern Turnpike Road Item 23, Staunton and Parkersburg Road, net tolls	12,132.12 were moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth, and allowed the contention of West Virginia on that point. We are again in the dark as to the contention of Virginia. Her general exception covers these items, but there was no specific exception to the finding of the Master thereon. There can be no real question on these points. The finding of the Master is absolutely correct. (R., pp. 174, 177, 178.) These sums, except perhaps the tolls, were raised in another form of taxation than that usually employed. Still they were taxes, and nothing else. A license tax or a franchise tax is a tax in the meaning of this ordinance and decree. This Court has recently held that they were taxes in the meaning of the bankrupt act. (State of New Jersey v. Anderson, 203 U. S., page 483.) The language of the ordinance and of this decree is broader than the word "tax." They use the expression, "All moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth." Only sovereigns have a right to levy taxes; that is, sovereigns within their own jurisdiction. Here the state levied a franchise tax, in one case of money, and in the other case of stock. Then the state sold the stock and received the money therefor.

PARAGRAPH VII. OF DECREE.

> "7. The amount and value of all money, property, stocks and credits which West Virginia received from the Commonwealth of Virginia, not embraced in any of the preceding items, and not including any property, stocks or credits which were obtained or acquired by the Commonwealth after the date of the organization of the Restored Government of Virginia, together with the nature and description thereof."

West Virginia excepted to the finding of the Master because he found that on June 20, 1863, the 3418 shares of the capital stock of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia at Wheeling was worth the sum of $427,250. (Rep., pp. 189-192.) We are unable to appreciate the reasoning upon which the Master arrived at this conclusion. This bank was incorporated in 1817. The stock purchased by the state was made for two different accounts: $50,000 of stock was purchased in the years 1832 and 1833 for the Literary Fund, and the balance of $400,000 in 1837, 1838 and 1839 for the Commonwealth Fund. It is shown herein, and not disputed, that all the accounts of the state were carried either in the Commonwealth Fund, the Board of Public Works Fund, or the Literary Fund. They were all funds of the state of Virginia.

The laws of Virginia (Code of Va. 1860, chap. 58, secs. 42-3) required each of its state banks to make quarterly statements to the governor, showing therein the amount of its capital stock paid and unpaid, the value of its real estate, amount of debts due to and from it, its bad and doubtful debts, specie on hand, amount of deposits, its circulation, amount of bills on hand, rate of last dividend, and amount of surplus or contingent fund. There was no provision of law for periodical examination of banks by an expert public officer, as in these days. The only provision found in the laws of Virginia for the inspection of banks, is that contained in section 45 of said chapter 58 of the Code of 1860, wherein it is provided that an examination of the books and proceedings of any bank might be made by a joint committee of the two houses of the general assembly, or by that of either house, or by a commission appointed by the general assembly or the governor. It will be perceived that each bank was the sole judge of the value of its assets—of the value of its real estate, and whether a debt due it was bad or doubtful, etc. With such power, almost any bank, no matter how bad or doubtful its condition, could make a good showing. Modern laws, both of the Federal government, and perhaps of the most of the states, have changed all this. Experience made it necessary. Now, expert examiners are required, at short periods, carefully to examine in detail the assets of banks, inspecting each note, bond, and other details of such assets.

The Northwestern Bank, under statutes of Virginia, had its main or parent branch at Wheeling, in the county of Ohio, now West Virginia; a branch at Wellsburg, in the county of Brooke, now West Virginia; a branch at Parkersburg, in the county of Wood, now West Virginia, and a branch at Jeffersonville, in the county of Tazewell, then and now Virginia. The reports made by these branch banks were made to the parent bank at Wheeling, which made reports to state officers of Virginia of the bank as a whole, and not distinguishing among the branches. Hence, there cannot be ascertained from the books or the records of the State of Virginia the value of the assets of any one of these branches, nor indeed of the parent bank itself separately from the branches. The State of West Virginia, through one of the counsel employed in this case, made an exhaustive search to find, if possible, the books of the Northwestern Bank at the time of the separation of the two states, or at any period near thereto. It was found that all the books had long since been destroyed.

After the war, in 1865, the parent bank and the two branches in West Virginia were converted into three National Banks, namely: the National Bank of West Virginia at Wheeling, the First National Bank of Wellsburg, and the Parkersburg National Bank. There were certain assets of the old Northwestern Bank at each of these points which the new bank declined to take. These assets were administered by what was called the Board of Commissioners of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia. They acted as liquidating commissioners. The books of all the branches, after the national banks had taken such memoranda from them as they needed, were transferred and delivered to the Board of Commissioners of the Northwestern Bank, and for years remained in the building of the National Bank of West Virginia at Wheeling; but its affairs having been finally wound up a long time ago, no especial attention was paid to these old books, and they were deposited in the basement of the building occupied by the National Bank of West Virginia. Since that time Wheeling has been subjected to some extraordinary floods, particularly the one of 1884, and the best information that could be obtained tended to show that these old books of the Northwestern Bank were then completely destroyed. Certain it is that no trace thereof could be found. At the beginning of this suit, every one of the officers connected therewith, and who had any knowledge of the affairs of the bank, were dead. West Virginia was therefore compelled to get the best evidence she could to prove these values.

It is shown by the act of the general assembly of (the Richmond government of) Virginia, and by the report of the Hon. Chester D. Hubbard, which are printed as Appendix B of this brief, that the assets of the branch at Jeffersonville, in Tazewell county, Virginia, were wholly lost to the Northwestern Bank. What were the value of these assets which were practically confiscated by the said act, cannot now be definitely ascertained. The Northwestern Bank claimed a loss thereby of 1642 shares, of the par value of $164,200. (See statement submitted by Mr. Hubbard in said Appendix B.) The provision of section 7 of the said confiscatory act of the Confederate government of Virginia, limiting the amount of redemption of certain notes to $180,000, seem to show that the estimate of the loss of the Northwestern Bank of $164,200 was not too high. The provisions of sections 2 and 4 of the said act are sweeping; they take from the Northwestern Bank every item of property it owned or held in its Jeffersonville branch.

Whatever the loss was—whether $164,200 or $180,000—it was a large loss, and the Master takes absolutely no account whatever of this large loss in arriving at the value of this bank stock as of June 20, 1863. The best evidence, in our opinion, as to the value of these stocks, was the price put upon them by the National banks which took over the assets. This was done in March, 1865. In the case of each of the three banks, to wit: National Bank of West Virginia, First National Bank of Wellsburg and the Parkersburg National Bank, the same value was placed upon the stock, that is to say, fifty cents on the dollar. At fifty cents on the dollar 3418 shares would have been worth $170,900.

By reference to the said report of Mr. Hubbard, which he made by the direction of the Board of the School Fund of West Virginia, it appears that on March 2, 1865, when these national banks were formed, the directors of the Northwestern Bank charged to the State of Virginia for the loss of the assets of the branch at Jeffersonville the amount of 1642 shares of the stock formerly held by the State of Virginia and canceled that amount, leaving 1776 shares, for which stock was given to West Virginia by the three national banks at the rate of fifty cents on the dollar. The stockholders other than the state only received stock in the new banks at the rate of fifty cents on the dollar. This fact shows their good faith in thus dealing with this proposition.

In addition to the 1776 shares of stock, for which West Virginia received stock in the new banks at the rate of fifty cents on the dollar, she also received stock in the new banks at the same rate for 326 shares of bonus stock given by the bank to the state of Virginia, and this makes the total of 2102 shares for which West Virginia received stock in the new banks of the par value of $105,100. In addition to that West Virginia received out of the remaining assets of the Northwestern Bank the sum of $10,510 on the first day of July, 1867; the sum of $10,510 on the first day of August, 1868, and the sum of $10,510 on the first day of July, 1871. It is not denied that these amounts are all that were received by West Virginia in stocks or moneys out of the assets of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia upon its dissolution and winding up. The total was $136,630.

Suppose for a moment that West Virginia was negligent in permitting the stockholders of the Northwestern Bank to charge up the assets of the branch at Jeffersonville to the state holdings of stock, and that the state should have received also fifty cents per share on these 1642 shares, this would add the sum of $82,100 to the amount heretofore conceded. But we do not think that negligence can be reasonably charged to West Virginia in this matter. How could she prevent the State of Virginia from seizing the property of the branch at Jeffersonville, which was in her own territory and dominated by the arms of the Confederate States? This property of the Jeffersonville branch was never transferred to West Virginia by Virginia. Virginia kept it and made us of it. What reasonable claim can, therefore, be made that it should be charged to West Virginia?

We know of no better evidence that could be obtained than these acts of the parties at the time. They were dealing with the matter in a business way and on a business basis. The Master, as has been said, makes no deduction whatever for the loss of these assets of the branch at Jeffersonville, but on the contrary charges West Virginia with the stock as if this great loss had not happened. The Master also goes on the assumption that the fact of the payment of 7½ per cent dividend for a few years prior to the war shows that this stock was of the value of one-fourth more than par. This position is clearly untenable. The sale by the state in 1857 to this bank itself of 1082 shares for $113,000 shows that the position taken by the Master cannot possibly be sound.

Virginia, in 1857, when this stock was earning this 7½ per cent rate, was willing to take and did take less than $105 per share for the stock, the par value of which was $100 per share. Hence, we cannot conceive how the Master could say that, amidst the throes of war, and especially at the time when the destiny of the country hung in the balance, as it did in June, 1863, this stock was worth $125 per share. It must be remembered that banks prior to 1863 and banks of the present day did business on different conditions. Supplemental Exhibit No. 9, filed with the Master after the record was printed, and upon which he based his finding in this particular in part, shows that the deposits in this bank were less than one-fourth of its capital stock, and further shows that the money-making powers of these banks in Virginia prior to the war lay in their exclusive right to issue Virginia notes, which notes passed as the money of that day. Certainly, by the second day of March, 1865, when this bank was nationalized, it was a recognized fact that this power to issue this money was gone; the immense amount of such notes which it had outstanding reduced its assets one-half. Is it to be presumed that, in June, 1863, before the battle of Gettysburg and before the fall of Vicksburg, when everything hung in the balance, the conditions of 1859 and 1860, so far as this bank is concerned, had continued just the same? The Master says that there is a presumption of such continuance of conditions, when there is no proof to the contrary. The Court will certainly take judicial notice of the fact that in this instance there is written on history's pages an immense amount of proof to the contrary. The greatest war of modern times, directly involving the territory of the two states, had drained into their soldiery the largest part of the able-bodied men who lived within the country reached by this bank. Can it be presumed that under these conditions the value of these bank stocks would have continued and grown twenty per cent greater in 1863 than they were in 1857?

The Master draws a comparison between the Fairmont Bank and the Northwestern Bank. He certainly overlooked some important matters in such comparison. He takes the statement made by West Virginia that Fairmont stock was worth par as proof that the stock of the Northwestern Bank must be worth more than par. The concession made by West Virginia as to the value of the Fairmont Bank stock was based solely and alone on the fact that when the Fairmont

Bank was nationalized in 1865, the stockholders thereof received stock in the new National Bank at par for their holdings in the Fairmont Bank. This concession on the part of West Virginia only proves that she was willing to pay for this stock every cent's value she received in it, which value is that which the persons in charge of the banks in 1865 fixed as the value of the stock, when they became incorporated under the laws of the United States. It is certainly reasonable to presume that when these banks became national banks, under the strict inspection given by the United States, they put a just value on the properties; and it is further reasonable to presume that when the stockholders in charge of the bank gave the state the same treatment that they gave themselves and other stockholders, they were acting justly. The comparison made by the Master between the Fairmont Bank and the Northwestern Bank on the basis of the concession that the Fairmont stock was worth par thus falls flatly to the ground. If the concession as to the Fairmont Bank can be regarded as proving anything, certainly the concession made as to the Northwestern Bank should be worth as much, and prove what it admits. Moreover, the Fairmont Bank had no such loss as was suffered by the Northwestern. A considerable part of its assets were not seized and confiscated by the enemy in war. This fact the Master also overlooks in his comparison.

We might recapitulate this case as follows: Virginia conceded in 1857 by her sale that the stock was worth only $105. A great war came on; there was a great upheaval, involving most of the territory served by this bank; one branch, with a capital stock of $150,000, was wholly lost to the bank; and yet the Master finds that the stock was worth twenty per cent more than the value placed upon it in 1857 by the Virginia state officers. The Master says that this conclusion is largely arbitrary, but he believes it reasonable. We certainly cannot agree with the latter phrase.

Exception by Virginia Under Paragraph VII. of Decree.

Virginia's exception under this paragraph is based on the finding of the Master that West Virginia received nothing in money from Virginia. The Master finds that there was received by West Virginia from the restored government of Virginia a total of $170,771.46. These moneys were given over to West Virginia by the act of February 4, 1863, passed by the legislature of the loyal restored State of Virginia (App., p. 131). The entire amount of money so turned over was collected by taxation by the restored government from the people and properties of the territory which afterwards formed West Virginia. All of it had been acquired after the organization of the restored government. This is necessarily true, as the restored government had no money whatever when it was organized, and could only raise money by the collection of taxes within the territory where its authority was recognized.

It will be remembered that the act of February 3, 1863 (App., p. 128), transferred to the new state, when it should become one of the United States, certain described properties belonging to the State of Virginia within the boundaries of the proposed State of West Virginia. It further provided that if the new state was formed, and that grant took effect, the new state should account for the same in a settlement between the two states.

After that act had been passed and become law the legislature passed the act of February 4, 1863. By an act passed on May 14, 1862 (App., p. 128), there was appropriated to the new state the sum of $100,000; and this act provided in part as follows:

> "All of the appropriations made by this act shall be charged to the State of West Virginia in the settlement between the States of Virginia and West Virginia."

The act of February 4, 1863, contained the following provision:

> "That the act passed May 14, 1862, making an appropriation of $100,000 to the State of West Virginia be and the same is hereby repealed."

We thus see that it was plainly the intention of the legislature of Virginia not to charge to the new state this sum of $170,771.46. This is directly shown by the passage of the act of February 4, 1863, after the act of February 3, 1863, and by the repeal of the act of May 14, 1862. This was but simple justice to the new state. All this money had been collected on the property and from the citizens of the new state. It was specifically provided in the act of February 4, 1863, that all moneys which had been collected from the counties of Virginia outside of the new state, should be included in a settlement to be made by the auditor of Virginia, and also that all moneys that up to the same time had been expended in such counties should be included in another settlement, and the surplus expended, after deducting the moneys expended in such counties from the moneys collected from such counties, should remain the property of the Commonwealth of Virginia. This plainly shows that it was the intention of Virginia to separate the moneys then in the treasury according to the fact whether its sources were the counties of the new state or the counties of the old state. If it had been collected from the people of the counties of the new state, they justly said that the new state was entitled to it. The converse was also true. The moneys which had been collected from the counties of the old state should be retained by the restored government of Virginia. It was a gift indeed, but still a gift which in justice rightly belonged to the state to which it was given. It was no Indian gift: there was no expectation of any return.

PART III.

Causes of Separation of West Virginia.

Part I. of defendant's brief deals with questions of law which do not go to the merits of the case, and Part II. deals with the exceptions of the complainant and defendant and the report of the Master. This part is intended to deal with the principles of law applicable to the facts admitted by the pleadings, developed before the Master, and matters of common history and knowledge of which the Court takes judicial notice. Such an argument must inevitably involve some repetition in respect of questions covered by Part II.; but this is avoided as far as possible.

1 Rule of Construction to be Applied in This Case.

This Court said in Scott v. United States (12 Wallace 443), which involves the construction of a contract between the Government and an individual and the ascertainment of the intent of the parties:

> "In cases like this it is the duty of the Court to assume the standpoint occupied by the parties when the contract was made—to let in the light of surrounding circumstances—to see as the parties saw, and to think as they must have thought, in assenting to the stipulations by which they are bound. This process is always effective. When the terms employed are doubtful or obscure there is no surer guide to their intent and meaning."

This settled doctrine, so admirably stated by the Court, is peculiarly applicable to this case, both in the construction of the Wheeling Ordinance of August 20, 1861, and of Section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution of West Virginia, which was adopted by the Convention that assembled pursuant to the provisions of the Ordipance and under which West Virginia, with the consent of Virginia, was admitted into the Union as a State. The true construction of these instruments and a just determination of the case, cannot be reached without reference to the relations of Northwestern Virginia and her people and Eastern Virginia and her people, territorially and sentimentally, and to the circumstances under which the movement for the formation of the new State was inaugurated and carried to consummation.

2. PHYSICAL CHARACTERISTICS OF EASTERN VIRGINIA AND NORTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Some elements in the problem are not susceptible of proof by the testimony of living witnesses, but are susceptible of accurate ascertainment from the history of that period. This Court will take judicial notice of the physical fact that Northwestern and Western Virginia within the boundaries described by the Ordinance and the Constitution is remote from tidewater, and separated from Eastern Virginia by the Alleghany Mountains; that this region which became the State of West Virginia lies mainly on the western slope of the Appalachian Mountains and is bounded on the north by Ohio, Pennsylvania and Maryland, on the east by Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia, on the south by Virginia and Kentucky, and on the west by Kentucky and Ohio.

> "The Alleghany watershed is in the eastern portion of the State, all except eight of the counties lying on the western slope within the Ohio Basin. In the higher parts of the State, where Pendleton, Pocahontas and Randolph Counties join, five rivers rise which flow across the State—two finally flowing eastward into the Atlantic and three westward into the Ohio. The Ohio forms the western boundary and is navigable throughout its length. The eastern part of the State is drained by the Potomac and its tributaries. The Cheat and Monongahela flow through the northern counties and the latter is now navigable as high up as Fairmont, in Marion County. The Greenbrier and the Elk form the watershed to the southwest and join the Great Kanawha, which flows northwest into the Ohio. The Great Kanawha is navigable for 96 miles from the Ohio. The Big Sandy, flowing northwest, forms the southern boundary of the State. The river system of the State has been improved somewhat for navigation by government engineers, but the interior rivers will always be more valuable for their water power than for facilities of navigation" (See "West Virginia," the "Americana," published by "Scientific American").

3. COURT MAY RESORT TO SPEECHES OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE REPORTING A BILL AND OF AUTHOR OF THE BILL.

We are fully mindful of the rule that in construing an Act of Congress the court does not consider itself at liberty to recur to the views of individual members of either body in debate; or to consider the motives which influenced them for or against the passage of the measure. The rule has not always been observed here, and moreover, is not without exceptions.

What is said by the Chairman of a Committee of either body in reporting a measure as to its purpose and meaning, has been resorted to by the Court in aid of its construction. The same is true in respect of the observations of the author of a measure in exposition of its provisions. And here we, therefore, feel at liberty to quote from the remarks of Senator Wade, Chairman of the Committee on Territories of the Senate, who reported the Bill for the admission of West Virginia into the Union (Congressional Globe, Part 4, 37th Congress, 2d Session, p. 3038).

4. SPEECH OF SENATOR WADE IN SUPPORT OF ACT FOR ADMISSION OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Senator Wade said:

> "I have looked at the condition of things in Western Virginia, and I have come to the conclusion that it is impossible for the people of Eastern and Western Virginia to live together in harmony and peace. It is not a new controversy among these people. When I came to investigate it, I find that it has existed for a long period of years, much of it probably growing out of the entire isolation of the two sections, for there is really no communication between the east and west. As Governor Pierpont remarked to me, 'We have no communication whatever, except it be furnishing a few members of the Legislature, and a few inmates of their penitentiary.' In other respects, in commercial feeling, in political feeling, in association, they are entirely isolated. On this subject of slavery they feel entirely different. There is an animosity between them that is more intense, I believe, from what I gather from the best men of that section, than that which exists between any of the northern and southern States. Under these circumstances the question is, shall they be compelled to be joined with the other portions of the State where they will undoubtedly be put under the ban of a hostile legislation for years? They complain that they have been heretofore. It is a standing complaint with them that while taxes and burdens have been imposed upon them by the vast majorities of the eastern section, for internal improvements and the like, they have been awarded no benefit from them whatever, and this has aggravated the difference between them."

5. SPEECH OF SENATOR WILLEY.

Senator Willey, elected to the "Restored" Legislature of Virginia, and the author of the Bill to admit West Virginia as a State (Cong. Globe, Part 4, 37th Cong., 2nd Session, p. 3038), said:

"Sir, it is with pain that I am compelled to take this stand, but I am justified in doing it. These people have looked for sixty long years to this day. Time and again have the sections of Virginia been upon the eve of an outbreak, of an insurrection. Criminations and recriminations have sounded in our legislative halls at every session of the Legislature for the last thirty or forty years. Threats of violence have been hurled by one section at the other. And today, when the loyal people come with a united voice, having fulfilled all the requisitions of the Constitution and all the forms of the law, and I stand here, where my colleague does not stand, representing the voice of the people of Virginia, who ask for freedom, who ask for severance from the eastern section of the State to whom we have been in bondage in a great degree for fifty or sixty years, he gets up here on the very eve, as I have reason to believe, of the passage of the bill, when the Senate of the United States is about to bestow upon us the long prayed for boon, and he interposes an objection, to postpone and defer our long-cherished hopes and desires.

"Now, sir, I wish to make another remark in answer to the Senator from Illinois. He seems to have fallen into the mistake, common to almost every person, that this movement was conceived in a desire to separate ourselves from the disloyal portion of the State of Virginia, that it grew out of our national difficulties, out of the secession of Virginia from the Federal compact. No, sir; no. These circumstances may have precipitated action upon it; they may have given us the opportunity to effect the long-cherished desire of our section of the State; but this controversy is older than I am; I have heard it ever since I can remember anything. It grows not out of these national dissensions; it grows not out of loyalty or disloyalty to the government; it grows not out of this question of secession; but it grows out of the social, geographical, commercial, industrial distinction and antagonisms that never can be reconciled by the power of man. The Almighty, with His own eternal hand, has marked the boundary between us. We live upon waters that flow in the valley of the Mississippi; our eastern brethren live upon waters that flow into the Potomac and the Chesapeake; and there is a chain of impassable mountain barriers between us that prevent, and will forever prevent, all connection, all social relations, all interchange of traffic and commodities by any convenient means of transportation. Owing to these facts, we ask this separation, and we place it upon these large national grounds; not upon the question of secession and disloyalty. If those were the only questions at issue, I would say to the western people, as I have hitherto said to them, stand fast, not only until the Union is restored, but until all Virginia again is made loyal to the national flag, and until we all dwell together again beneath its ample folds in peace and in security. But, sir, we never can dwell > in harmony, not because now we are separated by principles of secession and anti-secession or loyalty and disloyalty, but because the Almighty, with His own hand, has placed barriers between us that separate our trade and our intercourse, because our social relations are different, because our places of market are different, because our industrial interests are different, and because, on account of these facts, our internal resources have never been developed, and never can be developed while we are connected with Eastern Virginia."

Again he said:

> "It is said, 'Whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.' The reverse is true, whom God hath put asunder, let no man attempt to put together. There is no identity of interests, there is no homogeneity between the people of the valley and the people west of the Alleghany Mountains. And we are today fulfilling that remarkable prediction of Mr. Webster, that whenever there was an attempt to withdraw Virginia from the Union, it would be seen that the inhabitants living upon the waters of that State which flow into the Valley of the Mississippi would inevitably go with the people of that valley."

This was said in opposing the amendment reported to the committee which added 140,000 people and several counties to the proposed State. He further said in support of the amendment to strike out the additional counties which had been added by the committee (p. 3037):

> "By so doing you secure a new State, that will be perfectly homogeneous and identical in interests with the great States of Ohio and Pennsylvania; the great breakwater which the selfish policy of the eastern government of Virginia has always interposed between those connections across West Virginia will be swept away, and the people of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia will be one people in interest, living together harmoniously; and the great resources of that section of the State will no doubt be speedily developed; while all this can be done without detracting one iota from the interest, the welfare, the rights, or the privileges of the eastern section of the State."

6. SPEECH OF DANIEL WEBSTER.

The historical fact must be remembered, also, that the people of West Virginia were not in sympathy with the institution of slavery and were opposed to secession. Mr. Webster recognized the natural and abiding commercial isolation of western Virginia from eastern Virginia, and in a speech which he made, to which Senator Willey refers, at the laying of the corner stone of the addition to the capitol here in 1851, he warned the people of Virginia against the issue of disunion raised by Mr. Calhoun. After appealing to the people of Virginia, and especially to the men of "James River and the Bay" and to the men "beyond the Blue Ridge," he said:

> "And ye men of western Virginia, who occupy the great slope from the top of the Alleghanys to Ohio and Kentucky, what benefit do you propose to yourselves by disunion? If you 'secede,' what do you 'secede' from, and what do you 'accede' to? Do you look for the current of the Ohio to change and to bring you and your commerce to the tidewaters of eastern rivers? What man in his senses can suppose that you would remain a part and parcel of Virginia a month after Virginia should have ceased to be a part and parcel of the United States?"

7. CONDITIONS AT THE TIME OF CREATION OF WEST VIRGINIA.

When the great transactions occurred which are under review, the Confederate States of America had been formed. The Ordinances of Secession had been passed by South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. Virginia had passed an ordinance of secession, had borrowed $1,000,000, had called for 10,000 men to serve for twelve months and had arranged with the Confederate government for admission to the Confederacy, and in the meantime that her troops should, under that government, be employed against the United States. Her troops had seized the Norfolk and Gosport Navy Yards, the arsenal at Harper's Ferry, the Customs Houses, and other property of the United States within her borders; had hauled down the flag of the United States and hoisted in its place another. President Buchanan in a message to Congress had taken the position that there was no power in the Federal government under the constitution to coerce a state. Fort Sumter had been surrendered.

President Lincoln had called for 75,000 troops to serve three months. The battle of Bull Run had been fought in which the Federal troops were disastrously defeated. The "New York Tribune," edited by Mr. Greeley, exercising a most potent influence upon public opinion, advocated a peaceful separation of the states determined to withdraw, and many eminent men of undoubted love for the Union in both parties seemed to be of the same opinion. There was grave doubt throughout the country as to the ultimate result. The people of West Virginia could not be blind to the fact that if the Confederacy should be established, that territory would, unless action were taken, be irrevocably a part of that Confederacy.

Isolated from eastern Virginia, and differing in sentiment from her people in respect to the right of secession and the institution of slavery, her people are not to be justly chided here or elsewhere for embracing that opportunity to become a state in the Union. In this situation, is to be found the genesis of West Virginia; and in the light of this situation, her people are to be judged and her compacts and "constating" instruments are to be construed.

The Rule of Public Law in Regard to the Apportionment of the Debt of a State After Its Division.

1. THIS COURT HAS NEVER DECIDED THAT WHEN A STATE IS DIVIDED THE DEBTS OF THE ORIGINAL STATE SHOULD BE RATABLY APPORTIONED BETWEEN IT AND THE NEW STATE.

It has been assumed, and is now assumed by counsel for the complainant, that this Court has so decided. They cite in support of their contention the opinion of the Court delivered by Mr. Justice Field in Hartman v. Greenhow, 102 U. S. 672; and Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U. S. 769. It may be said here that the opinion of Mr. Justice Field in the latter case was a dissenting one. The question was not in any wise involved in either case. The Hartman case was as follows:

By act of March 30th, 1871, known as the "Funding Act," by which Virginia made an adjustment with her creditors under which she funded two-thirds of her debt and issued bonds for the same, it was provided that the coupons should be made payable to order or bearer, and it was declared that the coupons should be payable semi-annually, to be "receivable at and after maturity for all taxes, debts, dues, and demands due the state," and that this should be so expressed on their face. Hartman, a resident of Richmond, and a citizen of Virginia, on the 5th of April, 1878, was indebted to the state for taxes to the amount of $26.53. On that day he tendered to the treasurer of Richmond, who was by law charged with the duty of collecting the taxes of the state in that city, certain interest coupons, which were overdue, amounting to $24, cut from bonds of the state, (which bonds he did not own), issued under the act of 1871, and $2.53 in lawful money of the United States in payment of the taxes. The treasurer refused to accept the coupons in payment of the taxes without first deducting therefrom the taxes imposed by Virginia on the bonds to which they were originally attached, and of which the holder of the coupons was not the owner. Upon this refusal, he applied to the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia for a writ of mandamus to the treasurer to compel him to receive the coupons, with the money mentioned, in full discharge of his taxes, without any deduction from the coupons for the taxes upon the bonds. The Court of Appeals of Virginia issued a rule or an alternative writ upon the treasurer, he answering that the General Assembly for many years had exercised the right to tax all bonds, choses in action, and other evidences of debt, including bonds of the state; that the taxes assessed upon the latter bonds were according to their market value, the amount being fixed at 50 cents on the $100 of such value; that the law required the taxes to be collected when the interest on the bonds was paid, and made it a high penal offense for any officer to receive coupons in payment of taxes without deducting from their face value the tax levy upon the bonds from which they were taken, etc.

The judges of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia were equally divided upon the question. This operated as a denial and the petition was denied. The court, however, certified that on the hearing of the case there was drawn in question the validity of the statute of the state authorizing the tax upon the bonds and requiring its deduction from the coupons, on the ground of its repugnancy to the provision of the constitution of the United States, prohibiting any legislation by the states impairing the obligation of contracts; and that the decision was in favor of the validity of the state statute and against the right claimed by the petitioner under the provision of the constitution of the United States.

Thereupon the case was brought to this Court and manifestly it involved only the question of the right of plaintiff in error, Hartman, to pay his taxes with the coupons and the added money. This, by the terms of the law, providing for the issue of the bonds and coupons and by the terms of the coupons themselves, he was entitled to do. The Court based its judgment sustaining the right of the plaintiff in error to pay his taxes with coupons on the authority of Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432, saying:

> "This decision would be decisive here, but the present case is still stronger for the creditor. The Funding Act made the bonds issued under it payable to order or bearer, and made the coupons payable to bearer. They were so far distinct and independent contracts that they could be separated from each other and transferred to different hands."

So it is held:

> "We are clear that this act of Virginia of 1876 (Sec. 117), requiring the tax on her bonds, issued under the Funding Act of March 30, 1871, to be deducted from the coupons originally attached to them when tendered in payment of taxes or other dues to the state, cannot be applied to coupons separated from the bonds, and held by different owners, without impairing the contract with such bond holders, contained in the Funding Act, and the contract with the bearer of the coupons."

Mr. Justice Field said, however, in the opinion:

> "During the war a portion of her territory was separated from her, and by its people a new state, named West Virginia, was formed, and by the Congress of the United States was admitted into the Union. Nearly one-third of her territory and people were thus taken from her jurisdiction. But as the whole state had created the indebtedness for which the bonds were issued, and participated in the benefits obtained by the moneys raised, it was but just that a portion of the indebtedness should be assumed by that part which was taken from her and made a new state. Writers on public law speak of the principle as well established, that where a state is divided into two or more states, in the adjustment of liabilities between each other, the debts of the parent state should be ratably apportioned among them. On the subject Kent says: 'If a state should be divided in respect to territory, its rights and obligations are not impaired; and if they have not been apportioned by special agreement, their rights are to be enjoyed and their obligations fulfilled by all the parts in common.' 1 Com. 26. And Halleck, speaking of a state divided into two or more distinct and independent sovereignties, says: 'In that case, the obligations which have accrued to the whole before the divisions are, unless they have been the subject of a special agreement, ratably binding upon the different parts. This principle is established by the concurrent opinions of text-writers, the decisions of courts, and the practice of nations.' International Law, chap. 3, sec. 27." (Italics ours.)

In Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U. S., p. 770, Mr. Justice Field, in his dissenting opinion, incorporated very much the same observations, referring to the authorities cited by him in Hartman vs. Greenhow, supra. The subject was not involved in either case. If Virginia had never been divided, under the same legislation and upon the same state of facts, the question befoe the Court would have been precisely the same.

We are constrained, albeit with the utmost reverence for the memory of Mr. Justice Field, to say that, in both opinions, his observations with respect to the liability of West Virginia, upon the rules of international law, for a proportion of the public debt of Virginia, prior to January 1, 1861, seem entirely obiter.

2. THE TRUE RULE OF PUBLIC LAW IN CASE OF THE DIVISION OF A STATE. GENERAL DEBTS ARE APPORTIONED ON THE BASIS OF TAXABLE VALUE. LOCAL DEBTS ARE ASSUMED BY THE STATE FOR THE EXCLUSIVE BENEFIT OF WHOSE TERRITORY THEY WERE INCURRED. THE AUTHORITIES.

Publicists seem to be in entire accord as to some phases of debt succession between states: First, that when one state and its provinces, if it have any, are absorbed by another, either through subjugation, or through voluntary merger, the absorbing state is liable for the whole debt of the extinguished state. Second, that when a state is broken up into separate states, the original state personality having become extinct, the separate states thus formed are each bound for a proportional amount of the debt of the original state. Third, where a state is broken up into fragments, and separate portions of it are absorbed by surrounding states, they are liable for the debts of the original state.

(a) HALL.

Mr. Hall, who has been frequently quoted by this Court, and who certainly was a discriminating and learned writer upon the law of nations, says at page 78:

> "When a new state splits off from one already existing, it necessarily steps into the enjoyment of all rights which are conferred upon it by international law in virtue of its existence as an international person, and it becomes subject to all obligations which are imposed upon it in the same way. No question, therefore, presents itself with respect to the general rights and duties of a new state. What, however, is its relation to the contract obligations of the state from which it has been separated, to property belonging to and privileges enjoyed by the latter, and to property belonging in common, before the occurrence of the separation, to subjects of the original state in virtue of their status as such, when some of them after the separation become subjects of the new state?
> "The fact of the personality of a state is the key to the answer. With rights which have been acquired and obligations which have been contracted, by the old state as personal rights and obligations the new state has nothing to do. The old state is not extinct; it is still there to fulfill its contract duties, and to enjoy its contract rights The new state, on the other hand, is an entirely fresh being. It neither is, nor does it represent, the person with whom other states have contracted; they may have no reason for giving it the advantages which have been accorded to the person with whom the contract was made, and it would be unjust to saddle it with liabilities which it would not have accepted on its own account. What is true as between the new state and foreign powers, is true also as between it and the old state. From the moment of independence all trace of joint life is gone. Apart from special agreement no survival of it is possible, and the two states are merely two beings possessing no other claims on one another than those which are conferred by the bare provisions of international law. And as the old state continues its life uninterruptedly, it possesses everything belonging to it as a person, which it has not expressly lost; so that property enjoyed by it as a personal whole, or by its subjects in virtue of their being members of that whole, continues to belong to it. On the other hand, rights possessed in respect of the lost territory, including rights under treaties relating to cessions of territory and demarcations of boundary, obligations contracted with reference to it alone, and property which is within it, and which has theretofore a local character, or which, though not within it, belongs to state institutions localized there, transfer themselves to the new state person.

"Thus treaties of alliance, of guarantee or commerce, are not binding upon a new state formed by separation, and it is not liable for the general debt of the parent state. * * * * It is saddled with local obligations such as that to regulate the channel of a river or to levy no more than certain dues along its course, and local debts, whether they be debts contracted for local objects, or debts secured upon local revenues, are binding upon it."

On page 80 of his work on International Law is found a note upon the subject of this particular phase of law which is peculiarly instructive, for his comments upon the indefiniteness with which Grotius and other authors named have written upon it. For the convenience of the Court, it is herein incorporated:

> "The subject is one upon which writers upon international law are generally unsatisfactory. They are incomplete and they tend to copy one another. Grotius, for example, says that if a state is split up, 'Anything which may have been held in common by the parts separating from each other must either be administered in common or be ratably divided.' De Juri Belli et Pacis, lib. II, c. IX.; Section 10, Kent (Comm. i. 25) does little more than paraphrase this in laying down that 'If a state should be divided in respect of territory, its rights and obligations are not impaired; and if they have not been apportioned by special agreement, those rights are to be enjoyed and those obligations fulfilled by all the parts in common.' Phillimore quotes Grotius and Kent and adds: 'If a nation be divided into various distinct societies, the obligations which had accrued to the whole before the division are, unless they have been the subject of a special agreement, ratably binding upon the parts; 1 sec. CXXXVII.'"

Mr. Hall adds (and it is certainly justified):

> "It is difficult to be sure whether these writers only contemplate the rare case of a state so splitting up, that the original state person is represented by no one of the factions into which it is divided, or whether they refer also to the more common case of the loss of such portion of the state territory and population by secession, that the continuity of the life of the state is not broken. If the former is their meaning, their doctrine is correct so far as property and monetary obligations are concerned; if not, it would be hard to justify their language even to this extent. No doubt the debt of a state from which another separates itself ought generally to be divided between the two proportionately to their respective resources as a matter of justice to the creditors, because it is seldom that the value of their security is not affected by a diminution of the state indebted to them. But the obligation is a moral, not a legal one. The fact remains that the general debt of a state is a personal obligation. The case also of the creation of a new state out of a part of an old one is not distinguishable, so far as the obligation to apportion debts is concerned, from that of the cession of a province by one state to another. (Italics ours.) When the latter occurs at least as the result of conquest, it is not usual to take over any part of the general debt of the state ceding territory. The case of Belgium, which took over a portion of The Netherlands debt, is scarcely in point. The Treaty of 1839 (De Martens' Nouv. Rec. XVI, 782), by which the division of the debt was effected, was part of a general settlement of the countries in question made at the dictation of Europe with a view of dealing with all the interests concerned in the most equitable and advantageous manner and not with the bare object of enforcing law. The true rule is recognized by Halleck (i. 76), who distinguishes the case of a state which is so split up as to lose its identity from that of a state which suffers dismemberment without losing its identity. 'Such a change,' he says 'no more affects its rights and duties than a change in its internal organization or in the person of its rulers. This doctrine applies to debts due to as well as from the state and to its rights of property and treaty obligations except so far as such obligations may have particular reference to the revolted or dismembered territory or province.'"

In the brief of the learned counsel who formerly appeared as amicus curiae, but now appears for the bond-holding creditors of Virginia, it is said (page 20):

> "Among the writers on public law referred to by the learned justice (whose opinions concurred with the view expressed by him) there may be mentioned the following, citing Puffendorf, Phillimore, Wheaton, Moore, Wharton, Oppenheim."

(b) OPPENHEIM.

It is justly conceded that Oppenheim is a learned, accurate and discriminating publicist. He says (sec. 84):

> "When, in consequence of war or otherwise, one state cedes part of its territory to another, or when a part of the territory of a state breaks off and becomes a state and an International Person of its own, succession takes place with regard to such international rights and duties of the predecessor as are locally connected with a part of the territory ceded or broken off and with regard to the fiscal property found on that part of the territory. It would only be just if the successor had to take over a corresponding part of the debt of its predecessor, but no rule of international law concerning this point can be said to exist although many treaties have stipulated a devolution of a part of the debt of the predecessor upon its successor. Thus, for instance, Articles 9, 33 and 42, of the Treaty of Berlin of 1878 stipulate that Bulgaria, Montenegro and Servia should take over a part of the Turkish debt."

He adds, in a foot-note:

"Many writers, however, maintain that there is such a rule of international law. (See Huber, Nos. 125-135 and 205, where various treaties are enumerated.")

(c) GLENN.

In Glenn's Work on International Law (Hornbook Series), page 36, under the head "Effect of Change of Sovereignty—Upon the Public Rights and Obligations," it is said:

"Three classes of cases arise: (a) When a new and independent state is formed by separation from an existing state; (b) When a portion of the state is lost by cession; (c) When a state is wholly absorbed.

"In the first case, two separate and distinct international persons exist instead of one and the new state has nothing to do with the personal rights and obligations of the parent state, which still possesses its identity. So also the parent state remains in sole possession and enjoyment of its separate property and the rights connected therewith. Treaties of alliance and guarantee of commerce are not binding upon the new state, nor is it liable for the general debt of the parent state. The new state comes into possession of rights, including those under treaties and obligations, connected with the property within it. It is entitled to the privileges of navigating rivers that its citizens possess by virtue of being citizens of the parent state and is bound by the obligations connected therewith, such as regulations in regard to the dues, etc. It becomes liable for local debts, including those for local objects, and those secured by local revenues." (Italics ours.)

(d) HANNIS TAYLOR.

Mr. Hannis Taylor, who is a writer of great research, and is quoted in the brief of the learned counsel for the bond-holding creditors, in his work on International Law, Section 166, says:

"When severed territory becomes a distinct state—local rights and obligations.—A narrower and more technical rule prevails when the parent state is deprived of a portion of its territory which is erected into an entirely distinct political community. The cogent reasoning in such a case is that as a man who loses an arm or leg in battle is not thereby relieved of any part of his obligations, so a state that is so dismembered as to suffer no loss of identity remains bound as before for its entire general indebtedness. 'Such a change,' Halleck says, 'no more affects its rights and duties, than a change in its internal organization, or in the person of its rulers.' This doctrine applies to debts due to as well as from the state, and to its rights of property and treaty obligations, except so far as such obligations may have particular reference to the revolted or dismembered territory or province." (Italics ours.)

"In other words, as the old state continues its corporate life without interruption, it retains all general state property, and all general benefits resulting from treaties with full liability for all general obligations with which the new creation taken from its side may disavow all legal connection. The new state on its part carries with it only local obligations, whether contracted for local objects or secured by a lien on local revenues, and such local duties as arise out of agreements to maintain the channel of a river, or to levy no more than certain tolls along its course. As a compensation for such burdens the new state is entitled to property within it of a local character, or to such, not within it, as belongs to state institutions localized there, and to the privileges arising from treaties specially contracted for the benefit of its territory," etc.

This certainly has the merit of clearness. Summarizing, he says (Section 168):

> "After a careful review of all the authorities the general statement may be made (1) that no matter whether a state is entirely extinguished by a division into two or more distinct states, or (2) whether it loses its identity by being absorbed into another state, or (3) whether a state without a loss of its identity has a portion of its territory taken from it to form an integral part of another state, or (4) whether such severed part is erected into an entirely new and independent state, all local charges, and guaranteed debts to which certain domains and their revenues are dedicated, survive as charges upon the localities to which they relate, with their equities unimpaired. In the case first named, the general debt of the state should certainly be ratably binding, morally, if not legally, on its several parts; in the second it passes as a whole to the absorbing state; in the third the acquiring state should assume a ratable proportion of it; and in the fourth, every principle of equity and good conscience requires that it should be provided for out of the common state property and the residue divided in proportion to the revenues of the two distinct commonwealths. In the notable case of West Virginia that obligation, though formerly recognized, has never been discharged."

He seems to coincide, so far as the moral obligation is concerned, with Hall, Oppenheim and other writers; and to agree with them also that there is no rule of International Law which makes it a legal obligation.

(e) PRADIER FODERE.

Pradier Fodere, in "Traite de Droit International Public," Vol. 1, Paris, 1885, Section 156, states:

> "The state to which cession is made is bound by local debts of ceded territory."

Section 157:

> "But is the state receiving the cession bound by a part of the other obligations resulting from treaties made with the ceding state and not attached to the ceded territory, merely because it has had the benefit of the cession? In other words, are obligations and rights which are neither local nor personal, resulting from treaties made with a state, necessarily transmitted, in any proportion, to the state to which a cession is made, together with the ceded territory? No; the ceding state remains bound or vested with the rights, for, it alone made the contract. The same rule holds, when, instead of being ceded, a province becomes an independent State. The new state is not generally bound by non-local obligations of the state from which it is separated. Such at least is the principle; but it can be modified in practice by a treaty. Thus the Kingdom of Italy, after the acquisition of Lombardy and Venice, only took the place of Austria in respect of the local obligations and rights of the provinces acquired, and refused to take upon itself a proportion of the general debt (italics ours) of the Austrian Empire. So also no part of the French debt was imposed upon the province of Alsace-Lorraine which France was forced to cede to Germany in 1871; but—and this is an example of the exceptions which treaties can make from the general rule—the Treaty of Berlin, of 1878, imposed part of the public Turkish debt upon Bulgaria, constituting a diminished principality or territory under the suzerainty of the Sultan, and upon Montenegro and Servia, whose independence was recognized."

(f) BLUNTSCHLI.

Bluntschli says, Section 59:

"The debts of the state ought not to be divided proportionally to the population. Mortgage or landed debts will be adjudged to fall to the state which obtains the land securing the debt. Other debts will be apportioned proportionally to the taxes paid by the divers portions of the territory.

* * * * * *

"2. The security of other public debts rests on the taxable fortune of the members of the state, and is measured by the actual product of the taxes which, accordingly, furnish a juster basis than the number of the population. Suppose a state to be divided in two parts, one having a rich urban population, and the other a poor rustic population. One of the parts, in case of a division proportional to the number of the inhabitants, would be overburdened with debt, and the other considerably relieved, in comparison with the taxes previously paid, all to the great prejudice of the creditors."

(g) BONFILS.

Manuel de Droit International Public, by Henry Bonfils, Professor of the Faculty of Law of Toulouse, 3d edition, 1901:

SECTION 223. "If a state ceases to exist by being broken up and divided into several new states, each of the latter ought to assume a portion of the debts which concerned the original state as a whole, and each of them ought also to take upon itself exclusively the debts contracted for the exclusive benefit of its territory."

SECTION 224. "The new state formed by the separation of a province, or by the destruction of the bond of vassalage, should equitably assume a part of the public debt of the state of which it was a fraction. The reason of this is evident. The debts contracted by a state, in the general interest, have benefited all the provinces in globo, and the creditors had as a guaranty the wealth of all the provinces and the taxes which that wealth could bear."

SECTION 225. "Part of the territory of a state is ceded, annexed to another state. The annexing state should assume the contributive share of the annexed territory in the public debt of the ceding state. It is just that the state taking the cession should assume a part of the debts which, for divers reasons, directly or indirectly have benefited the territory with which it is enriching itself."

SECTION 226. "In the last mentioned cases, how shall the contributive share of the new state or of the annexing state be fixed? The authors are divided. Some fix upon the number of the population; others upon the extent of the territory. Bluntschli's opinion is better and juster. He determines the contributive share according to the share of the taxes borne by the annexed or separated province. There is, indeed, a necessary correlation between the public debt of a state and the taxes imposed upon the inhabitants. The latter constitute a guaranty for the former.

"The personal debts of the annexed, or separated, provinces, relating to local interests, naturally ought to continue to be the debts of these provinces, and should be paid by the annexing state, or by the newly founded state."

Das Volkerrecht by Dr. Franz v. Liszt, Professor of the University of Berlin; second edition; Berlin, 1902:

Section 23, p. 175: The author, discussing the cession by a state of a part of its territory to another state, says:

"In any case, succession takes place as regards the so-called hypothecated debts (dettes hypothequees), that is, those debts which were incurred in the exclusive interest of the ceded territory (as for drainage works), and as regards mortgage debts (dettes hypothecaires), that is, those debts for which real property situated in the ceded territory was pledged as security."

(i) PIEDELIEVRE.

Precis de Droit International Public, by R. Piedelievre, Professor of the Law Faculty of Rennes; Paris, 1894:

Section 154:

"First question: should the annexing state take upon itself a part of the general debt of the dismembered state?

"The question is, in theory, at least, controverted. The negative solution is the less generally accepted. Its partisans take the ground that the dismembered state, however important a diminution of territory it suffers, nevertheless preserves its juridical personality intact, and conclude that it ought not to cease to be bound by the entirety of engagements, no more than an individual could take advantage of the loss of a part of his patrimony so as to escape in a similar proportion the fulfillment of his obligations.

"The contrary opinion, more usually announced, seems to us better founded. It involves two principal reasons. The first is that the debts contracted by a state with a view to the general utility of the inhabitants, weigh indivisibly upon all parts of the territory, and, consequently, if one part of the territory is detached, the part of the debt which was incumbent upon it ought to follow it into the hands of its new master; the second reason is that these debts have served to realize improvements from which the annexed territory benefited in the past, and from which it may benefit again in the future; that it is, therefore, equitable that the state to which the cession is made, as it is to have the fruit of these expenses, should assume an equivalent part of their payment."

"Accepting the principle of apportionment of the debt between the two states, there is still a difficulty to resolve: how shall the principle be applied? How are we to determine what share of the debt of the dismembered state belongs to the annexed territory? Several systems have been proposed.

"Some authors consider solely the territorial importance of the detached provinces, so that supposing the debtor state to have lost a fourth or a fifth of its total possessions, the annexing state would have to assume a fourth or fifth of the former state's public debt. While we recognize the simplicity of this system, we think it should be rejected, for the reason that the wealth of a country has less connection with its territorial extent than with the activity of its inhabitants and the direction it has taken. With equal extent of territory, an industrial region is evidently wealthier than a purely agricultural region. But the proposed solution does not take account of this fact; it wrongly supposes the wealth of a state to be mathematically apportioned among its provinces, in proportion to their territorial extent. In practice, the result would be to give one of the states concerned an advantage at the expense of the other.

"A second system has been proposed which is subject to nearly the same criticism: this is the system of dividing the public debt between the two states in proportion to the number of the population of the annexed provinces. To the foregoing observations we may here add that annexation generally has the effect of creating a current of emigration, the importance of which it is difficult to foresee, and for this reason, the governments concerned would have great difficulty in finding the basis for an equitable apportionment.

"A third doctrine remains, which seems to us the best. It is that the debts should be apportioned in proportion to the figure which represents, in the whole amount of taxes collected by the dismembered state, the taxes paid by the ceded territory. In fact, the value of the different provinces of a state can only be measured exactly by the actual amount of the taxes paid by each of them. Besides, this system is easily applied and fully protects the rights of the creditors. The annexing state cannot complain, since before consenting to the cession it must have ascertained what were the rights and obligations of the annexed provinces with regard to the dismembered state, and the financial law which fixed the amount of taxes they were to pay sufficiently informed in respect to the debts with which it would be burdened in consequence of the annexation; on the other hand, there is no danger of the dismembered state's raising any objection in regard to the contributive share of the territory lost by it; for it fixed this share itself on the basis of the actual resources of the territory taxed.

Section 156:

"Whatever may be the solution adopted with reference to the question whether the annexing state, by reason of the annexation, ought to contribute to the payment of the public debts of the dismembered state, there are two categories of debts about which there can be no doubt:

"The first includes the special debts belonging to the annexed territory, that is to say, the debts which were contracted for their exclusive benefit, and which, like our department or communal debts, are not chargeable to the state. Diplomatic language calls them dettes hypothequces, because of their particular destination. These debts the annexing state ought certainly to assume, or at least to cause them to be borne by the provinces which they specially affect. In any case, the ceding state no longer has to pay them. Thus by the treaties of Campo Formio of Oct. 17, 1797 (Arts. 4 & 10), and of Luneville of Feb. 9, 1801 (Art. 8), France assumed the debts hypothecated on the soil of the ceded countries which were acquired or exchanged.

"The second category includes the mortgage debts (dettes hypothecaires): these naturally are charged to the state which becomes the proprietor of the real property securing their payment."

(j) RIVIER.

Principes du Droit des Gens, by Alphonse Rivier, Professor at the University of Brussels. Paris, 1826; Volume 1, p. 213 (Art. 40, V):

"It is a general principle that ceded territory passes to the acquiring state just as it is, particularly carrying with it the obligations with which it is charged. 'Res transit cum suo onere.'

"This principle, in the first place applies to obligations of a private nature, to the debts which specially belong to the ceded territory; the territory is transferred with its debts which remain special to it under the new sovereign as they were special to it under the old sovereign.

"This principle should also be applied to the debts of the dismembered state which were contracted for the benefit of the ceded territory and for the security of which that state gave pledges as mortgages in this territory; lastly, the principle applied to the proportion of the national debt of the dismembered state which ought to be taken over by the ceded territory.

"The authors disagree in regard to the disposition of the national debt in case of dismemberment of a part of the territory. According to some authors, the dismembered state continues to bear the whole burden. According to others, the debt is divided between the dismembered state and the annexing state, and this equitable system was put into practice in 1860 between France and Sardinia, in 1866 between Austria, Prussia and Denmark, between the Holy See and Italy, in 1878 between Turkey and the new states, Bulgaria and Montenegro. M. Appleton, and also M. Cabonat accept the principle of division, but between the dismembered state and the ceded territory 'we favor the division of the debt between the dismembered state and the fragment detached therefrom.' The proportion of the debt to be borne by the latter should be determined in accordance with the relative wealth of the detached portion and of the remainder of the dismembered state, and this wealth is disclosed by the taxes."

> "In the absence of express agreement they" (the debts of the ceding state) "should be divided equitably upon the basis of the economic importance of the ceded territory, taking into account the proportional amount of the taxes borne by it."

Nouveau Droit International by Pasquale Fiore, Professor at the University of Naples; Paris, 1885.

Section 360:

> "When only a part of the territory is ceded the public debt ought to be equitably apportioned. On this subject we consider the principle laid down by Bluntschli to be correct, that the opportionment should not be made proportionally to population. In the case of mortgage or landed debts (foncieres), the state which receives the real property securing these debts, ought to assume their burden. Ordinary debts should be apportioned proportionally to the taxes paid by the respective parts of the territory."

P. Pradier Fodere, Traite de Droit International Public; volume 1; Paris, 1885.

Section 156: The author states that the state to which cession is made is bound by local debts of ceded territory.

Section 157:

> "But is the state receiving the cession bound by part of the other obligation resulting from treaties made with the ceding states and not attached to the ceded territory, merely because it has had the benefit of the cession? In other words, are obligations and rights, which are neither local nor personal, resulting from treaties made with a state, necessarily transmitted, in any proportion, to the state to which a cession is made, together with the ceded territory? No. The ceding state alone remains bound or vested with rights, for it alone made the contract. The same rule holds when, instead of being ceded, a province becomes an independent state. The new state generally is not bound by non-local obligations of the state from which it has separated. Such at least is the principle, but it can be modified in practice by treaty. Thus, the Kingdom of Italy, after the acquisition of Lombardy and Venice only took the place of Austria in regard to the local obligations and rights of the provinces acquired, and refused to take upon itself the payment of a portion of the general debt of the Austrian Empire." (Italics not the author's.) "So also no part of the French debt was imposed on the province of Alsace-Lorraine, which France was forced to cede to Germany in 1871. But—and this is an example of the exceptions which treaties can make from the general rule—the treaty of Berlin of 1878 imposed part of the public Turkish debt upon Bulgaria constituted an autonomous principality tributary under the suzerainty of the Sultan (Arts. 1 & 9), and upon Montenegro and Servia, whose independence was recognized (Arts. 26, 33, 34 & 42)."

(m) HUBER.

Max Huber, in his work on Staaten succession (1898) says (p. 90 § 34):

> "Without reference to those numerous cases in which a sum is fixed on account of the confusion of the financial conditions and when, therefore, it is difficult to ascertain the separate proportions, we are confronted in the practice of international law with four different methods of the assumption of the debt:
>
> "1. Territorial division (i. e., Geographical).
>
> "2. Division in proportion to population.
>
> "3. Division in proportion to the tax return of the original domain.
>
> "4. Division in accordance with the nationality of the creditors.
>
> "In cases of doubt the most frequent and also the most equitable calculation of the sum to be assumed is the division in proportion to the tax return which the seceding country bears to the whole of the country."
>
> (A reference (paragraph 226) shows that in the treaty between Prussia and Saxony, May 18, 1815, this was the basis of the division and in accordance with the agreement entered into August 28, 1819, between Prussia and Saxony, which provided for all of the details of the succession the tax conditions were used as a measure.)
>
> "As in the countries of this day taxes are divided equally throughout the entire territory, the tax return of a particular portion of the country is a fairly accurate measure of its financial value to the state. Of course, the grantor always suffers a loss in favor of the grantee in so far as he loses the tax returns of the seceding country, but up to this time this has in no way been taken into consideration on account of the difficulty of the calculation.
>
> "In confederations such as Switzerland this measure would, however, seem to be the only right way since the budgets of this country are based chiefly upon their duty returns. In such case only a division in accordance with the population would in case of necessity be permissible since the consumption of each individual country cannot accurately be known, while at the same time it may be assumed that the imports will be in proportion to the poplation, and that the more densely populated districts are as a rule the wealthiest.

(Page 92): "The division 'pro regionis' has no reasonable basis since a mere extent of territory bears no direct relation to the fiscal value of the country or with the political power of its government."

Debts which arise out of a particular domain or which have been incurred in the interest of a particular domain.

"By reason of their legal nature these debts should also be considered together with those dealt with in the foregoing abstract (i. e., debts borne by the entire state or country). The debtor is the entire country. The liquidation will arise out of the debts of the entire country. Only the purpose is a different one. Such debts arise either in the interest of a particular portion of a country or they may be assumed by the main government as an already existing debt of a particular portion of it, in which latter event, of course, this would relieve such smaller or particular portion. In this respect these are the debts of the main government in the interest of a particular portion of it.

"According to the European practice these debts are always assumed by the seceding state; that is the seceding state has the obligation to assume them."

Section 272:

"Certainly the territorial principle applies to debts which have reference to particular portions of the country. Regarding these, the owner of the particular portion interested incurs the indebtedness. We have designated these debts as 'special capital' and they should always follow the fate of their territorial foundation."

(n) APPLETON.

Henri Appleton makes the following statement in his book entitled: "Des Effets des Annexions de Territoires Sur Les Dettes de L'Etat Demembre ou Annexe," etc., Paris 1895, Chapter IV., Section II., Section 65:

"As soon as the principle is admitted that the debt of a dismembered country should be divided between it and the state which takes one or more of its provinces, a new question arises. In what proportion shall the division be made? Very evidently the more important the annexation, the greater will be the contributory part to be charged to the annexing state. If a tenth of the dismembered country is taken, the annexing state will pay a tenth of its debt. If a fourth is taken, it will assume a fourth of the debt.

"But we must be precise. When a fourth, a tenth of the dismembered country is mentioned, is the reference to the extent of its territory, to the number of its population, or to its wealth?

"What criterion shall we take, what basis must be adopted for such an apportionment?

"On this point opinions have not always been in harmony. The practice has varied, and the authors themselves have not always agreed. We do not speak, to be sure, of authors like Hall, Dudley Field, etc., who leave the entire burden of its debts upon the dismembered state. For then the question cannot arise, and none of them treats it, because they reject the principle itself of apportionment. The problem exists only if one admits apportionment of debt in principle, whether from the point of view of payment, as we have treated the matter, or from the double point of view of collection and payment, as is generally done.

"Three systems of apportionment: on the basis of extent of territory, on the basis of population and on the basis of wealth, have been recommended and applied. In 1866 Italy took upon herself the papal debt in proportion to the population of the provinces of Roumania which she had conquered.

"The treaty of Berlin left the question in doubt. Bulgaria, Montenegro and Servia, which took important territories from Turkey, were required in consequence of this to assume a part of the Turkish debt 'calculated upon an equitable basis.'

SECTION 66. "But at the present time one may say that the two first systems have had their day. The third system receives support from the unanimous opinion of the publicists and in practice. It seems to be the most just, and, in truth, the only really equitable system. Indeed, the extent of territory acquired by the annexing state cannot be taken as a criterion; if the conquered territory is that of a great city, the conquest is infinitely more valuable than if it consisted of mountains or desert regions. The city has infinitely greater resources and furnishes more taxes, which enable the conqueror to assume a heavier part of the debt. As M. Cabouat says very well: 'With equal area, an industrial region is superior to a purely agricultural region, and even between territories of equal extent, devoted either to agriculture or to industry, it would be rash to affirm a constant equilibrium. Now, the system we are combating, completely ignores these facts; it reasons as if the wealth of a state could be mathematically divided among each of its provinces in proportion to their respective extents. Such a system could not be followed except upon the altogether chimerical hypothesis of dealing with the debt of an exclusively agricultural or manufacturing state whose various parts should have attained an equal degree of development. In practice the clearest result of such a system would be to procure for one of the interested states a reduction of the obligations incumbent upon it, and, consequently a gain, wholly at the expense of the other state.'

"An apportionment of the debt according to the number of the population inhabiting the annexed provinces would be subject to the same criticism. The new population acquired by the annexing state may be poor and capable of paying only small taxes; it may be, on the contrary, rich and prosperous. It would be unjust, in the two cases, to charge the annexing state with the same part of the debt. On the other hand, annexation always starts a current of emigration more or less strong. The population which the annexing state gains by annexation is always more or less inferior in number to that of the province at the moment of the annexation. This diminution, this decrease, cannot be foreseen, with any precision, at the moment of the treaty, and the apportionment which the negotiators might wish to make, would lack a solid basis."

* * * * * * *

§ 67. "The conclusion drawn by the authors from these observations is that a single criterion is admissible: that of wealth. Wealth will be disclosed by the amount of taxes paid up to the annexation by the two portions of the dismembered state: the annexed portion and the portion which keeps its independence. To eliminate as much as possible causes of error, the taxes taken are not those paid during the year preceding the annexation, but an average calculated over a space of several years. If the ceded province supplied a tenth, a fourth of the taxes levied by the ceding state, that state will be discharged of a tenth, a fourth of its debt. We are bound, like everybody else, to approve of this criterion. It is plain justice to take as a basis of apportionment, wealth as disclosed by taxation."

3. APPLICATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW DOCTRINE IN THIS CASE

Quotations from publicists have been indulged with much liberality in the hope that they may be found convenient to the members of the Court, also for the purpose of showing the unanimity with which they recognize the distinction, in respect of debt succession among nations, between a general or national debt and a special or local debt, and the consequences resulting from the distinction; and for the further reason that they supply the international law standard for debt apportionment, which counsel have assumed to be either area, population or taxable values, and that they agree that the latter is the just and adopted standard.

Even if the Court should be of opinion that the rule of international law does not govern the present case, yet if the Court, apart from the method prescribed by the ordinance and notwithstanding the provision in the Constitution of West Virginia referring the matter for ascertainment to the legislature of that state, should undertake to determine the equitable proportion of the old Virginia debt which West Virginia should assume, then we submit that the Court cannot fail to give great weight to the authorities on international law which we have cited. The rules of international law are based entirely upon consideration of equity and fairness. They have no force nor sanction except from the consent of nations by reason of their evident justice. This Court, therefore, in determining what would be an equitable apportionment of the Virginia debt, would undoubtedly desire to take into most careful consideration the unanimous opinion of the modern international law authorities that, in apportioning the debt of a state after its division, equity requires a distinction to be made between the portion of the debt which is local or special in its character and that which is general, so that the parent state and the new state are bound respectively to assume the whole of the local debt relating to their respective territories, leaving only the general debt to be apportioned on the basis of taxable value.

4. RECOGNITION OF DISTINCTION BETWEEN GENERAL AND LOCAL DEBTS IN DIVISION OF TERRITORY OF DAKOTA.

The authority for the rule of international law in the present case is peculiarly confirmed and strengthened by the fact that it was adopted and applied in the only case in our history which is directly analogous to the present case. We refer to the division of the territory of Dakota into the two states of North Dakota and South Dakota. The territory of Dakota had a bonded indebtedness incurred for the purpose of erecting certain public buildings and institutions. It also had incurred certain other liabilities of a general character.

The Sixth Section of the Act of Congress providing for the devision of Dakota into two states (25 U. S. Stat. at Large, p. 676) required the constitutional conventions of North Dakota and South Dakota to appoint a joint commission, whose duty should be to agree upon an equitable division of all property belonging to the territory of Dakota and to adjust and agree upon the amounts of the debts and liabilities of the territory which should be assumed and paid by each of the proposed states of North Dakota and South Dakota. The Act of Congress further required the agreement respecting the territorial debts and liabilities to be incorporated in the respective constitutions of the new states, and required each of them to obligate itself to pay its proportion of such debts and liabilities, the same as if they had been created by such states respectively.

A joint commission was duly appointed and made an agreement for the two new states respecting the territorial debts and liabilities, which agreement, in accordance with the enabling Act of Congress, was incorporated in the constitutions of North Dakota and South Dakota. The provisions concerning the apportionment of the territorial debt which we shall quote, are taken from the Constitution of South Dakota. (Similar provisions will be found in Art. 16 of the Constitution of North Dakota.)

Section 6 of Article 13 of the constitution of South Dakota is as follows:

> "In order that the payment of the debts and liabilities contracted or incurred by or in behalf of the Territory of Dakota may be justly and equitably provided for and made, and in pursuance of the requirements of an Act of Congress approved Feb. 22, 1889, entitled 'An Act to provide for the division of Dakota into two states and to enable the people of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana and Washington to form constitutions and state governments and to be admitted into the union on an equal footing with the original states, and to make donations of public lands to such states,' the states of North Dakota and South Dakota, by proceedings of a joint commission duly appointed under said Act, the sessions whereof were held in Bismarck in said State of North Dakota, from July 16, 1889, to July 31, 1889, inclusive, have agreed to the following adjustment of the amounts of the debts and liabilities of the Territory of Dakota which shall be assumed and paid by each of the States of North Dakota and South Dakota, respectively, to wit:"

The agreement follows.

Paragraph 3 of the agreement provides:

> "The said State of North Dakota shall assume and pay all bonds issued by the Territory of Dakota to provide funds for the purchase, construction, repairs or maintenance of such public institutions, grounds or buildings as are located within the boundaries of North Dakota, and shall pay all warrants issued under and by virtue of that certain act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Dakota, approved March 3, 1889, entitled 'An Act to provide for the refunding of outstanding warrants drawn on the capitol building fund.'"

Paragraph 4 provides as follows:

> "The said State of South Dakota shall assume and pay all bonds issued by the Territory of Dakota to provide funds for the purchase, construction, repairs or maintenance of such public institutions, grounds or buildings as are located within the boundaries of South Dakota."

Paragraphs 5 and 6 specify the particular bonds to be assumed respectively by North Dakota and South Dakota, and specify the local situations of the buildings and institutions on account of which the bonds assumed by the two states were issued.

Paragraph 6 provides:

> "The States of North Dakota and South Dakota shall pay one-half each of all liabilities now existing or hereafter and prior to the taking effect of this agreement incurred, except those heretofore and hereafter incurred on account of public institutions, grounds or buildings, except as otherwise herein specifically provided."

Paragraph 7 provides in part:

> "Nor shall either state be called upon to pay or answer to any portion of liability hereafter arising or accruing on account of transactions heretofore had, which liability would be a liability of the Territory of Dakota had such territory remained in existence, and which liability shall grow out of matters connected with any public institution, grounds or buildings of the territory situated or located within the boundaries of the other state."

Paragraph 8 provides in part:

> "A final adjustment of accounts shall be made upon the following basis: North Dakota shall be charged with all sums paid on account of public institutions, grounds or buildings located within its boundaries on account of the current appropriations since March 8, 1889; and South Dakota shall be charged with all sums paid on account of public institutions, grounds or buildings located within boundaries on the same accounts and during the same time. Each state shall be charged with one-half of all other expenses of the territorial government during the same time."

The Court will observe that the apportionment of the debt of the Territory of Dakota between the new States of North Dakota and South Dakota under their agreement was absolutely in accordance with the rule of international law that when a state is divided local debts must be assumed in their entirely by the state taking the territory with reference to which such debts were incurred. Each of the States of North Dakota and South Dakota assumed the bonds which had been issued on account of institutions located within its boundaries. General liabilities, on the other hand, were apportioned equally between the two states, as appears in paragraphs 6 and 8 of the agreement quoted above.

No contention can be made that this was merely the case of a special agreement, from which no principle of general application can be derived. The constitutions of the two states expressly declare the result of their agreement to be just and equitable. Section 6 of Article 13 of the South Dakota constitution (a similar provision will be found in paragraph 3, section 203, article 16 of the North Dakota Constitution) declares:

> "In order that the payment of the debts and liabilities contracted or incurred by and in behalf of the Territory of Dakota may be justly and equitably provided for and made * * * the states of North Dakota and South Dakota * * * have agreed to the following adjustment of the amounts of the debts and liabilities of the Territory of Dakota," etc.

Hence the opportionment of the debt of the Territory of Dokata can only be regarded as an equitable settlement between the two states. The full recognition in this settlement of the distinction between local and general debts not only confirms the doctrine of international law on this subject, but must impress the Court as an unique and valuable precedent for the purposes of the present case.

5. DISTINCTION BETWEEN GENERAL AND SPECIAL DEBT DISCUSSED IN NEGOTIATION OF TREATY BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND SPAIN.

His Honor Mr. Justice Day will remember that the distinction between a general or national debt and a special or local debt, from the standpoint of international law, involved a prolonged discussion between the American and Spanish commissioners at Paris in negotiating the Treaty of Paris, under which the United States secured to Cuba her independence and brought under our sovereignty Porto Rico and the Philippines. The Spanish Commissioners contended that the United States should assume, either for herself or for Cuba, that portion of the indebtedness which had been incurred and for which Spain had issued obligations primarily secured by an hypothecation of the revenues of Cuba. They contended that it was, to all intents and purposes, a Cuban debt; in other words, local or special, as contradistinguished from the general or national debt of Spain. The American commissioners recognized the distinction, but refused to accede to the demand of Spain, upon the ground that Cuba had had no debt, but, on the contrary had been a self-supporting colony, and that the indebtedness was incurred, and its proceeds used to wage war upon Cuba, and to resist by arms the aspirations and struggles of her people to be freed from long-continued despotism and misrule and was a part of Spain's national or general debt.

If we had taken over Cuba in the absence of strife between Cuba and Spain and the United States and Spain, and there had been found an indebtedness incurred by Spain, the proceeds of which had been expended in public improvements in Cuba and for the benefit and betterment of the island and its inhabitants, the question would have been a different one, and from the standpoint of international law and justice, our attitude must have been different.

6. THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN GENERAL DEBT AND LOCAL DEBT IS SUBSTANTIAL AND JUST.

And this distinction between a general and a special or local debt is a substantial one. It rests upon a sound principle, and is essentially just. Obviously, there is no such distinction when we consider the relation of a state and its creditors. There, the purpose for which the loan was effected is immaterial; but, in respect of the apportionment of the debt of a state between itself and a new state, erected out of its territory, the distinction is not only apparent but important.

A general debt, using the phrase as the publicists use it, with reference to debt succession, one would say is a debt, the object and result of which inures to the benefit of all the people subject to the dominion of the state, the expenditures of which are not susceptible of localization, and which cannot be said to benefit one section more than another, or one class of citizens more than another.

The debt incurred by the United States during the war in maintaining the Union would fall, from every standpoint, within the definition of a general debt. It was to preserve the Union as the fathers made it, and its benefits inured to all the people in all the states.

If the Southern Confederacy had become an established government, a nation, the indebtedness which it had incurred in the establishment of that government would have been a national or general debt as contradistinguished from a special or local debt.

This expenditure of its proceeds would have been made for the general and indivisible benefit of the people living under its sovereignty.

Such a debt is not, in its nature, apportionable except by special agreement, or, ratably upon some basis recognized by international law.

On the other hand, the special or local debt, however large it may be, incurred by a state or a nation, upon a division which results in the erection of a part of the national territory into another nation or state, apportions itself.

If it had happened that every dollar of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to January 1, 1861, had been expended in the construction of railways which Virginia owned, and canals and public buildings, toll highways, improved navigation, the utilization of which by the public required the payment of tolls, all owned by Virginia and within her borders, after the separation, could it, with any justice, be said that West Virginia, upon the division of the two states and the erection of West Virginia into a state, should in equity assume any portion of that burden, when not a dollar of the money had been expended within her territory, and if there were not within it a work of internal improvement erected by Virginia out of the proceeds of that debt? Such improvements are on the land, and, of necessity, are transferred with it.

Suppose, on January 1, 1861, the only debt resting upon the Commonwealth of Virginia had been a debt of $10,000,000, the proceeds of which had all been directly expended within the limits of the present State of West Virginia, and thereupon for the benefit of its people, in the construction of railways and public buildings, in the making of highways and other improvements, important in their character and beneficial to that people remote from tide-water, and West Virginia had been admitted as a state into the Union, with no provision as to apportionment of debt. Can there be any doubt, upon principles of international law, and upon principles of common justice that it would have been the duty of the new state to take that entire debt upon her shoulders? It would have been incurred with reference to her territory. It would have been expended within her limits, and for her benefit. Although such a debt, like any other, as between Virginia and her creditors, would have bound Virginia, yet, as between Virginia and West Virginia, it would have been a special debt which West Virginia ought to assume and pay. If this proposition is not sustained by all writers on international law who have touched the subject, we are mistaken. What answer could West Virginia have made to it? Between nations, a refusal to adjust it upon that basis might very well have resulted in war.

7. THE PUBLIC DEBT OF VIRGINIA PRIOR TO JANUARY 1, 1861, WAS A LOCAL OR SPECIAL AND NOT A GENERAL DEBT.

It is averred in the first paragraph of the bill, that:

> "On the first day of January, 1861, your oratrix was indebted in about the sum of $33,000,000 upon obligations and contracts made in connection with the construction of works of internal improvement throughout her then territory."

It is admitted, in the first paragraph of the answer:

> "That she believes it is true as alleged that on the first day of January, 1861, plaintiff was indebted in 'about' the sum of $33,000,000, upon obligations and contracts made in connection with the construction of works of internal improvement within her then territory."

The investigation before the Master, as shown by the exhibits, clearly makes it appear that Virginia had no general public debt in 1823, and that the $33,000,000 was expended in works of internal improvement.

Here we are logically led to an analysis of this debt and of the purposes for which it was incurred and the expenditure of its proceeds.

8. THE NATURE OF THE DEBT, AS SHOWN BY THE LEGISLATION UNDER WHICH IT WAS INCURRED.

Let it be said first, that Virginia, in 1823, the initial year of the period ending with December 31, 1861, during which the debt of the commonwealth here involved was created, appears to have had outstanding no general debt.

Virginia embarked early on a system of internal improvement. She passed, on February 5, 1816:

> "An act to create a fund for internal improvement, to be applied exclusively to the purpose of rendering navigable and uniting by canals the principal rivers, and of more intimately connecting, by public highways, the different parts of this commonwealth."

This fund consisted of the shares held by the commonwealth in the stock of the following companies; Little River Turnpike Company, Dismal Swamp, Appomattox, Potomac and James River Canal Companies, of the Bank of Virginia and also the Farmers' Bank of Virginia,

> "together with such dividends as may from time to time accrue to such shares of stock, and such bonds and premiums as may be hereafter received for the incorporation of new banks or the augmentation of the capitals or the extension of the charters of existing banks."

She, at the same time, provided that, for the purpose:

> "of preserving and improving this fund, and of disbursing such portions of it as the General Assembly may, from time to time, direct, to be applied to any object of internal improvement, it shall be, and the same is, hereby, vested in a corporate body to be styled 'the president and directors of the Board of Public Works,' in which name they shall have a common seal, etc."

The governor was made, ex officio, the president of the board of public works. The directors were to consist of the treasurer and attorney general of the commonwealth, for the time being, and of ten citizens thereof, three of whom were to reside westward of the Alleghany Mountains, two between the Alleghany and the Blue Ridge, two between the Alleghany and the Great Post Road, and the residue between that road and the sea coast.

The act provided that the fund should be deposited in the Treasury, subject to the order of the president and directors of the board, paid out or delivered by the treasurer of the commonwealth upon the order of the board, and required accounts of the disbursements and the certificates upon which the same shall have been made to be preserved, and an annual account to be rendered to the general assembly.

Section 11 provided that the president and directors of the board of public works shall be, and they are hereby, authorized to subscribe, in behalf of the commonwealth, to such public works as the general assembly may, from time to time, agree to patronize, such portions of the fund for internal improvement as may be directed by law; but that no part of the said fund shall be subscribed towards the stock of any canal, turnpike or other company until three-fifths at least of the whole stock necessary to complete such canal, turnpike or other public works of such company, shall have been otherwise subscribed; or until, of the stock so subscribed, one-fifth thereof shall have been actually paid by the resident subscribers, or the payment thereof effectually secured by bond of approved security, or a deed of trust upon the real estate of such subscriber, of twice the value of such one-fifth part; such bond to be taken payable to the president and directors of the company authorized to complete such public work.

It was then provided that the dividends on the stock subscribed by the president and directors of the board of public works should go exclusively to other subscribers than the commonwealth until such portion of the stock of those subscribers shall have netted to them six per centum per annum from the specified time of such payment: that any increase of profit after that net income should have been assured to the subscribers, should belong exclusively to the fund for internal improvements, until the net annual income of the whole stock actually expended by any company shall reach six per centum per annum;

> "after which the commonwealth and the other subscribers to the stock of the company shall divide the net profits on such stock in proportion to their respective interests."

It then provided that the president and directors should vest in some productive fund the undivided dividends accruing upon any of the stock, until the same was specially appropriated by law to some internal improvement; and adds:

> "And shall have power, subject to the control of the general assembly, to sell, from time to time, as may be ordained by law, the whole or any part of the shares held by the commonwealth of the stock of any canal, turnpike or other company subscribed for under the provisions of this act, for the purpose of investing the proceeds of such sale in the stock of some other similar company, subject to the like conditions as have been before expressed in this act."

The board of public works were given power, in behalf of the commonwealth, to appoint such number of directors of every public work as shall bear to the whole number of directors of such work the proportion of the commonwealth's shares of stock in such work, which may be subscribed in pursuance of this act to the whole number of shares thereof.

Section 16 provided:

> "That the public faith shall be, and the same is, hereby, solemnly pledged to fulfill the obligation of this act, and that the said appropriation shall continue in force until the first day of January of the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six; except at such time as the United States of America may be involved in war, or the safety of this commonwealth, may, in the opinion of the general assembly, require, when the general assembly may, withdraw (during the period of actual hostilities or of such imminent danger) the whole or any part of such fund, for the purpose of defense, provided such withdrawal can be made without a violation of any engagement made under this act."

The provision above quoted, by which the state withheld herself from dividends until the citizen subscribers had netted six per cent on what they had paid in, was changed by an act of February 20, 1829, chapter 21, in which it was enacted:

> "And all dividends upon subscriptions hereafter authorized or required to be made by the general assembly to any canal, road, bridge company or other corporation, shall be made and stand upon the same footing with subscriptions made by individuals."

The legislature of the commonwealth passed February 7, 1817, chapter 38, a general act providing certain general regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies, entitled:

> "An act prescribing certain general regulations for incorporation of turnpike companies."

This act provided that:

> "Whenever it may be deemed expedient for the general assembly to make a turnpike road, and an act shall actually pass the general assembly for such purpose, the following general provisions shall be deemed to be contained as part of the said charter or act of incorporation, as if the same had been actually re-enacted in reference to such grant or charter, except in so far as such grant, charter or act may expressly provide."

And then provides that:

> "The commissioners named in any special act, or a majority of them, shall have power to open books for subscriptions to the stock at the places named in the act, and to divide the capital stock into as many shares, not exceeding one hundred dollars each, in amount, as they may deem proper, to appoint any number of deputy commissioners, to open books of subscription to the stock of the company, and the subscriptions shall be made and the payment of moneys received on subscriptions to the president and directors by the commissioners; that the books shall remain open until at least one-half of the capital stock of the company shall have been subscribed, when a general meeting of the subscribers is to be called by the commissioners," and provided other details for the purpose of organization.

It also prescribes the tolls which may be exacted, and provides for changing them, either raising or lowering the amounts, upon certain contingencies.

By section 28, it is provided that:

> "If the said president and directors do not begin the said work within two years after the passage of the act for incorporating the company, or shall not complete the same within ten years thereafter, in the manner hereinbefore directed, then the interest of such company in the said tolls and roads aforesaid shall be forfeited and cease."

It provides for reports of the receipts and profits to the board of public works.

It also provides that:

> "If the commonwealth shall desire to purchase the stock of such company, and shall vest authority to make such purchase in any person, corporation or body politic, it shall not be lawful for the proprietor of any such stock to sell or transfer the same to any person whatever until he shall actually and with good faith have offered the same for sale, for the price for which he is > willing to take therefor, to the person, body politic or corporation, authorized to purchase by the commonwealth."

And also provides that after such offer to such person, body politic or corporation, no transfer or assignment to any other person, shall be entered or registered in the books of such company, or vest any right whatever, unless it shall have been proven to the satisfaction of the president and directors that the stock so transferred had been, with good faith, previously offered to the person, body politic or corporation, so authorized, at a price at least as low as that at which it had been sold to such assignee or transferee.

A general act was passed February 11, 1832, prescribing certain general conditions on which subscriptions to certain joint stock companies shall be made on behalf of the commonwealth. This act provides as follows:

> "That all subscriptions which are now authorized by law and have not been made by the board of public works, or which may hereafter be authorized, shall be subject to the following conditions and provisions, to wit:
>
> "In every case the board of public works shall be furnished with a certificate under the seal of the company signed by the treasurer and countersigned by their president, stating that at least one-fourth of the private subscriptions of not less than three-fifths of the capital stock has been actually paid up into the hands of such treasurer, and the remainder of such subscription is either so made or is made by solvent persons fully able to pay, and these facts be shown to the satisfaction of the board of public works. They shall also be furnished with a list of the stockholders, showing a list of the shares standing in each name."

(The provision with reference to the proportion of capital stock subscribed by individuals was afterwards changed to "two-fifths," so that the state took three-fifths and private stockholders were permitted to take only two-fifths.)

If any private improvement shall have been commenced previously, and the subscriptions thereto have been authorized or made, the board of public works shall be furnished with a statement showing the amount of money received up to the date of such statement, and of the amount expended in the work, together with the balance of money on hand, the contracts entered into for the construction of the improvements, the exact progress made therein, as near as may be, its dimensions and a correct map of its location.

The section provided:

> "Installments of future subscription of the board of public works shall be applied in the manner and on the conditions hereinbefore mentioned when not otherwise specifically provided by law; that is, one-fourth of such subscription shall be paid on the production of the draft of the treasurer or other authorized agent of the company, in the manner and in such form as the board of public works may prescribe, and the remaining three-fourths on similar drafts, in six equal semi-annual installments or in installments of the same proportions with future payments or private subscriptions at the discretion of the board of public works."

It also provided that:

> "Before payments of the installments aforesaid, the board of public works shall be furnished in every case with a certificate in the form and manner required by the first section of this act, showing the amount actually paid up by the private stockholders, which amount must be at least equal to the amount payable by the board of public works."

It was the evident purpose of the commonwealth from the beginning to render susceptible of easy ascertainment the identification of each loan with the particular improvement for which it was authorized by special act of the legislature to be made. Thus, by chapter 117 of the laws of 1834, which authorized the borrowing of money on the credit of the state at a rate of interest not exceeding five per centum for sums of money not less than $30,000, and not exceeding $60,000, it is provided:

> "That the moneys so to be borrowed shall be paid into the treasury upon the warrant of the second auditor, and upon the receipt in the treasury of the sum > or sums so borrowed, the treasurer shall issue his certificate of loan for the amount thereof, purporting that the Commonwealth of Virginia owes to the lender, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, the principal sum so borrowed, together with the interest at the rate of interest agreed upon, and that the interest so agreed upon is payable semi-annually at the treasury of the commonwealth. Such certificate shall show on the face thereof that the loan was made under authority of this act."

And this principle was embodied, as the Court will see, in chapter 12, laws of 1838, providing for the negotiation of loans for internal improvements, a general act, the pertinent portions of which are as follows:

> "First, that all loans hereafter authorized by law for the payment of subscriptions on behalf of the commonwealth to the capital of joint stock companies incorporated for purposes of internal improvement or for defraying the expense of any work or internal improvement in which the state is or may be interested, as well as all loans heretofore authorized, shall be negotiated according to the provisions of this act, except so far as may be otherwise specially provided by the acts authorizing the loans.
> "Second, the board of public works in effecting such loans shall borrow upon the credit of the commonwealth at the lowest rate of interest at which the necessary amount can be obtained, not exceeding in any case five per centum per annum. Upon the payment of the moneys so borrowed into the treasury, which shall be done upon the warrant of the second auditor, the treasurer shall issue a certificate or certificates of loan for the amount thereof purporting that the Commonwealth of Virginia owes to the lender, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, the principal sum so borrowed, together with the interest at the rate agreed on; and that the interest is payable semi-annually at the treasury of the commonwealth, and that such certificate or certificates were issued under authority of a special act authorizing such loans; which certificate shall be signed by the treasurer and countersigned by the second auditor and be registered in a book to be kept for that purpose by the second auditor, and shall be transferable on the books of his office in person or by attorney." * * * "All loans negotiated in conformity with this act shall be irredeemable for twenty years and shall afterwards be redeemed at the pleasure of the general commonwealth.

"Third, for the payment of the interest and the final redemption of the principal of any sum to be borrowed in conformity to this act, the stock of any joint stock company subscribed for or purchased with the moneys so borrowed, together with the dividends and other net incomes which may accrue therefrom to the commonwealth or to the fund for internal improvement, shall be and the same are hereby appropriated and pledged; and in like manner the net income and other profits which may accrue from works in which the state is interested other than those of joint stock companies, and on which the money borrowed is to be expended, shall be and the same are likewise hereby appropriated and pledged for the payment of the interest and redemption of the principal of the moneys so borrowed; that if the stock aforesaid and the said dividends, net profits and other income shall be inadequate to the payment of the said semi-annual interest and the final redemption of the principal of the respective loans, the general assembly pledges itself to provide other and sufficient funds, and for that purpose to levy any necessary and adequate taxes upon any or all subjects liable to taxation under the Constitution."

The act provides that:

"If the dividends and income arising from the stock or work as aforesaid, together with the fund for internal improvement, shall be insufficient to pay all interest due upon the loan when demanded, the auditor of public accounts shall, upon the application of the board of public works, issue his warrant upon the treasury directing the payment of such interest out of any moneys therein not otherwise appropriated, and in case of the inability of the treasury at any time to discharge such warrants, the board of public works shall be and they are hereby authorized to borrow the necessary amount from > the banks of this state at a rate of interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, on the credit of the commonwealth, to be repaid in such manner as the general assembly may by law direct."

By section 5 the board is authorized and empowered to procure any or all of the loans authorized by law, either in the United States or in Europe, as they may deem most advantageous to the public interest, and for that purpose to appoint one or more agents with necessary powers, and to allow him or them such compensation as they may deem reasonable; also that as to European loans they may provide for the payment of interest on the same semi-annually in London or elsewhere, and may stipulate for the payment by the lenders of the amount of such loans in England or elsewhere, conforming the certificates to be issued to the terms of the loans.

It appears in the case that during the debt period, between 1823 and 1861, a large number of stock corporations were created to build works of internal improvement, of one kind and another, to whose stocks the board of public works, under this legislation, subscribed on behalf of the commonwealth, for a time, for two-fifths, and for another time, for three-fifths, but never until, in the one case three-fifths, and in the other, two-fifths, had been subscribed by solvent private citizens, and a required sum paid in on the private subscriptions. Moneys were borrowed in sums, great and small, from time to time, to pay these stock subscriptions of the commonwealth. This applied to turnpike companies, bridge companies, navigation companies and railway companies. And the state also subscribed a large amount to the stock of banks incorporated by her legislation and issued bonds in payment of her subscription.

The record shows that Virginia expended about $4,0000,000 more than the $33,000,000 debt on works of internal improvement, out of moneys raised by taxation. In some instances she expended through her board of public works directly the proceeds of loans.

In respect of all of the debt, the proceeds of which were expended in West Virginia, the schedule shows that the loans which she effected were numbered as required by law, the certificate of debt or certificates of debt, referring to the act which authorized the particular expenditure, so that it is not only true that the debt represents expenditures for internal improvements, but it is true, so far as the expenditures in West Virginia were concerned, that the moneys which were expended, the proceeds of loans, are traceable to the particular improvements and the stocks and dividends thereon were pledged for the repayment of the loan.

An examination of complainant's exhibit A-2, which shows the form of bonds, will disclose that each loan was numbered; so that while the aggregate amount of the debt is very large, it is composed of a vast number of separate, relatively small loans, each susceptible of identification, and the proceeds of each traceable to the particular improvement for which the loan was authorized to be made, so that each loan was localized.

By chapter 8, laws, passed March 27, 1839, page 9, it was provided:

> "It shall be lawful for the treasurer of the commonwealth, and he is hereby directed upon the requisition of the board of public works, and without requiring the previous payment of money into the treasury on account thereof, to issue certificates of stock for the amount of any loan or loans which are now or may hereafter be authorized by law, to procure for private or internal improvements, payable in currency of the United States or that of any European state, and in such form and with such conditions and stipulations, not inconsistent with law, as the said board shall direct, which certificate shall be countersigned," etc., etc.

This phrase "not inconsistent with law" preserved the identification of the loan with the particular improvement as provided by the act of 1838 above quoted.

As it was a general provision of law, the presumption is that the same thing is true of the loans, the proceeds of which were expended within Virginia, or in the purchase of stocks of corporations whose improvements were within her present limits.

The Rule of Public Law Does Not Govern This Case Because the Wheeling Ordinance and the Constitution of West Virginia Constitute a Special Agreement as to the Proportion of the Old Virginia Debt to be Assumed by West Virginia.

Even if the Court should not recognize the distinction between general and local debts, the present case is within the exception to the rule of international law as stated by Mr. Justice Field in that the matter of the division of the public debt was the subject of a special agreement between the two states evidenced by the 9th section of the Wheeling Ordinance and Section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution of West Virginia.

1. SECTION 9 OF THE ORDINANCE.

The pertinent portion of the ordinance is as follows:

> "9. The new state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all state expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government since any part of said debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new state during the same period. All private rights and interests, in lands within the proposed state, derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed state, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in the State of Virginia.
>
> "The lands within the proposed state of non-resident proprietors shall not, in any case, be taxed higher than the lands of residents therein. No grants of lands, or land warrants issued by the proposed state shall interfere with any warrant issued from the land office of Virginia prior to the 17th day of April last which shall be located on lands within the proposed state now liable thereto."

2. SECTION 8 OF ARTICLE VIII. OF WEST VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION.

Section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution, "Taxation and Finance," is as follows:

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one shall be assumed by this state; and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

3. TWO VIEWS OF OPPOSING COUNSEL IN RELATION TO THE ORDINANCE.

Two views are taken in relation to the ordinance and the quoted provision of the constitution by opposing counsel. The learned counsel who represents the "bondholding creditors of Virginia" contends in his brief (p. 38):

> "That ordinance, as shown by its title, was to provide for the formation of the new state. All of its sections, except the ninth, were directed toward that end. The state was formed when its constitution was framed and adopted by the people. The ordinance then became functus officio, and ceased to have any operation."

It is hardly to be expected that a lawyer, in the changing fortunes of a great litigation, can always be entirely consistent. The learned counsel has stated that he drew the bill, by the filing of which this suit was inaugurated. In that bill, page 4 (May's Comp.), is set forth the ordinance, followed on page 6 by several quotations from the first Constitution of West Virginia, including section 8 of Article VIII.

Paragraph 18 of the bill is as follows (p. 10):

> "Your oratrix charges that the liability of the State of West Virginia for a just and equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia as of the time when the State of West Virginia was created, rests upon the following among many grounds which might be indicated here:
>
> "First. The area of the territory now known as the > State of West Virginia formed about one-third of the territory of the Commonwealth of Virginia when this public debt was created, and its population included about one-third of that of the original state at the time of its dismemberment. And the State of West Virginia did, by the acquisition and appropriation of such territory, with the population thereof, assume therewith liability for a just and equitable proportion of the public debt created prior to the partition of such territory.

>
> "Second. The liability of West Virginia for a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia as it existed prior to the creation and erection of the State of West Virginia forms part of her very political existence, and is an essential constituent of her fundamental law, as shown in the said ordinance adopted at Wheeling on the 20th day of August, 1861 in which the method of ascertaining her liability on account of said debt is prescribed. And this liabilty is imbedded in the Constitution under which she was admitted as a state into the Federal Union, and was one of the conditions under which she was created a state and admitted into the Union."

The learned counsel for the bond-holding creditors says, in his brief (page 37):

> "The tenth section of the ordinance to provide for the erection of a new state," etc. provided that—"When the general assembly shall give its consent to the formation of the new state, it shall forward to the Congress of the United States such consent, together with an official copy of such constitution, with the request that the new state may be admitted into the union of states."

He adds:

> "It did not provide that a copy of the 'ordinance' should be forwarded to congress, and there is nothing in this entire record to sustain the assertion that congress ever saw or knew of that ordinance or of its provisions."

It may be true that there is nothing in the record, technically speaking, to evidence the fact that the ordinance was before the congress, and accessible to its members, at the time the bill for the admission of West Virginia was being considered and passed. That depends upon what the record in this case is; but some things the Court will take judicial notice of. In many instances, it has taken judicial notice of the archives of the government and the legislative history of measures before it, the construction and effect of which have been here involved. It has taken judicial notice of records of the treasury department, of the records of the congress in respect of the history of measures, or amendments offered and adopted or rejected, and of reports of committees.

It is said in our brief, filed on the argument of complainant's motion to refer cause to Master (page 42) as follows:

> "It ought here to be stated that the constitutional convention of West Virginia appointed three commissioners to that end, also that the commissioners presented on May 31, 1862, to the United States Senate a memorial praying for the admission of that state into the Union, addressed to the Honorable B. F. Wade, chairman of the committee on territories, in which they gave a history of the proceedings which led to the organization of the restored government of Virginia, and which included at length the ordinance adopted on the 20th of August, 1861, by the convention at Wheeling, entitled, 'an ordinance to provide for the formation of a new state out of a portion of the territory of this state,' which, on the 31st day of May, 1862, was referred by the senate to the committee on territories and ordered to be printed (Congressional Globe, p. 2451; 37 Cong. 2d. session, Misc. Senate Doc., No. 99)."

The Congressional Globe, being a public document, giving the proceedings of co-ordinate branches of the government, this Court will, undoubtedly, under the authorities, take judicial notice of the fact that it was presented to the senate, that it was ordered by the senate and referred to the committee on Territories. That the order to print the usual number, which supplies both houses, was obeyed, the Court will presume.

4. VIRGINIA IS NOT IN A POSITION TO INSIST UPON THE ELIMINATION OF THE ORDINANCE FROM THE CASE.

Neither the learned counsel, nor the Commonwealth of Virginia, is in position to insist upon the elimination of the Wheeling Ordinance from this case. In 1871, years after the adoption of the Wheeling Ordinance and the Constitution of West Virginia, the Commonwealth of Virginia passed a funding act, the preamble of which (May's Comp. 14, Exhibit No. 1) of the bill, reads as follows:

> "WHEREAS, in the formation of the State of West Virginia there were included within its boundaries about one-third of the territory and population of the State of Virginia; and
> "WHEREAS, in the ordinance authorizing the organization of said state it was provided that the said state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, which provision has not yet been fulfilled, although repeated and earnest efforts in that behalf have been made by this state, and will continue to be made as long as may be necessary; and
>
> "WHEREAS, the people of this commonwealth are anxious for the prompt liquidation of her portion of said debt, which is estimated to be two-thirds of the same; and
>
> "WHEREAS, it has been suggested that the authorities of West Virginia may prefer to pay that state's portion of said debt to the holders thereof, and not to this state, as the constitution of this state provides:
>
> "NOW, THEREFORE, to enable the State of West Virginia to settle her proportion of said debt with the holders thereof, and to prevent any complications or difficulties which might be interposed to any other manner of settlement, and for the purpose of promptly restoring the credit of Virginia by providing for the prompt and certain payment of the interest upon her proportion of said debt, as the same shall become due;
>
> "THEREFORE BE IT ENACTED:"

And the act proceeds to fund two-thirds of the debt, and to provide for the issue of certificates of Virginia for the remaining one-third —the payment of which > "will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the states of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia in existence at the time of its dismemberment."

We find here a legislative recognition of the ordinance as the sole evidence of the assumption by West Virginia of a proportion of the public debt of the commonwealth prior to January 1, 1861. The legislature of Virginia evidently regarded it as not functus officio, although the constitution had been adopted for some years; and this legislative declaration was despite the fact that Virginia, in her constitution adopted in 1864, which was the only organic law of the state until 1870, had attempted in express terms to repudiate the ordinance, so far as it related to the debt.

Section 27 of article IV. of the constitution of 1864 is as follows:

> "SECTION 27. The general assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of Virginia proper to be borne by the states of Virginia and of West Virginia respectively * * * and no ordinance passed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 11th day of June 1861, adjusting the public debt between Virginia and West Virginia shall be binding upon this state."

5. VIRGINIA DOES NOT CONTEND THAT THE ORDINANCE HAS CEASED TO BE BINDING.

The legislation of Virginia, upon which was based her funding act, honorably ignored this attempted repudiation of the ordinance, and in the argument on the submission of a draft of a proposed decree the distinguished lawyer who represented the state as its attorney-general, now of counsel, in a brief filed here, said:

> "While the basis of settlement prescribed by the Wheeling Ordinance is, as we have always considered it arbitrary and inequitable, we have never taken the position that that ordinance, reasonably and fairly construed, and taken and applied together with the act of the restored government of Virginia of February 3, 1863, and section 8 of article VIII. of the constitution under which West Virginia became a state, was not binding on both states."

The learned counsel who argue for Virginia here, in their notes of argument, do not quite contend that the ordinance became functus officio by the adoption of the constitution.

On page 13 of their "notes of argument," they say:

> "Now the insistence of Virginia has been, and is, that West Virginia should be charged with an equitable proportion of the debt, to be ascertained under the Wheeling Ordinance construed so as not to defeat the express controlling purpose of its enactment and qualified and ruled by the provisions of article VIII. of the West Virginia Constitution, upon which the consent of the legislature and of the Congress of the United States to the formation of the new state, was predicated.
>
> "Agreeably to the decision of this Court in its opinion, delivered by the late Chief Justice (R., 136), the view of Virginia is, and has been, that the ordinance and the provisions of the West Virginia Constitution, should be read as being in pari materia; but that the constitutional provision being the latest, must prevail whenever there is conflict between them."

And it is then said,

> "as logical and inevitable consequence from this, the claim of Virginia was, and is, that, if the language of the Wheeling Ordinance is fairly and reasonably susceptible of such a construction as will, when fairly applied to the facts of the case, lead to an equitable result, and place upon West Virginia an equitable proportion of the debt, such construction should be given to that ordinance; and that, if the language of the ordinance is not reasonably and fairly susceptible of such a construction, then the ordinance must be discarded, and the mandate of the West Virginia Constitution followed. And that, in any event, the provisions of the constitution will govern in placing a contractual obligation upon West Virginia to pay an equitable portion of the debt of the undivided state, and to pay interest upon the same from the date when that express contractual obligation accrued, until it shall have been discharged.
>
> But the claim of Virginia was, and is further, that the provisions of the Wheeling Ordinance—fairly, sensible and justly construed, and applied, according to its manifest purpose—places upon West Virginia a just and equitable proportion of the debt; and that West Virginia > cannot be heard to repudiate this result of her own express covenant and promise."

In other words, the attitude of counsel for Virginia is, that if the ordinance, fairly, sensibly and justly construed, brings about a result which, in the opinion of the Court, is an equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia, prior to 1861, to be assumed by West Virginia, the ordinance is binding; but if the Court shall be of opinion that the ordinance, construed in accordance with the settled rule of construction, does not produce a result which the Court regards as an equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia, prior to 1861, to be borne by West Virginia, it was repealed by the Constitution and is no longer to be considered.

6. THERE IS NO CONFLICT BETWEEN THE ORDINANCE AND THE CONSTITUTION.

We contend that the ordinance is to be construed as any other contract would be construed: that its language is plain, and that the general words of assumption with which it begins cannot control the clear and special provisions which follow. We insist that there is no conflict between the ordinance and Section 8 of Article VIII. of the constitution. The ordinance contains substantially two provisions concerning the only matters with which the ordinance would naturally deal:

(1) That the proposed new state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861.

(2) The method by which it shall be ascertained which is clearly prescribed.

Two things the ordinance naturally and properly omitted:

(1) It made no provision as to the agency or tribunal whose duty it should be to ascertain the proportion by pursuit of the method prescribed by it.

(2) It made no provision for the payment of the just proportion when ascertained. These matters were left to the constitutional convention. In other words, the constitution supplies the provisions omitted from the ordinance which would obviously be necessary to carry it into execution. The one is a supplement of the other, and there is no conflict between them, nor can any be claimed, but it is contended that if the method prescribed by the ordinance does not bring about a result which Virginia thinks is equitable, the ordinance then becomes functus officio, and Section 8 of Article VIII. of the constitution constitutes the entire compact between the two states. This is based upon the fact that the ordinance uses the word "just" as qualifiying the word "proportion," and the constitutional provision uses the word "equitable." It is not to be doubted, we think, that the two mean, as here used, the same thing. The constitutional convention was provided for by the ordinance. It met and adopted the constitution within ninety days of the adoption of the Wheeling Ordinance.

It is stated in the brief of the learned counsel for the "bond-holding creditors" that the same territory was represented in both bodies, and to a large extent by the same men. Probably no constitutional convention ever assembled in this country under such circumstances. It was in the midst of war, at a time of excitement and passion. There is no reason to suppose that the men in this convention who had thought out carefully the method by which the proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, to be assumed by the new state should be ascertained had either forgotten or abandoned, ninety days later, the method prescribed in the ordinance, as to the manner in which it should be ascertained. The constitutional provision was silent as to method. There was no occasion for repeating in it the language of the ordinance so recently adopted.

Virginia vs. West Virginia, (11 Wall. 39), decided in 1870, was a suit brought here by Virginia to have determined the true boundaries of the latter state with reference to whether three counties which, according to the contention of Virginia, were within her jurisdiction. This ordinance was treated in that case by this Court as a compact between two states, not binding, of course, until it had been ratified. The Court said at page 59:

> "But did congress consent to this agreement?
> "Unless it can be shown that the consent of congress under that clause of the constitution which forbids agreements between states without it, can only be given in the form of an express and formal statement of every proposition of the agreement, and of its consent thereto, we must hold that the consent of that body was given to this agreement."

Virginia vs. Tennessee, 148 U. S. 503.
Wedding vs. Meyler, 192 U. S. 582.

The Court was referring there to the agreement so far as it related to the three counties.

It certainly was a compact, and wherever it was not carried into the constitution, it remains binding as such. There can be no doubt that if the constitution had been silent on the subject of the assumption of a proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, our friends on the other side would have been here claiming that the ordinance was both as to assumption and method a compact, and we do not perceive how West Virginia could have answered that claim. It might not be a binding compact until acted upon in some way by congress, but if acted upon by congress in the admission of the state, it would be binding ex relatione as a compact from the beginning. Its validity as a compact could not be attacked, because in our view its validity does not depend upon that provision of clause 3, Section 10 of Article I. of the United States Constitution which provides:

"No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power or engage in war unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

The predicate of this provision is that there shall be "another state." When this ordinance was enacted there was but one state, and that was the Commonwealth of Virginia. The validity of this compact is traceable to, and well supported by, that provision of the constitution, clause I, Section 3 of Article IV.:

"New states may be admitted by the congress into this union; but no new states shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other state; nor any state be formed by the junction of two or more states or parts of states, without the consent of the > legislatures of the states concerned, as well as of the congress."

When the congress admitted West Virginia into the Union, there were two states, and the ordinance so far as it was not merged into the constitution, was a compact binding from the beginning.

If the method prescribed by section 9 of the ordinance for the ascertainment of the proportion of the debt which the new state should assume, had produced a result satisfactory to Virginia, and the constitution had contented itself with enjoining upon the legislature to provide for the ascertainment and payment of the debt to be assumed by the new state, our friends would have been here contending that the method prescribed by the ordinance, not being in conflict with the constitution, was a compact binding upon West Virginia, and how could that contention have been successfully answered?

The circumstances under which the framers of this ordinance drew it and adopted it, the purposes to be accomplished by it, the fact so often referred to by the learned counsel of the bond-holding creditors, that the men who drafted and adopted it were West Virginians, whose homes would be in the new state, whose association has always been with the people and with the territory which were to constitute the new state, and who resented, and had long resented what they had long deemed unjust and oppressive treatment by the government of the Commonwealth of Virginia, all this is to be kept in mind.

7. THE VICE IN THE ARGUMENT FOR VIRGINIA.

The vice in the argument for Virginia is in the assumption that the ordinance is to be read as if it consisted only of these words:

> "The new state shall take upon itself a just proporportion of the public debt of Virginia prior to the first of January, 1861."

If the word "equitable" had been used instead of the word "just" in the first clause of the ordinance, then, applying the method prescribed, the result must have been the same.

Section 9 of the ordinance is to be construed as a whole; and it can mean but one thing, and that is an agreement that whatever sum shall result from an accounting, in accordance with the method specifically prescribed by the ordinance, shall constitute the just proportion of the debt which the State of West Virginia should take upon herself.

It is perfectly apparent that the ordinance was not confined to the debt. Even the first item is not limited to expenditures in the creation of internal improvements within the limits of the new state, although it is well known that it was an internal improvement debt. It says:

> "The new state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the 'public debt,' etc., 'to be ascertained by charging to it all state expenditures within the limits thereof.'"

This is not limited in scope to internal improvement expenditures within her limits. First, whatever money the commonwealth has expended in the territory in the construction of public buildings, or the improvement of public buildings, it was clearly intended should be included. Every expenditure made by Virginia within the territorry of the proposed new state, which could be localized there, was to be included. Second, there was to be charged to her a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government since any part of said debt was contracted.

It will be borne in mind, as has before been shown, that the Trans-Alleghany people had, for a great many years, complained publicly, in constitutional conventions, in the legislature and elsewhere, that a larger burden of taxation had been imposed upon the people living in the territory of the proposed new state than was just, from any standpoint. That Virginia had denied proper representation in the legislature to the people of the western portion of the state. That she had, while taxing them in a searching way, refused proper representation to the people of the western portion of the state, taxing them in the way of taxes on personal property, even including the interest on her own obligations, taxes on watches and plate, on carriages, and a long list of personal property; taxes on occupations and excises and taxes of every imaginable description; that she had exempted from taxation slaves under twelve years of age, unless hired to work under certain circumstances, and had taxed all slaves of greater age than twelve years, at the rate of one dollar and twenty cents per slave, regardless, utterly, of the value of both classes—those under twelve years of age and those over twelve years of age—thus practically exempting, for the benefit of a class of property owners in the eastern portion of the state not less than $300,000,000 of marketable property; thereby casting an additional and oppressive burden upon the mountainous portion of the state, where there were, relatively, few slaves, and where the people were opposed to the institution of slavery. Those men, rightly or wrongly, considered that was the "parting of the ways" with the eastern portion of the state and her people, and that would "even up" on a just basis. They remembered that during the years from 1823 to 1861, the debt period, not a single public building had been constructed within the limits of the proposed new state; and that of the $33,000,000 of indebtedness incurred for internal improvements, only $2,800,000 at the uttermost, had been expended within her limits. And during all that time, the people felt that they had been over-taxed for the purpose of paying interest on an immense bonded debt, a trifle only of the proceeds of which had been expended within her territory, and that they had borne a larger than a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government. It was, for this reason, manifestly, that there was inserted in that ordinance, as to be charged to West Virginia "a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government," "since any part of said debt was contracted." And it was for this reason that, after charging both of the items to the new state, the ordinance provided for deducting from that total, "the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new state during the same period."

It is said that this was an artificial and arbitrary method. That depends upon the point of view. We must take the standpoint of the men who drafted and adopted this ordinance. If the ordinance had used the word "equitable" instead of the word "just" before the word "proportion," in the first line, and had left the remainder as it stands, could the result have been any different?

The definitive words, "to be ascertained by charging to it all state expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government since any part of the said debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new state during the same period," would have remained, and the result must have been precisely the same by the pursuit of the same method.

To construe this ordinance by disregarding the method prescribed in it, in order to reach a result which Virginia deems equitable, or which the Court may think ought to have been prescribed, is not to "construe" the ordinance; but is to make a new and different ordinance.

The members of the legislature of 1871, presumably, knew what this ordinance was when they embodied it in their funding act. Is it to be supposed that the men who framed the ordinance, and so carefully outlined the method to be pursued, had, within 90 days, in the constitutional convention, abandoned that method, and had intended to assume a different proportion of the debt from that assumed by the ordinance? Counsel would have the Court take an extraordinary liberty in construing the ordinance.

They say, on page 11 of their notes:

> "That ordinance purported to be an enactment of Virginia alone. It prescribed, upon its face, an arbitrary and what would seem to be an inequitable basis of settlement. In so far as it provided for the assumption of the new state of a "just proportion" of the debt of the commonwealth, its language was free from objection. But when it came to indicate the manner in which that proportion should be ascertained, its terms were not only artificial, but on their face, inequitable."

That is a matter of opinion, and, although that is the opinion of the learned counsel and of the bond-holding creditors and their counsel, that is not the question before the Court. The question is, "what was intended by the framers of the ordinance?"

8. "JUST" AND "EQUITABLE" ARE SYNONYMOUS.

We say again that there is no conflict between the ordinance and Section 8 of Article VIII. Where the latter covers the same ground as the former, there is but one change, which, in the excitement of that day, is easily accounted for, if it requires explanation; and that is the substitution of the word "equitable" for the word "just" in the ordinance. What is the difference in common parlance between the word "equitable" and the word "just"? Webster defines "equitable" as follows:

> "Possessing or exhibiting equity; according to natural right or natural justice; marked by a due consideration for what is fair; unbaised; impartial; just; as an equitable decision, an equitable distribution," etc.

The first word he gives as a synonym is "just," followed by:

> "Fair, reasonable, right, honest, impartial candid, upright."

He defines "just."

> "That which was fitting; conforming or conformable to rectitude or justice; not doing wrong to any one; violating no right or obligation; upright; righteous; honest; true;—said both of persons and things.
>
> "3. Rendering or disposed to render to each one his due; equitable; fair; impartial, as a just duty."

He gives as synonyms of "just":

> "Equitable, honest, upright, true, fair, impartial, proper," etc.

Soule gives as the synonyms of "just":

> "1. Equitable, right, rightful, lawful, reasonable.
>
> "2. Fair, fair-minded, candid, even-handed.
>
> "3. Honest, upright, righteous, blameless, pure, conscientious, uncorrupted, virtuous, good, straight-forward."

As the synonyms of "equity," he gives:

> "1. Justice, right.
> "2. Justice, rectitude, uprightness, righteousness, impartiality, fairness, reasonableness, fair play."

But it seems impossible, for a moment, to consider that the use of the word "equitable" in the constitution operated to obliterate the method prescribed by the ordinance, when, if the word "equitable" had been in the ordinance instead of the word "just," the result would have been precisely the same.

9. IF THE ORDINANCE IS IN CONFLICT WITH THE CONSTITUTION THE ORDINANCE MUST BE WHOLLY ELIMINATED.

We take it to be clear that if the ordinance is to be ignored as the method prescribed for ascertaining the proportion of the debt of the commonwealth, it must be because it conflicts with Section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution. And if it does so conflict, it is eliminated as an entirety from this case, and is neither to be treated as a compact, nor, so far as the method it prescribes is concerned, to be considered at all. It cannot be partly in and partly out of the case; in so far as it meets Virginia's notion of what it ought to be, and out, so far as it comes within her condemnation. It must either be the basis upon which the amount is to be ascertained, or entirely discarded for that purpose.

10. WITH THE ORDINANCE ELIMINATED THE ASCERTAINMENT OF WEST VIRGINIA'S PROPORTION OF THE DEBT MUST BE LEFT TO THE LEGISLATURE OF VIRGINIA.

If the ordinance is discarded, the case rests, so far as the liability is concerned, entirely upon Section 8 of Article VIII. of the West Virginia Constitution. As we have said, this article is entirely without provision as to the rule which shall govern in ascertaining the equitable proportion. One thing only is explicit in Section 8 of Article VIII., and that is the command of the legislature found in the words:

> "And the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a Sinking Fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal, within thirty-four years."

Here we have the action of the Virginia legislature consenting to and requesting, by legislative act, the admission of the state into the union under the provisions of its constitution. On the theory of the ordinance being eliminated, this is clearly a compact to the effect that the proportion of the public debt which the new state shall bear is to be ascertained by her legislature. This commits entirely to the legislature the ascertainment of the equitable proportion of the debt which the new state shall bear, and enjoins upon it the necessity of using in the discharge of that duty all practicable speed. Ex necessitate rei, this not only gives to the legislature the power, but imposes upon it the duty, of choosing the method by which the equitable proportion shall be ascertained, and its action in that respect would not be subject to judicial review. This made of it a legislative question. It left it to the sense of justice of the tribunal which the constitution selected for its ascertainment. The legislature might ascertain it through a joint committee of the two houses, or it might provide for the appointment of a commission, instructing it as to the basis upon and a method by which it should be ascertained and reported to that body. It is urged against this view that it never could have been intended that the debtor state (if it should turn out on the accounting to be a debtor state), should be left to determine the proportion which it should assume. It is a sufficient answer to this to say that it was plainly and unmistakably done. The legislature was placed in the position sustained by the legislature of a state as to the selection of the method of ascertaining and prescribing the proportion of the debt of a county or town which is divided. And in such cases the courts have held, including this Court, that the question, "what proportion of the debt of a county or a city or a town which is divided by legislative authority, shall be borne by the portion set off to make a new town, or included within the boundaries of another county, city or town" is a legislative question and not a judicial one. Commissioners of Laramie Co. v. Commissioners of Albany Co., 92 U. S. 307; Mount Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514. If the Legislature of West Virginia has failed, with or without justification, to discharge its duty imposed upon it by the constitution, what is the remedy? It has not yet been decided that any Court can mandamus a legislature to pass a law, or can restrain it in the exercise of its functions. It cannot enjoin it from passing an unconstitutional measure, albeit it may overturn the measure after it shall have been passed. Whether the Legislature of West Virginia is to be justly reproached for not having acted, is a question that will be considered later. And if the legislature had proceeded to the ascertainment of the amount of the debt—the just proportion which should be assumed by West Virginia—either by its own committees or by a commission, could the court overturn its ascertainment upon the ground that it had not adopted the proper basis or method as between population, area or assessed valuation? When the power is unqualifiedly committed by a constitutional provision to the legislature, can any court control the exercise of that discretion as to the selection of the method by which the proportion of the public debt which the new state shall assume is to be determined? When the legislature in the exercise of its power and discretion shall have ascertained what it regards as an equitable proportion of the debt, can any court overturn that determination because in its opinion the proper method was not pursued, and the result does not in its opinion constitute an equitable proportion? The plain truth seems to be that the matter—the ordinance being out of the case—was left by the legislature of Virginia and by the congress to the honor of the Legislature of West Virginia. This is nothing new in our system. Since the adoption of Article XI. of the Constitution:

> "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state."

No state can be sued, even in this court or in other Federal courts, by citizens of another state or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state. Whether suit may be brought in a state court by an individual against the state in one of her own courts depends upon her own consent, as evidenced by her own laws. So that every citizen of the United States and every subject of a foreign state who buys a bond of a state, takes it with full notice and knowledge that the payment thereof and of the interest thereon rests, in the last analysis, upon the honor of the state whose obligation it is.

11. WITH THE ORDINANCE ELIMINATED IS THE MATTER JUSTIFIABLE?

The case of County of Tulare v. County of Kings, 117 Cal. 195, throws light upon this question.

Section 3 of Article II. of the Constitution of California is as follows:

> "Every county which shall be enlarged or created from territory taken from another county or counties > shall be liable for a just proportion of the existing debts and liabilities of the county or counties from which such territory shall be taken."

The County of Kings, in the State of California, was created wholly out of Tulare County, and was fully established May 23, 1893. It was contended that on that date there were outstanding $22,000 of court house and $5,000 of road bonds, and that the plaintiff county, Tulare, between May 29, 1893, and September 18, 1895, had paid, on account of said bonds, $14,472.46; that on the assessment rolls of the two counties, as the basis of apportionment, the amount due from defendant was $4,615,22, which, with interest due, would make $5,049.61, due October 11, 1895; that this claim had been presented, etc., to the supervisors of Kings County and rejected, when action was brought against Kings County to recover the sum. A demurrer being sustained, the case was taken to the supreme court.

The contention in the supreme court was that the defendant was liable under the constitution.

The Court said:

> "The contention of plaintiff is that by the supreme law of the state it has been declared that the new county shall pay a just proportion of the debts of the old county and it is left with the courts to determine what that just proportion may be in a case presented. In other words, it is denied that the legislature has any power to apportion the indebtedness, but that this question as to how much this just proportion will amount to is purely judicial.
>
> "On the other hand, defendant contends that the sole question is whether the action will lie against defendant, the legislature having failed to provide in the act creating Kings County for the apportionment of the public property and debts of the County of Tulare."

The court held, on the strength of a prior decision, that the constitutional provision was a restriction upon the power of the legislature to divide a county, and that the power still remained with the legislature to divide counties and that where a county was divided by the legislature without any provision as to the apportionment of the debt the presumption was that the legislature thought no apportionment was required.

The Court added:

> "It would seem to me, if the courts should undertake to determine this question upon the authority of the constitution alone, they would have neither compass nor rudder by which to be guided."

The case was ruled largely by the opinion of the supreme court in Los Angeles County v. Orange County, 97 Cal. 329, of which decision the opinion says:

> "The learned justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, called attention to the established rule that where no provision is made by the legislature as to the debts of the old county they remain with the old county. He then takes up the constitutional provision in question, and says: 'The mode of determining the 'just proportion' of the debts and liabilities for which the new county shall be liable, is not prescribed in the constitution, but is left to the determination of the legislature in each particular case'; he points out that the legislature did provide a mode of ascertaining the 'just proportion' of the debts by the appointment of commissioners, and limited the liabilities to those existing at the time the act took effect, and he says: 'As the legislature could divide the public property and assets of the county in such mode as it might choose, it was competent for it to fix upon a date, which it might select, as the time for ascertaining their amount and value, as well as determining in connection therewith the 'just proportion' of the debts and liabilities to be assumed by the new county. In the present instance the legislature fixed the time when the act took effect as the proper period for ascertaining the amount of these assets and liabilities, and it cannot be held that the constitutional provision was violated in selecting that as the point of time at which to properly determine what would be a 'just proportion' of the debts and liabilities to be assumed by the new county.' The expenditures for which the claim was made were incurred in the new county prior to its organization, but after the date of the act, and the commissioners had reported these separately, with the remark, 'that as a matter of equity the amount should be refunded by Orange county to Los Angeles county.'

The opinion upon this point continues: 'The legislature may have considered that it would be necessary for the County of Los Angeles to expend the money for municipal purposes within this territory; and as it was within its discretion to determine that it should bear the burden of any of the expenditures which it might thus make, the fact that it has made no provision for its reimbursement is indicative that it was not its intention that it should be reimbursed therefor.'

"Now, this was just such a claim as counsel for plaintiff insists must be heard and determined by the judicial arm of the government, and that over it the legislature has no jurisdiction or power whatever. It seems to me the decision necessarily settles the very question here—that it is a legislative and not a judicial function. Upon plaintiff's theory it was the duty of the court to overrule the demurrer and proceed to hear and determine what the 'just proportion' of the debt of Los Angeles county was that should be borne by Orange county; but the court found no cause of action stated, because the legislature had disposed of it, and because it was a legislative function and not a judicial one. (See, also, County of Orange vs. Los Angeles County, 114 Cal. 390.)"

County of Tulare vs. County of Kings, 117 Cal. 195.

If the liability of West Virginia is to be determined under Section 8 of Article VIII. of her Constitution, without reference to the ordinance, then the grounds for holding that the legislature of West Virginia is the only tribunal which can ascertain the amount of her liability are much stronger than those upon which the California court, in the case just cited, decided that it had no jurisdiction; since the Constitution of West Virginia expressly provides that the legislature shall ascertain the equitable proportion of the debt to be assumed. The California constitution contained no provision of this character.

We recognize, of course, the fact that the power of the legislature to apportion the indebtedness of counties exists in case of division, as an incident to their power to divide such municipalities. These are public corporations, created for political purposes, and they have no contract rights to continued existence. They are subject, at all times, to legislative change. But the power which the legislature has to create them, and divide them, and, therefore, the incidental power to apportion their liabilities, while it proceeds from the power to create them, is no more direct and unlimited than the power with which the Constitution of West Virginia clothed the legislature of that state, in respect to the method of ascertainment, and otherwise, of the proportion of the public debt which would constitute an equitable share for West Virginia to pay.

The question is not whether it was wise for the Legislature of Virginia to consent to the admission of the State of West Virginia, under Section 8 of Article VIII. of her Constitution, vesting such a power in her legislature. The question is, did they do it? The ascertainment is, certainly, in its nature, a legislative function. In the exercise of its legislative powers, the legislature may provide for examination. It must, ultimately, pass upon the result. It may have done it on several bases or theories; but it must, in the end, select the basis, for it must provide for the payment.

The constitutional provision, without the ordinance as a guide as to method, seems to submit to the Court a question which is not judicial in its nature. The case in that respect, as well as others, is unique. It does not differ much, in the aspect of it which we are now considering, from the case of Taylor vs. Brewer, et als., 1 Maule & Selwin, 290, and Cummer vs. Butts, 40 Mich. 322.

In the former case plaintiff founded an action of assumpsit on an agreement by defendant that any service by plaintiff should be taken into consideration, and such remuneration be made as should be deemed right.

The court refused to set aside a non-suit.

Lord Ellenburough, C. J., said: "Here, I own, it struck me, was an engagement accepted by the bankrupt on no definite terms, but only in confidence that if his labor deserved anything he should be recompensed for it by the defendants."

Grave, J., said: "I consider the resolution to import that the committee were to judge whether any or what recompense was right."

Le Blanc, J., said: "It seems to me to be merely an engagement of honor."

Bagley, J., said: "The fair meaning of the resolution is this, that it was to be in the breast of the committee whether he was to have anything, then how much."

Cummer vs. Butts arose on a contract for the sale of lumber which stipulated that either party might cancel the contract "for good cause."

One of the parties terminated the contract, whereupon the other party, who insisted that no good cause for cancellation existed, brought suit.

Judge Graves said: "The difficulty is inherent. It exists in the terms adopted by the parties. The requirement of good cause as something on which the right to revoke by one or the other should depend, is, as here introduced, too vague to be fairly intelligible. It is manifestly applied to each party, but the phrase 'good cause' in such connection, as to parties and subject matter, has no distinct sense as to furnish a common and intelligible criterion for the parties, or any determinate sense whatever. It is impossible to say that the wills of the parties concurred and that each meant exactly what the other did, or even to say what either meant. The room for difference of opinion is immense, and the case is one where the parties have failed to express themselves in terms capable of being reduced to lawful certainly by judicial effort."

12. THIS COURT HAS DECLARED THAT THE ORDINANCE AND THE CONSTITUTION DO NOT CONFLICT AND ARE TO BE READ IN PARI MATERIA.

When this case was argued here on demurrer, counsel for defendant contended that the Court did not have jurisdiction to determine the prinicple upon which West Virginia should be made liable for any portion of the old debt of Virginia because this was a matter which the Constitution of West Virginia had referred to her legislature. Hence, it was argued, the consent of Virginia to the admission of West Virginia into the union, under the provision of that constitution, and the action by congress admitting the new state, constituted a compact between Virginia and West Virginia, which operated to commit to the legislature of the latter state the ascertainment of what would be a just and equitable proportion of the debt to be assumed, including the basis and method upon and by which it should be ascertained.

The Court in reply to this argument resorted to the ordinance which prescribes the method of ascertainment and thereby defines the proportion which should be assumed. The Court said, through the Chief Justice (206 U. S. 290, 319):

> "It is, however, further insisted that this Court cannot proceed to judgment because of an alleged compact entered into between Virginia and West Virginia, with the consent of congress, by which the question of the liability of West Virginia to Virginia was submitted to the arbitrament and award of the Legislature of West Virginia as the sole tribunal which could pass upon it. As we have seen, the Constitution of West Virginia, when admitted into the union contained the provision: 'An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, shall be assumed by this state, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquidation of the same by a sinking fund and redeem the principal within thirty-four years.' And it is said that, on May 13, 1862, the Legislature of Virginia passed an act entitled 'An act giving the consent of the Legislature of Virginia to the formation and erection of a new state within the jurisdiction of this state,' by which consent was given to the creation of the proposed new state, 'according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the constitution for the said State of West Virginia, and the schedule thereto annexed, proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the twenty-sixth day of November, 1861;' and that by the act of congress, the consent of that body was given to all those provisions which thus became a constitutional and legal compact between the two states. The act of May 13, 1862, was not made a part of the case stated in the bill, and its validity is denied by counsel for Virginia, but it is unnecessary to go into that, for when Virginia, on August 20, 1861, by ordinance provided 'for the formation of a new state out of the territory of this state,' and declared therein that 'the new state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, > 1861,' to be ascertained as provided, it is to be supposed that the new state had this in mind when it framed its own constitution, and that when that instrument provided that its legislature should 'ascertain the same as soon as practicable,' it referred to the method of ascertainment (italics not the Court's) prescribed by the Virginia convention. Reading the Virginia ordinance and the West Virginia constitutional provision in pari materia, it follows that what was meant by the expression that the 'legislature shall ascertain' was that the legislature should ascertain as soon as practicable the result of the pursuit of the method prescribed, and provide for the liquidation of the amount so ascertained."

While nothing has been settled in this case except the question of jurisdiction, it is quite difficult to conceive upon what principle Section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution can be read without reference to Section 9 of the ordinance; and there is no point in reading it in connection with Section 9 of the ordinance except that the ordinance furnishes, and nowhere else is it to be found, the intention of its framers as to the method which should be pursued in ascertaining the result which would constitute the just or equitable proportion intended to be assumed. Reading the ordinance in pari materia, with Section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution, incorporates into that provision of the constitution all of Section 9 of the ordinance relating to the method prescribed for the ascertainment of the proportion of the debt which the new state was to assume.

Exceptions to the Master's Report.

Pursuant to the interlocutory decree, there has been an accounting before the Master on the basis of the ordinance, and, alternatively, on the other bases indicated by the decree. A large number of exceptions have been filed, by both parties, to the findings of the Master. Most of these exceptions have been fully argued in Part II. of this brief. It is admitted that the amount of the public debt, on January 1, 1861, was $32,919,863.93; nor is there any dispute that this debt was incurred for works of internal improvement, as alleged in the bill, and admitted in the answer.

1. THE MASTER WAS RIGHT IN HOLDING THAT BONDS HELD BY THE SINKING FUND AND BY THE LITERARY FUND WERE NOT A PART OF THE PUBLIC DEBT OF VIRGINIA.

The only difference that arose under Paragraph II. of the decree between the complainant and defendant is whether the bonds of the commonwealth held by the Sinking Fund of $1,369,243.92, and by the Literary Fund, $1,116,843.35, with accrued interest amounting to $15,895, are part of the debt.

As to the latter, after investigation by counsel for the complainant, it was conceded that the bonds were in possession of the board of public works for sale; but have never been disposed of, and were, therefore, not a part of the public debt. As to the other two items, the master held that the bonds were the property of Virginia, and were no part of the public debt on January 1, 1861. This question is elaborately discussed by the Master in his report.

We are content to rest the question whether the bonds in the Literary Fund and the Sinking Fund were part of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, on January 1, 1861, upon the reasoning and citations of the Master, calling attention only to one or two authorities which are not cited by him.

In Board of Public Works, etc., v. Gannt, 76 Va. 465, the court said:

> "The bills are against the board of public works and the board of education. Although the persons composing those boards are made parties, in their individual character, no relief is asked against them as such, and it is obvious that as individuals they have no sort of concern or interest in the question. The acts complained of are acts of the legislature, and the relief sought is against corporations composed exclusively of officers of the state. The bill is precisely such as it would have been if the appellees were proceeding against the state.
>
> "Conceding that the fund in controversy is subject to a pledge on behalf of the public creditors, it is still the property of the state as absolutely as any of the money in her treasury, or the capitol square and public buildings.
> "It is none the less in her possession because it is > under the control of the board of education, for that board is a mere agency of the state, having no existence or power independently of the state. As was said by Judge Anderson in Clarke v. Tyler, 30 Gratt. 159: 'After money is set apart as a literary fund, the commonwealth is still the sole owner of it, as she is of all the funds and property of the board of education and the other corporations, which are composed of officers of the government, the funds and property of which are the sole property of the commonwealth.'"

It would seem to be clear that the property of Virginia could not very well be a part of the public debt of Virginia. Such bonds are not outstanding obligations of the state. When the bonds were purchased by the state, the debt was pro tanto discharged, and the bonds were then no more the obligations of the state than if they had never been negotiated.

At the foot of the opinion is the following:

> "NOTE BY JUDGE STAPLES.—'Since the foregoing opinion was delivered, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of John Elliott and als. v. The Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Auditor, and other State Officers of Louisiana, has been rendered. The reasoning in that case sustains fully the views presented in my opinion.'"

(The case to which Judge Staples refers is reported under the title of "Louisiana v. Jumel" and "Elliott v. Wiltz," 107 U. S. 711.)

2. THE MASTER WAS RIGHT IN EXCLUDING UNDER PARAGRAPH III. OF THE DECREE EXPENDITURES BY CORPORATIONS IN WHICH VIRGINIA WAS A STOCKHOLDER.

Paragraph III. of the Decree required the master to ascertain and report:

> "All expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia, since any part of the debt was contracted."

We agree with the Master that the paragraph was based upon that portion of the Wheeling Ordinance which reads:

> "The new state shall take upon itself a just pro> portion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all state expenditures within the limits thereof."

We do not agree that the discussion by the Master of the question which arose under this paragraph, as to the doctrine of "equitable construction," was at all warranted by any question which arose, or could arise, under the third paragraph, and insist that the question is one of law, which the Court did not commit to the Master. The sole question under that paragraph, committed to the Master, was to ascertain and report:

> "All expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of the debt was contracted."

(a) THE MASTER'S FINDING.

The complainant claimed that $5,639,302.66 had been expended by the state within the designated territory (Record, p. 371, c. 1, p. 1).

The amount conceded by the defendant was $1,251,288.92.

The question as to the items 2, 3, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 25, 28, 35, 55, 150, have been fully argued in another portion of the brief.

The Master allowed, to which the defendant excepted, in addition to the conceded sum, $1,560,271.06, making $2,811,559.68, rejecting claims insisted upon under this paragraph by the complainant, amounting to $2,827,742.68.

(b) THE REJECTED CLAIMS REPRESENTED EXPENDITURES BY PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.

The claims rejected represented the expenditures within the State of West Virginia, except as hereinafter stated, by private corporations created by Virginia by special act, which possessed under her general laws all the faculties of a corporation, including perpetuity, the right to have a common seal, to be managed by a board of directors, to issue stock, to the stock of which corporations Virginia had subscribed through her board of public works duly thereunto authorized by law in conjunction with solvent citizens, either two-fifths or three-fifths, as the special act provided. The Master was clearly right in excluding these as state expenditures within the Territory of West Virginia. The money paid in by the state and other stockholders to the treasury of the corporation on their respective subscriptions became the property of the corporation. For such payments the stockholders each received stock representing his interest in the company's property. The distinction between the stockholder and the corporation is too well settled to require argument. The improvements made through the expenditure of the moneys thus paid into the treasury of the corporation was its property. This property did not belong to the state, nor did it belong to the stockholders. The state in subscribing to the stock carried none of its sovereignty into that relation. It stood before the law in respect of ownership and control precisely as individuals or private stockholders stood. This has been long settled by the decisions of this Court.

(c) VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE AND COURTS RECOGNIZE THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN PRIVATE CORPORATIONS WITH STOCK AND PUBLIC CORPORATIONS WITHOUT STOCK.

The Virginia legislation recognizes the distinction between private corporations and public corporations. In several instances the legislature created public corporations composed of the governor, the attorney general, and some other official of the state, through which to construct works of public improvement. These corporations had no stock. The corporations were simply the agents of the state, each without stock; their property was the property of the state. The Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia held that such a corporation was not liable for damages caused in the construction of an improvement, or in its management.

Sayre v. The Northwestern Turnpike Road, 10 Leigh 454.

These private corporations, on the other hand, in which the state had taken stock in conjunction with others, were, in respect of suits, subject to the same laws as other private corporations throughout the state, to which the state sustained no relation whatever except as a sovereign. In the case of James River, &c., v. Early, 13 Grattan 541, cited by the Master and in Part II. of this brief, which was an action to recover for the negligence of the corporation and in which the right to sue the corporation was raised, the Supreme Court of Appeals distinguished that corporation from the public corporation involved in the Sayre case.

We do not suggest that the primary motive of the state in subscribing to the stocks of such companies to secure the construction of highways, bridges and railways, and the improvement of rivers, and works of public convenience and benefit, was to make money. She borrowed the money to pay her stock subscriptions in almost every one of these cases. In each case, the loan was authorized by the act of the legislature which created the corporation. And in each case the evidences of debt, which were certificates of stock issued by the state, contained a reference to the particular act under the authority of which the loan was made, and the Court will see in the schedule annexed to the Master's report opposite the name of each of these corporations the purpose for which the loan was created, giving the act by date, and also the number of the loan, its maturity and amount. On principles of international law, upon the division of Virginia by the separation of the territory now constituting West Virginia, and her admission into the union as a state, the public improvements, public buildings and other governmental property within West Virginia, would pass by the fact of separation to the new state; and the latter would be obliged on principles of international law, as she took the property, to bear not a part, but the whole debt which had been incurred in its creation. It would be a debt running with the land, an obligation not secured by a mortgage upon the territory of the new state and localized in that way, but a debt contracted with reference to, and for the benefit of, the territory embraced in the new state. It would be manifestly impossible for the State of Virginia by any act of her own, or any agreement between her and the proposed new state, to convey to the latter the property of the corporations in which she was a mere stockholder, for she would not have any property to convey except her stock; manifestly she could not transfer the private property of the corporation; nor could the interest of the private stockholders in the corporation be displaced by any agreement made by the commonwealth in respect to it.

No change of the government of the old state, or its territory, could change in the slightest the corporation ownership, or release it from its duties under its charter. It would be subject, perhaps, to a new master; and this was evidently Virginia's notion of it in '63. The act of February 3, 1863, passed by the restored government, Chapter 15, Appendix to the Record, page 128, provides:

> "That all property, real, personal and mixed, owned by or appertaining to this state, and being within the boundaries of the proposed State of West Virginia, when the same becomes one of the United States, shall thereupon pass to and become the property of the State of West Virginia, and without any other assignment, conveyance, transfer or delivery than is herein contained; and shall include among other things not herein specified, all lands, buildings, roads and other internal improvements, or parts thereof, situated within the said boundaries, and now vested in this state, or in the president and directors of the board of the literary fund, or the board of public works therefor, or in any person or persons, for the use of this state to the extent of the interests and estate of this state therein; and shall also include the interest of this state, or of the said president and directors, or of the said board of public works, in any parent bank or branch doing business within the said boundaries; and all stocks of any other company or corporation, the principal office or place of business whereof is located within the said boundaries standing in the name of this state or of the said president or directors, or of the said board of public works, or of any person or persons, for the use of this state."

It was admitted on the record by the defendant that the principal office or place of business of any corporation whose works were wholly within the State of West Virginia, was within the State of West Virginia, and came within the provisions of the act. Section 2, transferred unpaid and uncollected, arrearages of taxes on lands, lots, of all description, fines imposed by courts, forfeitures and penalties, &c., &c., dividends on stock owned by the state or by the board of public works or the literary fund, in any bank, bridge or other corporation, and various other items which need not be mentioned. Section 5 provided that:

> "If the appropriations and transfers of property, stocks and credits provided for by this act take effect, the State of West Virginia shall duly account for the same in the settlement hereafter to be made with this state; provided that no such property, stocks and credits shall have been obtained since the re-organization of the state government."

(e) THE TRANSFERS OF PROPERTY TOOK PLACE.

That the transfers did take effect, is apparent from the legislation of West Virginia, put in the record by the complainant, and will be found in the appendix. If by that act Virginia had transferred to West Virginia her interest in the property, and had provided simply for the transfer of the stocks or property of corporations in which her stock represented her interest, it might be thought that it was intended as a mere muniment of title; but the provision that she shall account for it hereafter in the settlement to be had between the two states gives to it conclusively a different aspect. This act is set out in Paragraph VIII. of the bill. And it is alleged in this paragraph that:

> "The property which was by the operation of this act appropriated and transferred from the State of Virginia to the State of West Virginia, and which was subsequently received and enjoyed by the State of West Virginia, consisted of a number of items, and the value of it amounted in the aggregate to several million of dollars, the exact amount your oratrix is unable at this time more definitely to ascertain and state. That of the bank stocks alone, which were transferred under the operation of this act, the State of West Virginia realized and received into her treasury from the sale thereof about $600,000; and that no part of the property so received by West Virginia had been obtained by Virginia since April, 1861."

(f) WEST VIRGINIA CANNOT EQUITABLY BE CHARGED BOTH WITH THE VALUE OF THE STATE AND WITH THE EXPENDITURES MADE BY THE CORPORATIONS.

And the Master finds that the amount due Virginia on account of the stock of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia and of the Fairmont Bank is $477,250; and he also adds $7,578, stock of the Sweet & Salt Sulphur Spring Company; $4,000, stock of the White & Salt Sulphur Spring Company; $12,000 for stock of the Fairmont & Palatine Bridge Company, making in all $500,828. No evidence was offered, upon which he could find, nor does he find, the value of the other stocks at the time of the transfer under the act of 1863 to the defendant. It is admitted that they were of no value. Before that date the property of such corporations had to a considerable extent been destroyed by the troops of Virginia acting in co-operation with the Confederate States, stocks of the bridge companies and the turnpike companies. If there had been evidence upon the part of the plaintiff that the stock other than bank stock; in other words, the stocks of the private corporations created to build bridges, turnpikes, and other works of internal improvement, whose principal place of business was in 1863 in the territory of West Virginia were worth par when transferred, he would have been obliged to find in favor of West Virginia for all the stocks at par. That it is confessed on the record that they were worthless at the time they were transferred does not change in the slightest the status or the principle. Upon this basis, it is perfectly apparent that it was the understanding of the legislature that the expenditures by these companies of their money within West Virginia could not be considered state indebtedness; otherwise, if West Virginia were obliged to pay for them as state expenditures and also to pay for the stock, the defendant would be subjected to double payment for the same thing, which, of course, never could have been intended. It is thus apparent that not only was the Master right, as a matter of law, in rejecting under Paragraph 2 expenditures by these corporations as state expenditures, but that this could not have been the understanding of Virginia, as shown by the act of 1863. And it will not escape attention that the act of 1863 in respect of all the items embraced in it, stocks and improvements, localized them, just as the ordinance localizes expenditures. The act of 1863 was based upon territorial limits. It can hardly be possible that West Virginia could equitably be held responsible for these stocks under the act of 1863 at par if they were worth par, and also be responsible for all, or a part, of the moneys which Virginia had borrowed with which to purchase them. That would be unique for want of equity:

(g) COUNSEL FOR VIRGINIA BEG THE QUESTION.

Counsel for Virginia on page 21 of their Notes of Argument say:

> "In considering the questions which are presented by the controverted items in the schedules filed under this paragraph it is important always to bear in mind the precise language of the decree which, following the terms of the Wheeling Ordinance, directs the ascertainment of:
>
> 'ALL expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of the debt was contracted.'
>
> "It is manifest that that language in explicit and comprehensive terms embraces without exception or qualification, all expenditures of whatever character or description, and on whatever account, or for whatever purpose, or in whatever manner made, which were made by the Commonwealth of Virginia in any part of the territory now constituting West Virginia, after March 19, 1823, the agreed time at which any part of the debt in question was contracted."

This is petitio principii. The question is whether an expenditure by Virginia in the purchase of stock of a corporation, which corporation is authorized to construct a work of internal improvement within the territory of what is now West Virginia, is an expenditure "made within West Virginia could not be considered state expenditures: made in West Virginia by a corporation in which Virginia is a stockholder. The learned counsel have emphasized the capital letters and italics in the wrong place. The point is not there; the capitals and the italics, both, should be transferred from the words "all expenditures" to the words "made by the Commonwealth of Virginia."

Pile, etc.

3. THE MASTER WAS WRONG IN FINDING THAT INTEREST ON THE PUBLIC DEBT OF VIRGINIA WAS PART OF THE ORDINARY EXPENSE OF THE STATE GOVERNMENT.

If the state chooses to create corporations, and invest in their capital stocks, for the making of internal improvements, and borrows the money for the purpose of paying her stock-subscriptions, while she does it upon her credit as a sovereign, the use to which she devotes the money is not a governmental use; but is a commercial use.

While the debt, as between the bondholders and the state, is the debt of a sovereign state, the property acquired is an investment. It is, in no sense, governmental. It is commercial. And to say that the interest annually accruing upon such a debt is an ordinary expense of state government, seems to be absurd. To say that it is even an ordinary expense of a state, as a sovereignty, is not maintainable.

Is it conceivable that the framers of this ordinance could ever have been induced to agree to the proposition, or have contemplated, that by its provisions they were binding the new state to pay, under the guise of ordinary expenses, nearly $4,000,000 of interest on the moneys borrowed by Virginia to invest in capital stocks of corporations, which, on the separation, she was to keep, and did keep, as well as all of the internal improvements which that stock represented?

The Master finds the ordinary expenses of the state government of Virginia, during the debt period; that is to say, from March 19, 1823, to January 1, 1861, to have been $40,274,896.70, including interest on the public debt during that period, amounting to $18,574,747.84, leaving as the sum for ordinary expenses of the state government, excluding interest, $21,700,148.86, of which he assigns to West Virginia $4,161,352.99. This ascertainment and apportionment was excepted to by the defendant. He also assigns to the defendant, $3,986,102.93, as its proportion of the interest paid on the public debt during the debt period, which he includes as a part of the ordinary expenses of the state government. To this, the defendant excepts.

(a) THE LANGUAGE OF THE ORDINANCE.

Section 9 of the Wheeling Ordinance, in which the words to be construed occur, is as follows:

> "The new state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all state expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government, since any part of said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new state during the same period."

(b) DEFENDANT'S CONTENTION.

The defendant contends that upon every principle of construction, by the plain meaning of the words "ordiary expenses of the state government," by the interpretation which results from reading section 9 of the ordinance as a whole, by the meaning which the words in question have acquired from common use in the constitutions and statutes of the different states as well as by the great preponderance of judicial interpretation in cases where these words have been construed interest on a public debt, especially where such a debt was incurred for extraordinary purposes, cannot properly be included among the ordinary expenses of a state government.

(c) INTEREST ON A STATE DEBT IS NOT AN ORDINARY EXPENSE OF GOVERNMENT BECAUSE IT IS PAYABLE ONLY DURING A LIMITED PERIOD.

The adjective "ordinary" fixes the character of the expenses of the government with which the ordinance charges West Virginia. An ordinary expense of government is one which ordinarily recurs so long as government exists. It is obvious that interest on a state debt does not belong to this category. A state debt is a temporary obligation to be discharged at an agreed time by payment. The ordinary expenses of a state government, however, never cease. So long as the government exists, expenses for its support, for the maintenance of the legislative, judiciary and executive departments, for the performance of the various duties which they owe to the people will annually recur and must be met. Even if it were proper, as we do not think it is, to describe payments upon a bonded state debt as an expense of government, is it not too clear for argument, when we find that payments upon such a bonded debt are by the terms of the contract creating the debt only to continue during a specified limited time, while ordinary expenses of the government must continue indefinitely, that the term ordinary expenses must be applied exclusively to the latter class of expenses, and cannot be deemed to include the payments on the debt which are to cease after the expiration of the time fixed by the contract?

(d) INTEREST ON THE OLD VIRGINIA DEBT WAS NOT AN ORDINARY EXPENSE OF GOVERNMENT BECAUSE THE DEBT WAS INCURRED FOR EXTRAORDINARY PURPOSES.

In considering whether interest on a state debt is one of the ordinary expenses of a state government, it is important to bear in mind the purposes for which the debt was incurred. The debt of Virginia to which the Wheeling Ordinance refers, was incurred for internal improvements. The proceeds of the Virginia bonds were either directly applied in the construction of highways, railways, bridges and similar improvements, or to the purchase of stock in corporations which applied the money in the construction of such internal improvements. These improvements were of a permanent character, and in constructing them the state was making a permanent investment. We do not understand that there is any dispute that expenditures for works of internal improvements are extraordinary and not ordinary expenditures. The Master's report (page 112) states that "the question as to what is an extraordinary expense seems to be well settled," and the cases which he cites in illustration decide that expenditures for permanent improvements are extraordinary expenditures. All the authorities on this question are in agreement. A number of state constitutions prohibit the state from expending money on works of internal improvement. This shows the impossibility of regarding such an expense as an ordinary expense of government. If the principal of some of the Virginia bonds issued for internal improvements had fallen due within the period covered by the ordinance and had been paid to the bondholders, is it not manifest that this payment for an extraordinary purpose, a payment which could be made only once, could not be deemed an ordinary expense? And if payment of the principal debt would not be an ordinary expense, on what theory can payment of the interest, which is merely incidental to the principal debt, be so regarded?

(e) THE FACT THAT THE INTEREST WAS PAYABLE AT REGULAR INTERVALS DID NOT MAKE IT AN ORDINARY EXPENSE.

The only circumstance which gives any semblance of plausibility to the claim that interest on the Virginia debt was an ordinary expense of the state government is the fact that the interest was payable at regular intervals until the principal fell due and was paid. We have already pointed out that the annual recurrence of an interest charge during a limited period does not make the interest an ordinary expense. Suppose the state had made a contract for the construction of works of internal improvement, under which payment therefor was to be made in equal semi-annual installments during a period of years. Would it be possible to claim that the payment of such installments was an ordinary expense of government?

(f) INTEREST IS NOT PROPERLY DESCRIBED AS AN EXPENSE.

Leaving out of consideration the force of the adjective "ordinary," it would still be not in accordance with the common use of language to describe the payment of interest on a funded public debt as an expense of government. The difference between expense and debt in the common use of language is well expressed by Judge Spencer in a Louisiana case as follows: "In common parlance there is, no doubt, a distinction in the meaning of the words debts and expenses. The latter is usually applied to those current temporary obligations which are met by payment as they arise, while the former designates obligations of a more enduring kind" (State ex rel. vs. State Auditor, 32 La. Ann. 89, 90).

A striking illustration of this distinction is found in the provisions of state constitutions relating to taxation and revenue. In most of the states the constitutional provisions concerning taxation and the appropriation of revenue expressly provide for the payment of the expenses of government, and also for the payment of the public debt and interest thereon. Clearly the men who framed these constitutions would not have provided separately for the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt, if they had supposed that such payment fell among the expenses of government for which they had already provided. We shall subsequently call the attention of the Court to the specific constitutional provisions to which we refer.

(g) THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN THE STATE AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE STATE.

The Wheeling Ordinance expressly discriminates between the state and the government of the state. According to the ordinance, "the new state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia." The public debt to be assumed is the debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia and not of its government: and the new state, not the government of the new state, is to take upon itself a just proportion thereof, which is to be ascertained "by charging to it all the state expenditures within the limits thereof and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government." All state expenditures within the defined area are to be charged and in addition a part of all the ordinanry expenses of the state government. It is a cardinal principle of construction that effect must be given to every word in a written instrument. In the ordinance no effect can be given to the word "government" unless it is construed as meaning something different from the word "state." If this is granted, then the conclusion follows that under the ordinance payment of the public debt of Virginia, if it is to be regarded as an "expense," is an expense of the state, and not of the government of the state, because the ordinance describes the public debt as the "debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia," that is to say, of the state. The state may have expenses which are not the expenses of the state government. If a state fails to pay interest on its bonds, its credit is affected, and it is an event to be deplored; but the government of the state must go on just the same. The distinction drawn by the ordinance between the state and the government of the state is a real and not an artificial distinction which this Court has recognized in Texas v. White, 7 Wall. 700, and in Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 290. In the former case Chief Justice Chase delivered the opinion of the Court, and in enumerating the various senses in which the word state is used said: "And there are instances in which the principal sense of the word seems to be that primary one to which we have adverted, of a people or political community, as distinguished from a government. In this latter sense the word seems to be used in the clause which provides that the United States shall guarantee to every state in the union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion. In this clause a plain distinction is made between a state and a government of a state." We think the language of the ordinance plainly shows that the words commonwealth and state are therein used in the primary sense of a people or political community as distinguished from the government. Such an interpretation is in accordance with the actual fact. Under American institutions the government of a state has no validity except as representing the people who compose the state. When a public debt is contracted it is not the government, but the people of the state who become liable for its payment. The government merely acts as the agent of the people in the transaction. In the case of this debt of Virginia this is peculiarly true. The whole debt which is the subject of this suit was incurred for internal improvements, matters in which the people were interested, from which the people might anticipate benefits in the conduct of their trade and commerce, but which have no relation to the work of government. How can the payment of such a debt or of the interest thereon be regarded as an expense of government? Suppose a private individual entrusts the conduct of his affairs to an agent, who, in the course of his employment, executes a note on behalf of his principal. Would it not be doing violence to the ordinary sense in which language is understood to include payment of the note or of interest thereon among the expenses of the agent? In the case of business corporations, the word government is not used to describe the agents who conduct the business, but the work performed by them is commonly described by the word management, and the expenses of the management of a private corporation, in the largest sense, are called operating expenses. We submit that no instance can be found in the records of private corporations where the payment of interest on bonds of such a corporation is treated as an operating expense.

(b) FINANCE PROVISIONS OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS SHOW THAT INTEREST ON A STATE DEBT IS NOT REGARDED AS AN EXPENSE OF GOVERNMENT.

The provisions of the state constitutions relating to taxation and revenue are helpful in considering the phrase "ordinary expenses of the state government." The constitutions show two things, (1) that the creation of a public debt is not an ordinary, but an extraordinary matter, and (2) that the phrases "expenses of the state" and "expenses of the state government" do not apply to the payment of interest on state bonds. Examination of the constitutions makes it plain that the founders of state government intended that ordinary expenses should be defrayed out of funds raised by taxation, that the power of creating funded debts by the issue of bonds, if granted at all, should be exercised only for the purpose of meeting extraordinary emergencies, and that such debts when created should be paid and extinguished at maturity, thus restoring the normal and ordinary condition of paying expenses as they arise by the imposition and collection of taxes. Nearly all the state constitutions carefully limit the power of the legislature to issue bonds and define the purposes for which this power may be exercised. In some states, as in Wisconsin, the constitution prohibits the state from contracting public debts except for the purpose of defraying extraordinary expenditures. Many of the constitutions also direct that the law authorizing the creation of a public debt shall provide for levying a special annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on the debt and to provide a sinking fund for the payment of the principal at maturity within a specified number of years. Furthermore, in many of the states the constitutions direct the legislatures to raise revenues sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the state or of the state government, and also sufficient sum to pay the interest on the state debt. There could not be a clearer indication that interest on the state debt was not regarded as an expense of the state government. Had it been deemed such an expense there would have been no need of requiring the legislature to raise revenue to pay interest on the state debt in addition to revenue for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the state government.

We shall now quote the specific provisions from the state constitutions to which we have made general reference. In many of these provisions the phrase used is substantially the same as that in the Wheeling Ordinance; namely, the ordinary, or the current, or the necessary, expenses of the state government, and these expenses are expressly distinguished from interest on the state debt. When we find that so many constitutions, drawn up by men who were under a peculiar obligation to use language accurately, agree in separating the ordinary expenses of the state government from interest on the state debt, the inference is compelling that this distinction is generally accepted, and that the men who framed the Wheeling Ordinance, in charging the new state with a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government, did not intend to include interest on the public debt of Virginia among these expenses.

(i) EXTRACTS FROM STATE CONSTITUTIONS.

Alabama, Constitution of 1875, Article X., Section 7, provides that the City of Mobile "may, until the 1st day of January, 1879, levy a tax not to exceed the rate of one per centum, and from and after that time a tax not to exceed three-fourths of one per centum to pay the expense of the city government, and may also until the 1st day of January, 1879, levy a tax not to exceed the rate of one per centum, and from and after that time a tax not to exceed three-fourths of one per centum to pay the existing indebtedness of said city and the interest thereon."

Alabama, Constitution of 1901, Article XI., Paragraph 216, provides that the City of Mobile "may from and after the ratification of this constitution levy a tax not to exceed the rate of three-fourths of one per centum to pay the expenses of the city government, and may also levy a tax not to exceed three-fourths of one per centum to pay the debt existing on the 6th day of December, 1875, with interest thereon, or any renewal of such debt."

Florida, Constitution of 1885 (in force at present), Article IX., Section 2: "The legislature shall provide for raising revenue sufficient to defray the expenses of the state for each fiscal year, and also a sufficient sum to pay the principal and interest of the existing indebtedness of the state."

Georgia, Constitution of 1877 (in force), Article VII., Section 1: "The powers of taxation over the whole state shall be exercised by the general assembly for the following purposes only: For the support of the state government and the public institutions. * * * * To pay the interest on the public debt. To pay the principal of the public debt."

Section 14, Paragraph 1: "The general assembly shall raise by taxation each year, in addition to the sum required to pay the public expenses and interest on the public debt, the sum of $10,000 which shall be held as a sinking fund to pay off and retire the bonds of the state which have not yet matured."

Indiana, Constitution of 1851 (in force), Article X., Section 2: "All the revenues derived from the sale of any of the public works belonging to the state, and from the net annual income thereof, and any surplus that may, at any time, remain in the treasury derived from taxation for general state purposes, after the payment of the ordinary expenses of the government, and of the interest on bonds of the state, other than bank bonds, shall be annually applied, under the direction of the general assembly, to the payment of the principal of the public debt."

The ordinance relating to the state debt which was adopted as part of the Louisiana Constitution of 1879, reduced the interest payable on certain state bonds, fixing the rate from January 1st, 1880, at 2 per cent. for five years thereafter, and provided in article 3: "Be it further ordained, that the coupons of said consolidated bonds falling due the first day of January, 1880, be and the same is hereby remitted, and any interest taxes collected to meet said coupons are hereby transferred to defray the expenses of the state government."

Michigan, Constitution of 1850 (in force), Article XIV., Section 1, provides that, "The legislature shall provide for an annual tax, sufficient with other resources, to pay the estimated expenses of the state government, the interest of the state debt, and such deficiency as may occur in the resources."

North Dakota Constitution, Article II., Section 174, provides that: "The legislative assembly shall provide for raising revenue sufficient to defray the expenses of the state for each year, not to exceed in any one year four mills on the dollar of the assessed valuation of all taxable property in the state, to be ascertained by the last assessment made for state and county purposes, and also a sufficient sum to pay the interest on the state debt."

Ohio Constitution, Article XII., Section 4, provides that: "The general assembly shall provide for raising revenues sufficient to defray the expenses of the state for each year, and also a sufficient sum to pay the interest on the state debt."

Oklahoma Constitution, Article X., Section 2, provides that: "The legislature shall provide by law for an annual tax sufficient, with other resources, to defray the estimated ordinary expenses of the state, for each fiscal year."

Section 4 provides that: "For the purpose of paying the state debt, if any, the legislature shall provide for levying a tax, annually, sufficient to pay the annual interest and principal of such debt within 25 years from the final passage of the law creating such debt."

Oregon, Constitution of 1857 (in force), Article IX., Section 2: "The legislative assembly shall provide for raising revenue sufficient to defray the expenses of the state for each fiscal year, and also a sufficient sum to pay the interest on the state debt, if there be any."

Pennsylvania, Constitution of 1838, Article XI. (added 1864), Sections 1, 2 and 3 provide for the creation of state debts. Section 4 provides for the creation of a sinking fund to pay the accruing interest and annually to reduce the principal of the state debt and then provides: "The said sinking fund may be increased from time to time by assigning to it any part of the taxes or other revenues of the state not required for the ordinary and current expenses of government."

Pennsylvania, Constitution of 1873, Article IX., Section 11, is in substance the same as Section 4 of Article XI. of the preceding Constitution referred to above, and provides that: "Said sinking fund * * * shall be increased from time to time by assigning to it any part of the taxes or other revenues of the state not required for the ordinary and current expenses of government."

South Dakota Constitution, Article XI., Section 1, provides that: "The legislature shall provide for an annual tax sufficient to defray the estimated ordinary expenses of the state for each year, not to exceed in any one year two mills on each dollar of the assessed valuation of all taxable property in the state, to be ascertained by the last assessment made for state and county purposes.

"And whenever it shall appear that such ordinary expenses shall exceed the income of the state for such year, the legislature shall provide for levying a tax for the ensuing year, sufficient, with other sources of income, to pay the deficiency of the preceding year, together with the estimated expenses of such ensuing year. And for the purpose of paying the public debt, the legislature shall provide for levying a tax annually, sufficient to pay the annual interest and the principal of such debt within ten years from the final passage of the law creating the debt, provided that the annual tax for the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt shall not exceed in any one year two mills on each dollar of the assessed valuation of all taxable property in the state as ascertained by the last assessment made for the state and county purposes."

In the case of In re Limitation of Taxation, 3 S. D., 456, the court construed Section 1 of Article XI. of the Constitution as follows: "This section relates to three different and distinct items of taxation: First, the annual tax for defraying the ordinary expenses of the state; second, taxes to pay deficiencies from preceding years; third, taxation for the purpose of paying the public debt. * * * When the purpose is to pay the public debt, the legislature shall provide for levying an annual tax sufficient to pay the annual interest and the debt within ten years. The tax, like the one for the estimated ordinary expenses, is limited to two mills on the assessed valuation of property."

Texas Constitution, Article XI., Section 6, provides that: "Counties, cities and towns are authorized, in such mode as may now or may hereafter be provided by law, to levy, assess and collect the taxes necessary to pay the interest and provide a sinking fund to satisfy any indebtedness heretofore legally made and undertaken; but all such taxes shall be assessed, and collected separately from that levied, assessed and collected for current expenses of municipal government, and shall when levied specify in the act of levying the purpose therefor, and such taxes may be paid in the coupons, bonds or other indebtedness for the payment of which such tax may have been levied."

Virginia Constitution, Article XIII., Section 188, provides that:

"No other or greater amount of tax or revenue shall at any time be levied than may be required for the necessary expenses of the government, or to pay the existing indebtedness of the state."

Section 189 fixes the rates of state taxation on property, and provides that the proceeds "shall be applied to the expenses of the government and the indebtedness of the state."

Washington Constitution, Article VII., Section 1, provides that: "The legislature shall provide by law for an annual tax sufficient, with other sources of revenue, to defray the estimated ordinary expenses of the state for each fiscal year. And for the purpose of paying the state debt, if there be any, the legislature shall provide for levying a tax annually, sufficient to pay the annual interest and principal of such debt within twenty years from the final passage of the law creating the debt."

West Virginia Constitution, Article X., Section 4, provides that: "The payment of any liability other than that for the ordinary expenses of the state, shall be distributed over a period of at least twenty years."

Section 5 provides that: "The power of taxation of the legislature shall extend to provisions for the payment of the state debt and interest thereon, the support of free schools, and the payment of the annual estimated expenses of the state."

(j) THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN ORDINARY EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT AND INTEREST ON A PUBLIC DEBT IS APPARENT IN THE CASE OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

The line of division between ordinary expenses of government and interest on a public debt is plainly marked in the case of municipal corporations. It is familiar law that a municipal corporation has no power to issue bonds without express authority from the legislature, and statutes giving such authority are strictly construed. It necessarily follows that a municipal corporation has no power to impose taxes for the purpose of paying bonds or interest thereon unless authority to issue the bonds was duly conferred. On the other hand, a municipal corporation, by virtue of its creation, has implied power to incur debts for the purpose of its existence and to raise money by taxation to pay these living expenses. In U. S. v. New Orleans, 98 U. S. 381, 393, Mr. Justice Field, speaking for this Court, said: "When such (municipal) a corporation is created, the power of taxation is vested in it as an essential attribute, for all the purposes of its existence, unless its exercise be in terms prohibited. For the accomplishment of these purposes, its authorities, however limited the corporation, must have the power to raise money and control its expenditure. In a city, even of small extent, they have to provide for the preservation of peace, good order and health, and the execution of such measures as conduce to the general good of its citizens; such as the opening and repairing of streets, the construction of side-walks, sewers and drains, the introduction of water, and the establishment of a fire and police department."

Is it not clear that the expenses, which municipal corporations have power to incur by necessary implication, are ordinary expenses of municipal governments as distinguished from those payments which are not necessary to their existence and grow out of obligations which depend for their validity on the express authorization of the legislature?

(k) THE ADJECTIVES "ORDINARY," "CURRENT" AND "NECESSARY" WHEN APPLIED TO GOVERNMENTAL EXPENSES ARE SYNONYMOUS.

The Master has pointed out that the expression considered by the courts in some cases is "ordinary expenses," while in others it is "current expenses," and in still others it is "necessary expenses." These different phrases also appear in the constitutional provisions which we have quoted. The Master rightly concludes that the courts treat the adjectives "ordinary" and "current" when applied to expenditures of a state or a municipality as synonymous (Master's Report, pages 91, 92). This Court, in considering the terms of a private trust, said: "We think the correct interpretation to the phrase 'current expenses' was given it by the Circuit Court, namely, ordinary expenses" (Taylor v. Mayo, 110 U. S. 330). The cases, furthermore, show that the expression "necessary expenses," when the context shows that regularly recurrent expenses of government are referred to, has the same meaning as "ordinary expenses" and "current expenses." We submit that all these phrases describe the expenses which are incurred in carrying on the regular work of government. Judge Lurton, in the case of City of Cleveland v. U. S., 111 Fed Rep. 341, 350, defined current expenses as follows: "Those current expenses proper for the maintenance of the city government and chargeable against current revenue." In Burch v. Earhart, 7 Ore. 58, 66, Chief Justice Kellogg gave the following definition: "Current expenses of the state mean the ordinary running liabilities incurred by the state in the administration of its offices from year to year." In Dunbar v. Board, etc., 5 Ida. 407, 412, 413, the court, referring to the ordinary expenses of a county, defined them as "Ordinary expenses such as are usual to the maintenance of a county government, the conduct of its necessary business, and the protection of its property."

(l) THE MASTER'S ARGUMENT.

The regular work of government to which the foregoing definitions refer differs according to the needs, the means and the demands of different communities. The Master's Report (page 87) states: "The defendant contends that the language should receive a construction which would make 'ordinary' synonymous with 'necessary' or 'essential' used in the sense of indispensable expenses—expenses which if not paid the wheels of government will cease to revolve, without the payment of which the state government cannot be administered." In one sense this is a correct statement of defendant's position, but not in the sense in which the Master apparently understands this statement. On page 92 of his report the Master says: "The defendant relies upon the line of cases where judgment creditors seeking to recover payments from the revenues of the municipality have been postponed to ordinary current or necessary expenses, which are made a primary charge upon revenues. The cases clearly establish the general doctrine. From some of them it might perhaps be inferred that interest was not a primary charge or an ordinary, current or necessary expense. I find none of them, however, where the specific question as to whether interest is or is not an 'ordinary expense' is concerned. It is very clear that all essential expenses are also 'ordinary expenses,' but it does not by any means follow that all 'ordinary expenses' are essential expenses, that there may not be 'ordinary expenses' which are not essential expenses. If it were true that judgment creditors were postponed only to essential or indispensable expenses, the cases might be entitled to considerable significance. On the contrary, however, the postponing of judgment creditors is not confined to essential or indispensable expenses, as expenses which do not come within that class, are often held to be primary in their character and to precede judgment creditors as a charge upon the current revenues. The following cases show that such current or ordinary expenses as light, water and fire protection, none of which are essential to the revolution of the wheels of government, have been held to be ordinary or current expenses that will be made a charge upon the revenues prior to the claims of judgment creditors, thus demonstrating that the essential character of the expenditure is not the test of an ordinary expense.' "

(m) FALLACY OF THE MASTER'S ARGUMENT.

The Master's argument in substance appears to be this: He concedes that the payment of interest on a public debt is not an "essential expense," indispensable to carrying on the government, but he argues that because judgment creditors are postponed not only to essential expenses, but also to "ordinary expenses" which are not "essential," therefore the cases relating to judgment creditors do not decide that payment of interest on a public debt is not an ordinary expense. It would be a sufficient answer to point out that in some cases the judgments which were postponed to ordinary expenses were judgments for interest on a public debt. The fallacy of the Master's argument, however, lies in his assumption that he or a court can determine what is an indispensable or essential expense of a particular government. The true rule is that this is a matter to be determined by the government, and that the determination of the government cannot be reviewed by a court in the absence of clear abuse of discretion. The requirements of a highly developed state are different from those of a newly settled state. The essential expenses of a city like New York are in number and kind very unlike those of a town in a sparsely settled western state. There is no conflict in the cases if one bears in mind this rule, that the judge of the necessity of expenses is the government itself. When this rule is borne in mind it is evident that the Master is wrong, and that there can be no ordinary expenses of government in the sense in which this phrase is used by the courts, which are not essential expenses. The rule as we have stated it has been established by the highest authorities. In City of East St. Louis v. U. S., 110 U. S. 321, Mr. Justice Matthews, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "The question, what expenditures are proper and necessary for the municipal administration is not judicial; it is confided by law to the discretion of the municipal authorities. No court has the right to control that discretion, much less to usurp and supersede it." The same rule is also recognized and approved in the following cases:

White v. Mayor, 109 Ala. 476.
Mayor v. State, 32 La. Ann. 748, 749.
State ex rel. Lorenz v. New Orleans, 116 La. 851.
Sherman v. Langham, 92 Tex. 13.
Young v. Lamb, 43 Neb. 813.
State v. Sheldon, 52 Neb. 364.
Ward v. Piper, 69 Kan. 773.

(n) BY THE GREAT PREPONDERANCE OF JUDICIAL CONSTRUCTION INTEREST ON A PUBLIC DEBT IS NOT AN ORDINARY EXPENSE OF GOVERNMENT. THE AUTHORITIES.

The cases in which the question has arisen whether ordinary or current expenses of government include interest on a public debt are few. This we are persuaded is due to the general understanding as indicated by the constitutional provisions cited above, that interest on a public debt is not one of such ordinary expenses. The cases to which we shall now call the attention of the court, however, seem to us sufficient in number and weight to be decisive on this question.

In the case of Quincy v. Jackson, 113 U. S. 332, a creditor who had recovered a judgment upon coupons for interest on bonds which the City of Quincy had issued in payment of a subscription for stock of a railroad company, had petitioned for a writ of mandamus to compel the city to levy taxes for the payment of his judgment. The city was empowered by a law passed in 1863 to levy taxes not exceeding fifty cents on each one hundred dollars ($100) of the assessed value of property "to pay the debts and meet the general expenses of said city." In 1869 the legislature passed the act authorizing the subscription for railroad stock in payment of which the city had issued the judgment creditor's bonds. The city contended that its power to tax was defined by the act of 1863, and that this power had been exhausted. The court, however, decided that the act of 1863 applied only to taxation for raising money to pay ordinary expenses, that the indebtedness arising on the bonds given for railroad subscriptions was not of this character, and the power to tax for the purpose of raising money to pay the bonds was implied in the grant of authority to issue the bonds in payment of the stock subscription. Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the Court, (page 336) said: "The act of 1863 related to debts and expenses incurred for ordinary municipal purposes and not to indebtedness arising from railroad subscriptions, the authority to make which is not implied from any general grant of municipal power, but must be expressly conferred by statute." Referring to the act of 1869, which authorized the city to subscribe for the railroad stock, Mr. Justice Harlan further said (page 337): "It could not have been contemplated that indebtedness thus created would be met by such taxation as was permitted for ordinary municipal purposes. In giving authority for such extraordinary indebtedness the legislature did not restrict its corporate authorities to the limit of the taxation provided for ordinary debts and expenses. The limitation imposed by the city's charter upon its power of taxation had reference to its ordinary municipal debts and expenses." This decision is in point. The judgment sought to be enforced was for interest on a public debt. The limited power of the city to tax for the purpose of meeting its ordinary expenses had been exhausted, and if the court had deemed interest on a public debt an ordinary expense the writ of mandamus must have been refused, but the Court held that the interest on this public debt was not an ordinary expense, and therefore, the limitation upon the city's power to tax for ordinary expenses did not apply.

In Clay County v. McAleer, 115 U. S. 616, the case arose on a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel Clay County to levy a sufficient tax to pay the petitioner's judgment. It appeared that the power of the county to levy for ordinary county revenue was limited to six mills, and by demurrer to the answer it was admitted that the maximum levy would not be sufficient to pay the ordinary current expenses of the county, and that no part thereof could be applied for the payment of the petitioner's judgment without seriously impairing the efficiency of the county government. The Court held that no levy could be ordered to pay the relator's judgment, saying (page 618): "Here the answer shows affirmatively that the whole of the six mill levy of 1882 will not be sufficient to pay the ordinary expenses of the county."

East St. Louis v. U. S., 110 U. S. 331, is to the same effect.

In Sibley v. Mobile, 3 Woods 535, 541, Judge Woods, referring to the bondholders who had recovered judgment against the city, said that they "are entitled to have all the taxing power of the city within the constitutional limit exercised, if necessary, to secure the performance of the contract made by the city with them. When that power is exercised the current expenses of the city must be paid out of the fund so raised, and out of the residue the relators are entitled to share pro rata with the other creditors of the city who have no specific lien or claim to any portion of the taxes."

Accord Mayor, etc., of New Orleans v. U. S., 49 Fed. Rep. 40.

In the case of Ward v. Piper, 69 Kan. 773, a creditor who had obtained a judgment for interest on township bonds applied for a writ of mandamus to compel the officers of Isabel Township to pay his judgment. The plaintiff asked to have the fund which had been levied and collected to meet the general current expenses of the township applied to the payment of his judgment. This was denied by the court. Johnston, C. J., delivering the opinion, said (page 775): "It is not alleged nor shown that the funds raised for current expenses are more than sufficient for that purpose. It does not even appear that the indebtedness on which the judgment was founded was for an ordinary expense of the township to which funds derived from a levy for legal expenses could be legally applied. The taxes levied for one purpose cannot be diverted and applied to another. Presumably the township officers are acting in good faith, and have levied and raised a fund which is necessary as well as sufficient to meet the ordinary current expenses of the economical administration of the township. The township organization must be maintained, and its current expenses met, although creditors of the township must wait for the payment of their bonds and judgments."

In State ex rel. Watkins v. Macon County Court, 68 Mo. 29, a creditor who had recovered judgment on bonds which the county had issued in payment of its subscription for stock in a railroad company, applied for a writ of mandamus to compel the county to pay his judgment out of its general fund. It appeared that the statute which authorized the county to issue bonds in payment of the subscription provided for a tax not to exceed one-twentieth of one per cent. upon the assessed value of the taxable property in the county for the purpose of paying the interest on the bonds, but this special tax was insufficient to pay relator's judgment. The case arose on demurrer to the return which alleged that all of the general fund was needed to pay the current and necessary expenses of conducting the county government. The court refused to grant the writ of mandamus. Judge Norton, in the opinion of the court, which he delivered, said (page 42): "What, then, are the purposes for which the general expenditure or common fund of a county is raised? A proper answer to this question can only be returned by the law which authorizes a levy of taxes to produce it. That law is to be found in Wagner's Statutes, section 165, page 1193, and is as follows: 'The several county courts are empowered to levy such sums as may be annually necessary to defray the expenses of their respective counties, by a tax upon all property and licenses made taxable by law for state purposes, * * * but the county tax shall in no case exceed one-half of one per cent.' The revenue derived from the tax thus authorized to be annually imposed, is in the very terms of the law declared to be to defray the expenses of the county, which we understand to mean the ordinary current expenses incurred in conducting the county government, such as the payment of grand and petit jurors, witnesses summoned before the grand jury, costs of criminal prosecutions, expenses in supporting the poor and insane of the county, salaries of officers, assessing and collecting the revenue, &c.

"That an extraordinary indebtedness incurred by a county in subscribing stock to a railroad corporation and in issuing bonds in payment was never intended by the general assembly to be embraced in the words 'expenses of the county,' or that they contemplated the creation of any debt for county purposes is manifest from section 166, which makes it the duty of the county court, after the assessor's book has been adjusted and returned, 'to ascertain the sum necessary to be raised for county purposes, and fix the rate of taxes so as to raise the required sum.' If section 165, supra, was intended to authorize the creation of debts or provide for their payment, the general assembly would, doubtless, have so expressed themselves as they did in sections 1 and 7, page 1158, of the same law in providing for the levy of state taxes. Section 1 provides that 'for the support of the government of the state, the payment of the state debt, * * * taxes shall be levied on all property, real and personal,' * * * and section 7 provides that there shall annually be levied, assessed and collected on the assessed value of all the real and personal property subject to taxation in the state, one-fifth of one per cent. for state revenue, and one-fourth of one per cent. for the payment of all state indebtedness. The state revenue thus provided is in express terms for the support of the state goverment, and the county revenue provided for in section 165 is for the payment of the expenses of the county government.

> "That such an extraordinary indebtedness as is incurred by a county in issuing bonds in payment of a railroad subscription was not intended to be embraced in the terms 'expenses of the county,' is apparent when it is considered that the very same words used by the general assembly in section 165 are to be found in section 20, Revised Statutes 1825, page 671, except in the latter act, the tax authorized was limited to 50 per cent. of the amount of state tax. The same section was continued in the Revised Code of 1835, except that the amount of tax was in no case to exceed the amount of the state tax. It is also to be found in the Code of 1845, and that of 1855, the only difference being that in the former the rate of taxation was not to exceed 34 cents, and in the latter not to exceed 40 cents on a valuation of $100. It is clear that the general assembly in 1825 and in 1835, when they authorized the county courts to levy such tax from time to time as should be necessary for defraying county expenses, could have had no reference to such indebtedness as arises from a county bond issued in discharge of a subscription to the stock of a railroad corporation, because, at that time, there was no law to be found on our statute books authorizing such subscriptions or the issuance of any such obligations."

Accord State ex rel. Hudson v. Trammel, 11 S. W. Rep. 747, Missouri.

City of Denison v. Foster, 37 S. W. Rep. 167, Texas.

Cromarty v. Commissioners, 85 N. C. 211, 87 N. C. 134.

In the foregoing cases creditors who had recovered judgments on claims for interest on municipal bonds were not allowed to take funds raised for the payment of the ordinary expenses of the municipalities when the funds were needed for this purpose. The decisions conclusively establish that interest on a public debt is not an ordinary expense of government; if it had been, the courts would have been bound to hold that funds devoted to the payment of ordinary expenses should be applied to the payment of such interest, but they held instead that the claims for interest must wait for payment until the ordinary expenses had been paid. The Master's report (page 108) protests that the cases of the judgment creditors are not directly in point, because the present case is not a controversy between a judgment creditor and a municipality; but surely the principle which governed the decisions by which the payment of judgments for interest on a public debt were postponed to the payment of ordinary expenses, is the same principle which must govern in the controversy between Virginia and West Virginia. The question here is the same as the question in these cases, namely, whether interest on a public debt is an ordinary expense of government. The cases cited above decided that it was not.

In White v. Mayor, 119 Ala. 476, the case arose on an application by the holder of a judgment based on coupons for interest on bonds of the town of Decatur for a writ of mandamus to compel the town to pay this judgment out of its general revenue. The court held that the petitioner was entitled to mandamus, applicable, however, only to the surplus of the town's revenues over its current expenses. McClellan, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said, page 480: "It is thoroughly well settled law that where the interest and principal of a municipal bonded debt is payable out of the general revenue of the town, no part of such revenue that is necessary to meet current legitimate municipal expenses can be subjected to the payment thereof, but only to the surplus of income after the governmental expenditures have been met or provided for can by any process of law be applied to such debt. Dill v. Mun. Corp., Secs. 100, 101; Underhill v. Calhoun, 63 Ala. 216; Williamsport v. Com., 190 Pa. St. 498; East St. Louis v. U. S., 110 U. S. 321; Com. v. Commission, 1 Wharton 1. Nor can it make any difference that the bonded debt is specially charged upon the general revenues or that the corporate authorities are specially required to set apart a sufficiency of such revenues to meet such debt. * * * * with or in the absence of such provisions, it is within the power of and is the duty of municipal corporations * * * * to apply the whole revenues to current municipal expenses, leaving nothing to go in payment of bonded debts, nor can the courts determine what municipal expenditures are necessary. If a given expenditure is within charter authorization, and therefore abstractly considered a legitimate municipal charge, the courts cannot pass upon the advisability or wisdom of its being made or incurred."

In the case of Anniston v. Hunt, 140 Ala. 394, the charter of the City of Anniston required the city council before July 1st in each year to agree upon a budget of expenses for governmental purposes for the year ending on the 30th of the following June. In making up the budget for the year ending June 30th, 1903, the council had included among the expenses for government purposes an item of $7,600 for interest on bonds of the city. A judgment creditor of the city applied for a writ of mandmus commanding the mayor and councilmen to pay his judgment out of the surplus revenue of the city for the year ending June 30th, 1903, and restraining them from paying the interest on the bonds which had been included in the budget among the government expenses. If the revenues were not applied to the payment of this interest there would be a surplus to pay the petitioner's judgment. The writ of mandamus was granted and the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the court below. In delivering the opinion of the court, Haralson, J., said (p. 400): "We have found neither in the charter nor in any other statute any legislative authority to make the interest income on municipal bonds and accounts an item of expenditure for the administration of government purposes. The council, therefore, had no right to estimate this interest as a government expense and by way of anticipation in their budget of expenses to appropriate the amount to the payment of interest on municipal bonds and accounts so as to defeat the plaintiff or other creditors in their efforts to subject this excess over necessary current expenditures to the satisfaction of their demands."

In Leavitt v. Town of Somerville, 75 Atlantic Rep. 54 (Maine, 1909), the question was whether certain bonds of the town were valid under the constitutional provision limiting the debt which the town could incur. The bonds in question, which exceeded in amount the limit of indebtedness, purported to refund a debt existing at the time when the constitutional limitation took effect. The amount of the bonds was larger than the original debt, but if the excess represented accumulated interest the bonds would be valid. The court, however, declared this fact had not been proved, saying (page 57): "There is no legitimate inference that the town officers paid current expenses any more than that they paid the interest on the town debt."

In Dexter v. County Commissioners, 20 Weekly Law Bulletin 364 (Hamilton County, Ohio, Common Pleas), it was held that the estimated levy which the statutes required the auditor to present to the county commissioners on or before the first Monday in April of each year, was intended to cover current expenses as distinguished from the payment of the bond liabilities of the county, and that the acts creating sinking funds for future payments of outstanding bonds did not contemplate the payment of debts and the accumulation of moneys for that purpose as among the current monthly or annual expenses of the county.

In the case of University R. R. Co. v. Holden, 63 N. C. 410, the Supreme Court of North Carolina had occasion to construe a provision of the recently adopted Constitution of 1868. This provision contained in Article 5, section 1 of the Constitution, is as follows:

> "The general assembly shall levy a capitation tax on every male inhabitant—which shall be equal, on each, to the tax on property valued at $300 in cash. * * * And the state and county capitation tax combined shall never exceed $2.00 on the head."

The question was whether this provision, requiring what the court called an equation of taxation between the property tax and the capitation tax, applied to all taxes, or whether it was limited. The court gave the question most careful consideration, deeming it so important that each of the judges delivered a separate opinion. The conclusion of the judges was that the equation of taxation established by the provision which we have quoted did not apply to all taxes, but only to taxes imposed for the ordinary expenses of government, and the judges expressly declared that the equation of taxation did not apply to taxes imposed for the purpose of raising money to pay interest on a public debt.

Pearson, C. J., said (page 414):

> "I agree that if under this equation, carried to its limits, the amount is not enough to meet current expenses, and also to pay the interest on the public debt, then for the excess needed it is not only within the power, but it is the duty of the general assembly to disregard the equation."

Reade, J., said (page 418):

> "My construction of the tax power of the legislature under the constitution is as follows: (1) The first object of the convention in the fifth article of the constitution was to provide for the ordinary and current expenses of the government; that is done in sections 1, 2 and 3. And for that purpose the tax is limited to $2 on the poll, and the same amount on $300 worth of property, and the equation must be observed. This was thought to be sufficient for the ordinary and economical administration of the government. (2) We had a considerable public debt, and after providing for current expenses, the next consideration was, how is the public debt to be met? And the fourth section provides, that a special tax shall be laid for that."

Dick, J., said (page 432):

> "The object of the convention in article 5, section 1, was to provide a system of general taxation for the ordinary expenses of the government. * * * Sections 1, 2 and 3 establish a general revenue system for the state; and sections 4 and 5 provide special taxes for the state indebtedness, unexpected exigencies and for the completion of unfinished railroads."

Speaking in reference to Section 5, Article 5, of the Constitution, which authorizes the state to issue bonds for extraordinary purposes, Judge Dick said (page 433):

> "The convention evidently contemplated the necessity of incurring new debts outside of the ordinary expenses of the government."

Settle, J., said (page 436):

> "I conclude that the equation of taxation applies only to the ordinary expenses of the state government. It does not apply to the public debt."

The opinion of the judges in University R. R. Co. v. Holden, that the equation of taxation prescribed in Section 1, Article 5, of the North Carolina Constitution, applies only to taxes imposed for the payment of the ordinary expenses of government and does not apply to taxes imposed for payment of interest on a public debt, was affirmed after very careful consideration of the whole subject and a review of all the authorities in the recent case of Southern Ry. Co. v. Board of Commissioners of Mecklenberg County, 148 N. C. 220.

The case of Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. U. S., 99 U. S. 402, though it relates to a private corporation, is, we submit, in point, because it decides that interest on a funded debt is not an ordinary expense. The question in the case was whether the Union Pacific Company was liable to account to the government for five per cent. of its net earnings under the sixth section of its charter, and the Court had to determine what was meant by the expression, "the net earnings of the road." Mr. Justice Bradley, who delivered the opinion of the Court, said:

> "As a general proposition, net earnings are the excess of the gross earnings over the expenditures defrayed in producing them, aside from, and exclusive of, the expenditure of capital laid out in constructing and equipping the works themselves. It may often be difficult to draw a precise line between expenditures for construction and the ordinary expenses incident to operating and maintaining the road and works of a railroad company. Theoretically, the expenses chargeable to earnings include the general expenses of keeping > up the organization of the company, and all expenses incurred in operating the works and keeping them in good condition and repair; whilst expenses chargeable to capital include those which are incurred in the original construction of the works, and in the subsequent enlargement and improvement thereof. * * * All payments of interest on the bonded indebtedness of the company should be charged to capital interest account, and not to current expenditures. Though payable out of earnings before any dividend can be made to stockholders, they cannot be deducted for the purpose of ascertaining the 'net earnings' of the road, as that term is to be understood in the sixth section of the act. The bonded debt incurred for the purpose of construction and equipment is but another form of capital, analogous to preferred stock; and the interest accruing thereon is in the nature of a dividend on such capital. It has nothing to do with and cannot affect the amount of the net earnings of the road."

(o) LEGISLATION OF VIRGINIA DURING THE PERIOD COVERED BY THE ORDINANCE DID NOT DEAL WITH INTEREST ON THE PUBLIC DEBT AS AN ORDINARY EXPENSE OF GOVERNMENT.

The legislature of Virginia, in its appropriations, from 1823, did not deal with the interest on the internal improvement debt as one of the items constituting the ordinary expenses of the state government. The fiscal year of the state began on the first day of October of each year. The annual appropriation bill constituted a general fund of the taxes and arrears of taxes due on the first day of October, last preceding, not otherwise appropriated, and all other branches of revenue not appropriated by law, which shall come into the public treasury prior to the succeeding October and the surplus of all appropriations theretofore made, shall constitute a general fund, and be appropriated in specific sums, as follows, to-wit:

To the expense of the general assembly; to the salaries and allowances of the officers of the civil government; to the commissioners of the revenue, for examining commissioners' books; to defray criminal charges, including the expense of guarding jails; for pensions, civil contingent fund, militia establishment, including the services of clerks of courts-martial, of adjutants, provost marshals, and expenses, and for the purchase of drums, fifes, and to pay for instruments where the fines of the regiment are insufficient, pay of the adjutant and inspectors; internal charges of the penitentiary, house and officers' salaries and the transportation of criminals to the penitentiary, such balance of former appropriations to complete penitentiaries; public guard in the city of Richmond; slaves executed or transported; expense of representation to congress and state senate; public warehouses, including the pay of superintendents, civil prosecutions, including clerks and sheriffs' fees; services of guard at Lexington arsenal; for the collection and transportation of arms; to constitute the balance of military contingent fund, including claims for services during the last war; transportation of public arms; defray expense of publishing the map of Virginia; complete erection of Western Lunatic Hospital; support of lunatic hospital at Williamsburg; transportation and expenses of lunatics confined in jail, etc.—all ordinary expenses of the state government.

In addition, the legislature made specific appropriation to pay the interest on $319,000 of the seven per cent. debt, and on two certificates of six per cent. debt held by the literary fund, $23,773. This appeared to be the general debt outstanding. These bonds, held by the literary fund, were owned by the state; and this was simply the measure of annual appropriation to that fund, for purposes of convenience, such as has been frequently resorted to by other states.

The second section provides that so much of the public revenues, and of other public moneys not otherwise appropriated by law as may be received into the treasury after the thirtieth day of September, next, and the surplus of all other appropriations heretofore made, shall constitute a general fund to defray such expenses authorized by law as are not therein specifically provided for; and to defray the current and other expenses of the commonwealth in the fiscal year commencing on the first day of October, next, and terminating on the 30th day of September, 1828 (this was the act of 1827); and the auditor of public accounts is authorized and required to issue his warrants in the same manner as if the funds had been specifically mentioned, with such exceptions, etc. This was the act passed March 8, 1827; and those which had preceded it, from 1822, did not differ.

As early as 1840, in none of these appropriation bills was interest appropriated for the payment of bonds issued for internal improvements.

As early as 1840 the annual appropriation bill changed in respect of the provision as to interest. It created, as did its predecessors, a general fund constituted of the taxes and arrears of taxes due to the preceding October, and not otherwise appropriated, and all other branches of revenue not appropriated by law which should come into the treasury prior to the succeeding October, and the surplus of all other appropriations.

Out of this fund were appropriated expenses of the general assembly, officers of the civil government, commissioners and clerks, criminal charges, and items similar to those mentioned in the act of 1827.

And it provided expressly and specifically for interest on the public debt as follows:

To pay the interest on certain certificates of public debt, to-wit:

For one year on seven per cent. debt, due literary fund, $22,330;

Half year's interest on same, unpaid on October 1st last and chargeable on present fiscal year, $11,165;

(This did not default the state, for she had the bonds on which she had omitted to pay interest to the literary fund.)

One year's interest on 6 per cent. debt, held by literary fund, $1,442.35;

One year's interest on $250,000 of 5 per cent. stock subscribed to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company guaranteed by the act of February 18, 1833, $12,500;

One year's interest on $398,700, certificates issued for money borrowed to pay commonwealth's subscription to the stock of the Exchange Bank, $19,922;

Ten months' interest on $62,825, additional sum borrowed to pay commonwealth's subscription to stock of Exchange Bank, $3,143.23;

One year's interest on $80,592, certificates issued for money borrowed to pay commonwealth's subscription to stock of the Northwestern Bank, $5,315.52; and then, after appropriating for contingent expenses of courts, pensions, civil contingent fund, militia, public guards, slaves transported, representation to congress and the state senate, warehouses, civil prosecutions, arms, military contingent fund, removal of lunatics in jails, vaccine agents, roads, military school, electors, clerks of committees, sweepers of the capitol, principal engineer, etc., etc.

Section 3 provides that so much of the public revenue and all other moneys not otherwise appropriated by law as may be received into the public treasury, after the 30th day of September, next, and the surplus of all other appropriations heretofore made, shall constitute a general fund to defray expenses authorized by law which are not herein particularly provided for, and to defray the current and other expenses of the commonwealth in the fiscal year which will commence on the first day of October, next, and terminate on the 30th day of September, 1842; and the auditor of public accounts is hereby authorized and required to issue his warrants in the same manner as if the sums had been specifically mentioned, subject to such conditions, exceptions, and limitations, as the general assembly may prescribe by law.

Then comes an additional section, which was continued in each appropriation act until after the establishment of the sinking fund for the payment of interest and principal on the public debt, provided for by the constitution of 1850. It will be remembered that the stock for which the commonwealth subscribed, and the dividends thereon, were, in each instance, pledged, primarily, together with the improvement fund, not otherwise appropriated. It enacted, further, that if the revenue of the fund for internal improvement shall, at any time, be insufficient to meet the payments of the interest charge on such fund as it shall become due upon loans obtained for purposes of internal improvement, under existing or future acts, of the general assembly, such interest shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the auditor of public accounts is hereby authorized and required, upon the receipt of the order or orders of the board of public works, certifying the fact of such insufficiency in the funds of said board, to issue his warrant or warrants in their favor for the necessary sum or sums which shall be deposited in the treasury to the credit of the fund for internal improvement, to be applied by the said board on the warrants of the second auditor towards the payment of such interest.

Here, it will be noticed, interest on the internal improvement loans, perhaps as a reason why specific appropriations were not made in any year to pay the interest on internal improvement loans, is that by law the primary security for such loans was the stocks and dividends derived from the stocks, and the internal improvement fund, which, if taken together, were inadequate, were supplemented by the pledge of the commonwealth to raise the money otherwise necessary to pay the interest and the principal as it matured. By this provision, it is seen that the interest on the internal improvement fund, where the special security proved inadequate, was to be paid out of money deposited to the credit of the internal improvement fund; not, by the act, otherwise appropriated. In other words, the payment of interest on internal improvement loans was deferred to all appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the government, whether specifically made, or generally appropriated, by Section 3 above quoted. And that provision was the last section of every appropriation act from 1840 to the time the sinking fund was established. Twenty million dollars of this debt was incurred between 1850 and 1861, after the sinking fund for the payment of interest and principal had been created.

(p) THE CREATION OF A SINKING FUND FOR THE PAYMENT OF INTEREST ON THE VIRGINIA DEBT SHOWS IT WAS NOT AN ORDINARY EXPENSE OF THE STATE GOVERNMENT.

The very fact of the creation of a sinking fund for the payment of interest on the public debt differentiates it from ordinary expenses of the state government.

Whoever heard of the payment of the ordinary expenses of a state government out of a sinking fund?

Section 29 of Article IV. of the Constitution of 1850, sets apart annually, from the accruing revenues, a sum equal to seven per centum of the state debt, as existing on the first day of January, 1862, to be called "The Sinking Fund," and applied to the payment of the interest on the state debt and the principal or such part as may be redeemable. If no part be redeemable, then the sum so remaining shall be invested in the bonds or certificates of debt of this commonwealth, or of the United States, or of some of the states of this Union, and applied to the payment of the state debt as it shall become redeemable. And it made subject to this provision all debts contracted by the commonwealth thereafter.

It added this provision:

> "The general assembly shall not otherwise appropriate any part of the sinking fund or its accruing interest, except in time of war, insurrection or invasion."

If there were a deficiency in the treasury, because of an underestimate of the revenue, or of the expenses of the government, resort could not be had, for its payment, to the sinking fund. That one fund could be resorted to only for a purpose other than that for which it was created and set apart, in case of war, insurrection or invasion.

The creation of a sinking fund, which is so common in all the constitutions, and has been for a great many years in most constitutions, marks, in an illuminating way, the distinction between the ordinary expenses of a state government and the interest to accrue upon the public debt.

The ordinary annual expenses of the state government are estimated for. They change. Some times they exceed the estimate; and there is a deficit, although, by the Federal government, that has been prohibited by law, as has been done by the constitutions of some of the states. It is true that ordinary expenses are estimated for by county governments and other municipalities, even towns and villages. Speaking in respect of governments, sometimes additional offices are created; some times departments or bureaus, which have long existed, have, in legislative judgment, become unnecessary, and they are disposed of, and their duties transferred to some other department, or altogether pretermitted. But who ever heard of estimating the interest on the public debt? That does not fluctuate. It may be enlarged by the increase of debt, or diminished by payment of debt; but it is always susceptible of accurate ascertainment. It is fixed. In corporate management, it is characterized as a "fixed charge," as contradistinguished from ordinary expenses.

The ordinary expenses of the government, changing from time to time, must continue as long as the government lasts. The interest on the public debt continues as long as the debt lasts.

The philological distinction as to the difference between the expenses of the government—ordinary, essential and necessary—confuses; but does not enlighten. They come to the same thing in the end.

(q) THE WORDS OF THE ORDINANCE SHOULD BE CONSTRUED IN THE LIGHT OF THE SURROUNDING CIRCUMSTANCES.

This Court, said, in Sand Filtration Corporation v. Cowardin, 213 U. S., page 364:

> "The object of construction is to effectuate the intention of the parties in making a given contract. When the contract is in writing the language used should be interpreted in the light of the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time the contract was made."

This is a succinct and clear definition. It must be remembered, in reading the ordinance, that, at the time it was drafted and adopted, the debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia was about $33,000,000, the proceeds of which she had either expended directly for internal improvements or had invested in bank stocks, the stocks of railway companies, navigation companies, turnpike companies and bridge companies. The improvements constructed by the use of this borrowed money were almost all within the present limits of Virginia, and this was well known to the men who drafted and adopted this ordinance. These stocks were thought by Virginia to be of value, for, in her constitution of 1850, section 30, article IV., it was provided:

> "The general assembly may, from time to time, direct a sale of the stocks held by the commonwealth in internal improvement and other companies, and the proceeds of such sale, if made before the payment of the public debt, shall constitute a part of the sinking fund, and be applied in like manner."

Can it be supposed that the men who framed and adopted this ordinance would have been willing to stipulate that the proposed new state should take upon herself the payment not only of a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government, but a proportion of the $18,000,000 of interest upon the moneys borrowed by the Commonwealth of Virginia from 1823 to 1861, and invested in $30,000,000 of stocks, bank and otherwise, incorporations whose improvements lay almost entirely within her limits, would remain within her limits, and which investments she was to keep? It is inconceivable.

To say that when she incurred this indebtedness, which is the sum of a great number of special loans, each with a special security, and invested the same in stocks, she did not expect them to be valuable and revenue-producing, not simply during the duration of the debt, but long after the debt should have been paid, would be to impeach her honor in the earlier, if not better days, of her existence, for she held out these stocks and dividends as the primary security of the money she borrowed, with which to repay it.

She became a great battlefield and the camping ground of contending armies; and if the ravages of war destroyed, in large measure, these improvements, and disappointed the expectation with which she had invested her money, it cannot be said that that unfortunate result is, in any wise, imputable to West Virginia, or her people.

It is not a complicated question. The words "ordinary expenses of the state government" are words of common use, and they are without technical signification. It seems to us impossible to misunderstand them.

The ruling of the Master seems to have been unconsciously, and with perfect good faith, based somewhat upon what seemed to him to be the equitable construction which he advocates in his report. If the words "ordinary expenses of the state government," as a matter of law, include interest on the public debt, he is right. If they do not, whatever may be the result of their exclusion from the computation, he is wrong, for it is a question of law. Whatever it means, as here used, it means wherever it is used.

(r) THE PROPORTION OF ORDINARY EXPENSES WITH WHICH WEST VIRGINIA IS TO BE CHARGED SHOULD BE ASCERTAINED UPON THE BASIS OF TAXABLE VALUES.

Whichever view this Court may adopt as to the meaning of the phrase, "A just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government," the question confronts it, upon what basis or standard are these expenses to be apportioned?

First: On the basis of area; or

Second: Upon the basis of population, and if so, shall slaves be included or excluded? or

Third: Shall it be upon the basis of population of 1823 of Virginia, as shown by the census of the United States, the average population to be taken as required by the decree; or shall it consist of five averages of ten-year periods combined, as taken by the Master; or Fourth: Shall it be upon the basis of the assessed valuation of the real and personal property of Virginia and West Virginia?

Fifth: If so, shall it be based upon the valuation of January 1st, 1861, or June 23rd, 1863?

The joint schedules returned by the Master furnish a basis in accordance with the several alternatives.

We feel constrained to the opinion that the true basis is taxable values, or the average revenues for a period prior to the 1st of January, 1861. We formerly inclined to the opinion that population was the best basis. We see no reason, however, for the adoption of a basis upon which the ordinary expenses are to be apportioned which differs from the international law basis of general indebtedness, which we have somewhat discussed. A peculiar complication arises here with reference to the ascertainment upon the basis of population; and that is, the large number of slaves within the limits of Virginia and the relatively small number within that portion of Virginia which now constitutes West Virginia. Those slaves were property, albeit, as we have shown, they constituted a property upon which was levied a tax entirely disproportionate to their market value. They were the subjects of barter and sale the same as any other private property in the commonwealth was subject to it. They were taken care of by their masters. They were, of course, not given the privileges of white children in respect of common education. They did not enter into the basis of representation; and, therefore, neither paid taxes, nor contributed to the school fund, nor derived benefit from it. Even in the emancipation of slaves by the constitution, and free negroes, section 19 of article "IV." of the Constitution of 1859 provided that:

> "Slaves hereafter emancipated shall forfeit their freedom by remaining in the commonwealth more than twelve months after they become actually free, and shall be reduced to slavery under such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

Section 20:

"The general assembly may impose such restrictions and conditions as they shall deem proper on the power of slave owners to emancipate their slaves; and may pass laws for the relief of the commonwealth from the free negro population, by removal or otherwise."

Section 21:

"The general assembly shall not emancipate any slave, or the descendant of any slave, either before or after the birth of such descendant."

Section 22:

"Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth, and all property other than slaves shall be taxed in proportion to its value, which shall be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by law."

Section 23:

"Every slave who has attained the age of twelve years shall be assessed with a tax equal to and not exceeding that assessed on land of the value of three hundred dollars. Slaves under that age shall not be subject to taxation; and other taxable property may be exempted from taxation by vote of a majority of the whole number of members elected to each house of the general assembly."

Section 24:

"A capitation tax, equal to the tax assessed on land of the value of two hundred dollars, shall be levied on every white male inhabitant who has attained the age of twenty-one years; and one equal moiety of the capitation tax upon white persons shall be applied to the purposes of education in primary and free schools; but nothing herein contained shall prevent exemptions of taxable polls in cases of bodily infirmity."

It seems quite impossible that slaves should be included in the population. The taxes upon them were assessed to their owners. It seems impossible that in such a situation slaves should be considered as part of the population for any purpose. Their value, as property, would, of course, enter into any calculation based upon the taxable values, or assessed value, of the separate portions of the state. And as we have already shown to the Court, the population as a basis of apportionment of debt between nations, is rejected. It has also appeared that area, or territory, is rejected as a basis for the apportionment of state debts. Capitation taxes were levied by Virginia under the constitution of 1850. During the whole period from 1823, the revenues of the state, aside from those which went into the internal improvement fund, were derived from the taxation of lands, inheritance, taxes on incomes, salaries and licenses, and almost every imaginable excise tax, including the taxation of land and personal property, as well as watches, clocks, plate, carriages and the like, and interest on the state's own securities, and excises of every imaginable description. The basis upon which the moneys were collected for the payment of ordinary expenses during these years would seem to be the basis upon which they should be apportioned between the two states.

West Virginia is not Bound to Pay Interest from January 1, 1861, on the Proportion of the Old Virginia Debt Assumed by Her.

1. NEITHER BY THE ORDINANCE NOR BY HER CONSTITUTION DID WEST VIRGINIA IN PRAESENTI ASSUME ANY PORTION OF THE PUBLIC DEBT OF VIRGINIA.

By the ordinance West Virginia was to take upon herself a "just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, to be ascertained," etc. We may here inquire what is meant by the words "to be ascertained"? There can be but one answer to this question, and that is, the just proportion of the public debt of the Comonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, which West Virginia was to take upon herself. How was this just proportion to be ascertained? First, by charging to it all state expenditures within the limits thereof; second, a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government since any part of the said debt was contracted; and, third, deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new state during the same period.

The ordinance did not become a compact between the two States of Virginia and West Virginia, nor did section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution become a compact between the two states at the time of their adoption, for there was then but one state and that was the Commonwealth of Virginia. When she consented and the congress of the United States admitted West Virginia into the union, there was an agreement between two states, and for the first time efficacy was given to section 9 of the ordinance and section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution. Before that they rested entirely in proposition.

When they became effective, they became effective as a compact between two states, one older than the other, but of no greater dignity or sovereignty; for West Virginia was admitted into the union, as all states must be admitted, on terms of equality with the original states. It is not conceivable that any state shall be dissimilar or unequal in dignity and sovereignty to the other states. If section 8 of article VIII. is to be read in connection with the ordinance, then the compact created the assumption, which was in futuro, and left yet to be ascertained, as we have argued, what was the just proportion of the debt which West Virginia agreed to assume or, what is precisely legally equivalent, to take upon herself? It was an unliquidated account. She did not assume the payment of any of the bonds or obligations of Virginia outstanding prior to January 1, 1861. The amount that she was to assume was, if the ordinance was in effect for any purpose, the amount ascertained by the methods prescribed by the ordinance. If it is not in effect, then the method is left to the legislature to choose and to execute.

The word "thereof" in section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution of West Virginia does not bear the construction for which counsel for Virginia contend, nor does the rule of law established in Virginia prior to 1863, that in private contracts "interest follows the principal as the shadow does the substance" apply to this case. The decisions which laid down that rule were all with reference to interest between individuals on private obligations.

2. THE VIRGINIA RULE AS TO PRIVATE CONTRACTS THAT INTEREST FOLLOWS THE PRINCIPLE DOES NOT APPLY TO CONTRACTS BETWEEN STATES.

But for the dignity and character of the eminent gentlemen who urge it, it is difficult to regard as serious the proposition that because among private parties in Virginia prior to the admission of West Virginia as a state "the interest follows the principal as the shadow does the substance" or, differently stated, because interest is an incident to the debt, or is favored both by the legislative and judicial bodies of the state, and because the laws of the old state, until changed, were adopted in the new as to private parties, that, therefore, by the contract between the sovereign State of Virginia and the sovereign State of West Virginia, a case for which the law of neither state made provision, West Virginia would be liable to pay all the unpaid interest on her proportion, when ascertained, of the debt existing January 1, 1861. No such intention can be imputed to the framers of the ordinance, nor the convention which adopted the Constitution of West Virginia.

The learned counsel appear to be conscious of the inapplicability of the rule which they assert as to interest on private contracts; and to show that it is the rule that the commonwealth pays interest on claims against her, they cite the case of Higginbotham's Executrix v. Commonwealth, 25 Grattan 627. That case was decided in 1875, and if it is authority for the statement that in 1875 interest, by the law of Virginia, was allowed against the commonwealth without any promise to pay interest, but as a mere incident to a debt, it cannot apply in this case. The question would be, what was the law of Virginia in respect of the liability for interest upon claims against her in the absence of contract in 1861, when the ordinance was adopted and when the constitution of West Virginia was adopted.

3. ANALYSIS OF HIGGINBOTHAM'S EXECUTRIX V. COMMONWEALTH.

It is notable that in the Higginbotham case the question of interest was not discussed, although many other questions were discussed. The syllabus of the case is as follows:

> "1. The present State of Virginia is bound to the creditors of the state for the debts due before the divi> sion for the whole of their debts. And West Virginia is equally bound for them."

That is a decision which hardly binds West Virginia, for she was not a party.

> "2. Under the statute, the State of Virginia may be sued for any debt or claim due, whether liquidated or unliquidated."

The plaintiff in error, and petitioner below, was the executrix of David Higginbotham, deceased, who was the owner of twelve shares of stock in the old James River Company.. By an amendment to the charter of that company, passed on the 17th day of February, 1820, and accepted by the company, the company became the agent of the state to carry on the work for the state, and under the direction and the control of the general assembly; and it was agreed between the state and the company that, in lieu of the annual dividends which might have been thereafter declared on the stock, the company should be allowed twelve per centum per annum on its stock for twelve years from the commencement of the amendatory act, and fifteen per centum per annum thereafter forever. The act was declared on its face to be "a compact" between "this commonwealth and the said company, subject, however, at all times, to such change and modification as the legislature may think proper to make; provided that no such change or modification shall be made as will take from the James River Company their right to the dividends, or any part of the dividends, upon their stock allowed to them by this act." It was a solemn compact between the state and the company that "the dividend or annuity, as it is in effect, should be forever paid without abatement or diminution." Such was the solemn obligation assumed by the state as the price of the stockholders' property.

By an act of February 17, 1820, and other acts, the powers and duties of the James River Company, acting for the state, were from time to time extended and enlarged; but the company up to the last mentioned date, continued to exist under its own organization. On that day, however, a new company, with greatly extended powers, was chartered, called the James River and Kanawha Company, to which all the interest of the state in the old James River Company was transferred; but this transfer was made expressly "subject to the payment of fifteen per centum per annum forever to the stockholders of the old company." By this act the James River and Kanawha Company became the successor of the old James River Company, and the duty of providing forever for the dividend, as it is called, of fifteen per centum per annum to the stockholders of the old company devolved, as we have seen, directly on the James River and Kanawha Company, under its agreement with the state; and by the act of March 22, 1836, the state required the latter company to pay these dividends into the public treasury, to be disbursed among the stockholders of the old James River Company by the second auditor; thus again solemnly acknowledging the right of the stockholders to these "dividends," and the duty of the state to see that they were punctually paid, by requiring her assignee to pay them into the public treasury to be disbursed to the stockholders by a state officer.

Now, this was treated by the court as a solemn compact, the obligation of which on the state should be "eternal." The court says:

> "Accordingly we find that under all the changes of legislation on the subject down to the first of January, 1865, the appellant's annuity was regularly paid; but since that date there has been but a single payment of $120, leaving arrearages to the amount of $2,220, as of the first of July, 1871. For that amount with its accruing interest, after applying for payment at the offices of the auditor of public accounts, and the second auditor, and being refused at both, this suit was brought."

The petition was dismissed below.

It was claimed by the attorney general of Virginia that the dismemberment of the State of Virginia and the formation of a new state, called West Virginia, out of a portion of her territory, had discharged the State of Virginia from this debt as now claimed; that the old debt of Virginia contracted prior to her dismemberment, if not wholly extinguished by the events leading to, attending and following her dismemberment, was not then due from her, but only ratably from the two states. The court say:

> "Were this a question between the two states alone, I should not question the concluding part of the proposition;"

and quote from Puffendorf:

> "When a kingdom divides by common consent into two or more distinct commonwealths, the public patrimony, with all the debts and encumbrances upon them, ought to be equally shared among them."

The court decided that, in its opinion, Virginia was liable to pay the petitioner the amount of her demand, with interest, but the court said, in so deciding:

> "No power is claimed for this court to control or in manner to interfere with the discretion of the legislature in making provision for the payment of this debt. * * * The judgment being for more than three hundred dollars, the court has no authority to require the auditor of public accounts to issue his warrant for the amount. In such cases, the provision to be made for the judgment is expressly reserved to legislative discretion, and to that discretion we must leave it."

It must be noted, in respect of this claim, and it is rather exceptional, that when the state took the property, it was agreed between the state and the old James River Company that, in lieu of the annual dividends which might have been thereafter declared, the company should be allowed twelve per centum per annum on the stock for twelve years from the commencement of the amendatory act, and fifteen per centum per annum thereafter forever. That was a liability from the state to the company in exchange for its property. By subsequent arrangement, all the interest of the state in the old James River Company was transferred to the James River and Kanawha Company, subject to the payment of fifteen per centum per annum forever to the stockholders of the old company. By this act the James River and Kanawha Company became the successors of the old James River Company, and the duty of providing forever for the dividend, as it is called, of fifteen per centum per annum to the stockholders of the old company devolved directly on the James River and Kanawha Company under its agreement with the state.

This created the relation of debtor and creditor between the James River stockholders and the James River and Kanawha Company. When the commonwealth compelled the company to pay the dividend monies into her treasury for distribution by her among the stockholders, she made herself a trustee of the latter, had no right to withhold or use the trust fund, and having failed to pay it over was bound in equity for interest upon it, just as the company would have been liable for interest, if the commonwealth had not interfered and the company had failed to pay the dividend.

This case cited by counsel is a long way from establishing the proposition, that even in 1875, thirteen years after the transactions involved here, it was the rule in Virginia for the state to allow interest upon claims against her.

When a state takes upon herself a trust she should stand like any other trustee, and the principle that a trustee can take no profit out of the trust estate applies universally.

4. THE CASE OF UNITED STATES V. NORTH CAROLINA.

The learned counsel refer to the case of the United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S. 211. This was an action of debt brought in this Court, November 5, 1889, by the United States against North Carolina upon 147 bonds, duly executed, for $1,000 each, payable in thirty years from date, with interest at the yearly rate of six per cent., alleged in the declaration to be payable half yearly until payment of the principal. They were executed at different dates, set forth in the statement of the case. They were interest bearing debts. The declaration alleged that, at the dates when the bonds became payable payment of the principal was demanded by the United States and refused by the State of North Carolina. The defendant pleaded payment of the principal sums of the bonds after they became payable, together with all interest accrued thereon to the days when they became payable. The Court say:

> "The only question presented for our decision is whether, as a matter of law, the principal of the bonds bore interest after maturity."

And they add:

> "Interest, when not stipulated for by contract, or authority by statute, is allowed by the courts as damages for the detention of money or of property, or of compensation, to which the plaintiff is entitled: and, > as has been settled on grounds of public convenience, is not to be awarded against a sovereign government, unless its consent to pay interest has been manifested by an act of its legislature, or by a lawful contract of its executive officers;"

citing:

United States v. Sherman, 98 U. S. 565.
Angarica v. Bayard, 127 U. S. 251, 260.

The Court looked into the laws of North Carolina, and after stating the law as to the payment of interest in an action, against a private person and citing authorities, said:

> "But it is equally well settled, by judgments of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, that the state, unless by or pursuant to an explicit statute, is not liable for interest, even on a sum certain which is overdue and unpaid."

5. THERE IS NO BASIS FOR VIRGINIA'S CLAIM FOR INTEREST.

No statute of Virginia has been cited by the learned counsel, who would have cited it, we think, if there had been such, by which the state subjects itself to the payment of interest as an incident to a debt, or by way of compensation for its use, or damages for non-payment of the principal when due. Whether the legislature in the Higginbotham case appropriated the interest, the counsel do not state. The opinion of the Supreme Court of the state that it ought to do so does not make it the rule of the state, nor do legislative acts in special and sporadic cases which allow interest on claims constitute a rule which binds the state to pay interest upon claims against it.

Moreover, Virginia is the state demanding interest. If one sovereign makes it a rule to pay interest on claims against it without having contracted so to do; in other words, puts itself upon the same plane as private creditors may be placed by its laws, does it follow that, because it pays interest itself without having agreed to do it, that it may collect interest from another sovereign which does not pay interest except where it has contracted to do so? The United States does not pay interest except where it contracts to pay it.

We have found no indication in the decisions of the Supreme Court of Virginia that any such rule has been adopted by the legislature of that state, or by the courts of that state, if indeed the courts can make such a rule for a state. It is a matter of contract, and contracts are not made by the courts for states or their citizens.

Virginia has given very liberal right to her citizens to sue; but it is a suit for liquidation. The court has no power, except in petty claims, amounting to not over $300, to direct the auditor to issue a warrant, and the whole matter of payment, including the principal sum awarded, with or without interest, is left entirely to the discretion of the legislature. Probably, sometimes, they pay interest, and oftener they do not, as the case may or may not appeal to the legislative judgment. But there is no statutory rule for the payment of interest by the state on claims against her where she has not contracted to pay it.

In 1837, the question arose in the Court of Appeals of Virginia in the case of Commonwealth v. Marston's Administrator, 9 Leigh, page 36. To that case, there is appended a note, as follows:

> "There was an error committed by the reporter, in the report of Lilly's case, 1 Leigh 525, 6. It is there stated, that the circuit court of Henrico reversed the auditor's decision, and ordered him to issue a warrant in favor of Lilly's administrator, for the amount of five years full pay, with interest from the 22d April, 1873; and that that judgment was affirmed. But, in fact, the circuit court gave judgment, not for the commutation, but for the half pay that accrued to Lilly during his life, without interest; and that was the judgment which this court affirmed. This court expressly decided, that no interest should be paid; see judge Green's opinion, in the same case, Id. 538, and in Markham's case, Id. 523, 4."

6. WEST VIRGINIA AGREED TO ASSUME A JUST PROPOSITION, NOT OF THE OUTSTANDING OBLIGATIONS OF VIRGINIA, BUT OF HER DEBT.

It is clear that the constitution can bear no such construction as is sought to be placed upon it. It must be borne in mind that neither by the ordinance nor by the constitution was there any agreement to assume, or an assumption of, any proportion of the obligations of the Commonwealth of Virginia outstanding prior to 1862. If she had agreed to assume a just proportion of the obligations of the commonwealth, it might be argued that, as they were interest-bearing obligations, she assumed to pay the principal and accruing interest, until paid; but the bonds or state stock, as evidences of debt, are one thing. The debt is another, and different thing. Moreover, it seems impossible to impute an intention, upon the part of the framers of the two instruments, that the new state should assume a proportion of the outstanding interest-bearing securities of the old state, January 1, 1861. For that day, it was an enormous debt. The framers of those instruments were well aware, as were the people in the Trans-Allenghany territory, that the moneys borrowed by the state had been expended in payment of stock subscriptions in corporations created to construct various internal improvements. It is conceivable that it could have been intended by the convention which framed either the ordinance or the constitution that the new state should assume, considering the character of the debt, the purposes for which it was contracted, the territory within which it had been expended, from 1823 to 1861, a proportion of the obligations representing the debt, and especially in view of the fact that the people of what now constitutes West Virginia had been, during a large portion of the period, deeply resentful that they were taxed to pay interest upon such indebtedness, so little of the proceeds of which was expended within their territory, and enured to their benefit?

7. THERE IS NO EVIDENCE THAT THE IMPROVEMENTS CONSTRUCTED BY VIRGINIA WITHIN HER PRESENT LIMITS WERE FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE REGION NOW WEST VIRGINIA.

It is alleged in the bill that these expenditures were largely with a view to the ultimate benefit of West Virginia, and to secure the development of her resources and the prosperity of her people. This is alleged in general terms. If this allegation is susceptible of proof, no proof has been offered. If, by the participation of her government and people in the war she was, and as a consequence of the impoverishment and destruction wrought by war within her limits, unable to continue to completion such works as would, if completed, have benefited West Virginia and her people, it is safe to say that the people of that portion of the state did not contribute to that result (Davis v. Gray, 16 Wallace 203).

The answer denies that the purpose of the improvements or the effect of the improvements, in the main constructed within the present limits of Virginia, were with reference to the well-being, or would, if completed, have essentially affected the well-being of what is now West Virginia and her people. Answer under oath is not waived by the bill, and the answer is verified by the oath of the governor of West Virginia. No evidence has been offered upon the subject.

8. FACTS SHOWING INJUSTICE OF VIRGINIA'S CLAIMS.

The injustice of charging to West Virginia a proportion of the internal improvement debt of Virginia, prior to January 1, 1861, as such, is further intensified by the facts in relation to the population of the other during the years from 1823 to 1861. While the territory was separated, as we have said, from Eastern Virginia, and what is known as "The Valley" by the Alleghany Mountains, and while the markets of its people were to the westward, rather than to the eastward, it was no sparsely settled region.

There was laid before the constitutional convention of 1829-30 by Mr. Doddridge, one of its ablest members, who represented West Virginia, a statement showing the distribution of the white population in 1810, 1820 and 1829, as follows:

"In 1810 the white population was distributed thus, viz.:

East of the Blue Ridge		338,837
In the Valley	108,355
West of the Alleghany	104,377	212,726
Whole population		551,553

"In 1820 population was distributed thus, viz.:

East of the Blue Ridge		248,875
In the Valley	121,196
West of the Alleghany	133,112	254,308
Whole population		603,081

"And in 1829 the white population, as estimated by the auditor, stood thus:

East of the Blue Ridge		362,745
In the Valley	138,134
West of the Alleghany	181,384	319.516
Whole population		682,261"

It will be noticed that from 1810 to 1820 the population east of the Blue Ridge increased 10,038. The Valley increased 12,841. The increase west of the Alleghany was 28,735. From 1820 to 1829 the increase in the white population east of the Blue Ridge was 13,870. The increase in the Valley was 16,938. The increase in the Trans-Alleghany territory was 48,272.

(These figures from the book entitled "Proceeding and Debates of the Virginia State Convention of 1829-30," page 686. There are some errors in addition; but they are, relatively, trifling. The book was printed after the convention had been dissolved, and, undoubtedly, the figures used by Mr. Doddridge, were correct.)

It will be observed that the increase in population in the territory "east of the Blue Ridge" combined with the increase in population "in the Valley" was 30,808, a total increase for the two regions of 17,464 less than the total increase in population in the territory "west of the Alleghany."

Mr. Doddridge said (page 682):

> "It thus appears that in 19 years, white population east of the Blue Ridge, beginning with 338.837, has increased to 362,745, or to the amount of 29,908. The increase in the Valley having in 1810, 108,345 has been 29,779. Making in 1829, 138.134. These data show that the increase in the valley and in the whole east are nearly equal. That in the Valley being the smallest only by a difference of 129. As the Valley has kept pace with the whole east for nineteen years past, so it probably will hereafter, and therefore, a permanent apportionment which would do justice to the present Valley and eastern population with reference to each other, might probably suit them in all future time: yet, the same apportionment might operate to the > utmost excess of cruelty and injustice to the Trans-Alleghany country. To concur in such a one would be a treachery to the Valley, of which we have not the least apprehension. The extent of this injustice will be manifest by comparing the increase of that population during the same period of 19 years. In 1810 we commenced with a population of 104,377, which, in 1829, is 181,384, having increased 77,007, or four times as much as either the Valley or all the country east of the Blue Ridge mountains."

The Territory of West Virginia was, by location, climate, proximity to Pennsylvania, Ohio and Kentucky, and in the sentiment of her people upon the question of slavery and the trifling number of slaves within her territory, inviting an immigration, which never sought, in even measurably the same numbers, the real slave states of the union. Notwithstanding this population, constantly increasing, of the $33,000,000 expended out of borrowed money, less than one-tenth was expended within what now are the limits of West Virginia; and it may very well be said that it was largely due to the fact of disproportionable representation.

It is truthfully said in "Part II." of this brief, page 173:

> "It should be remembered that there was not in the entire territory of Virginia, which is now West Virginia, on the 1st day of January, 1861, a single mile of state built or state-aided railroad, nor a mile of canal, nor a state building; not even a school, not a public institution of any kind."

9. UNDER THE ORDINANCE AND HER CONSTITUTION WEST VIRGINIA CANNOT BE CHARGED WITH INTEREST UNTIL AFTER THE ASCERTAINMENT IN THE MANNER PRESCRIBED OF HER EQUITABLE PROPORTION OF THE OLD VIRGINIA DEBT.

The ordinance prescribes a method of accounting by which a definite sum shall be ascertained. This sum the ordinance, in effect, declares to be West Virginia's just proportion of the old Virginia debt. Section 8 of Article VIII. of West Virginia's Constitution, when read in connection with the ordinance, as this Court has said it should be, produces precisely the same result. West Virginia did not agree to pay interest on the sum to be ascertained by the prescribed method before this sum was ascertained.

We refer again to section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution of West Virginia.

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the 1st of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this state, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

That the word "thereof" refers to the result of an accounting in accordance with the terms of the ordinance, or, if the latter be eliminated, in accordance with such method as the legislature shall adopt, is not susceptible of doubt. That the command to the legislature to "provide for the liquidation thereof," means the sum which the legislature shall ascertain by pursuit of the methods prescribed by the ordinance, or if that be eliminated, by such method as the legislature shall adopt, is equally clear. The words "accruing interest" obviously refer to the word "principal."

We maintain most earnestly that, all things considered, it is clear that it was the manifest purpose that West Virginia was not to assume any portion of the public debt of Virginia as such, but was only to contribute to that end such sum, be it much or little, as would result from the accounting prescribed by the ordinance, unless the general words in the first clause of section 9 of the ordinance control and destroy the special provisions which follow, all being expressed in a single sentence. Moreover, this produces an equitable result, for the debt being an internal improvement debt, and nine-tenths of it having been expended by Virginia within her present limits, in public improvements, it would have been, in the highest degree, inequitable for the new state to take upon herself an obligation to contribute one-third of that debt, when Virginia retained the bank and other stocks.

"Accruing" is a word operative in the future, and has no reference to the past. When we speak of past due interest we refer to it as "accrued interest."

Six months' interest, the record shows, was due and defaulted on this debt on January 1, 1861. Where is there any indication here, upon the part of West Virginia, of an intention to pay accrued interest? The interest up to the time of the ascertainment would be "accrued." She did not in her constitution assume:

> "a just proportion of the debt, with interest to accrue thereon, to the date of the ascertainment, until the just proportion shall have been ascertained and paid."

The constitution speaks of "accruing interest" and that means the interest to accrue on the principal thereafter to be ascertained, and not yet ascertained. This is not technical. It is substantial. It is in harmony with the ordinary use of the word "accrue" and with its technical, legal signification.

At an earlier hearing in this case, we called the attention of the Court to the case of Gross v. Partenheimer, 159 Pa. 556. The case may be briefly stated:

Plaintiff agreed to purchase from defendant, in April, 1883, a lot of land, for $8,000, payable $5,000 in cash, on delivery of deed, and the residue by plaintiff's assumption of a mortgage for $3,000, then on the lot, plaintiff to pay also the accruing interest on said mortgage, not exceeding six months. The six months' interest from the date of mortgage to February 26, 1893, was past due and unpaid, and, to avoid foreclosure proceedings, plaintiff was compelled to pay the same: He then brought suit to recover the sum thus paid, the vendor claiming that the purchaser was obliged to pay it under the agreement.

The court, at page 558, said:

> "This contention hinges entirely on the proper construction of the clause in the contract of sale above referred to, wherein the plaintiff agrees to pay 'the accruing interest in said mortgage not exceeding six months.' There is nothing in the affidavit of defense that can in any wise aid or control the construction of this clause. If, 'accruing interest' means interest which, according to the terms of the security, was due and payable on February 26, 1893, and remained overdue and unpaid at the date of the contract, the defendant's construction should prevail; but we cannot agree that these words mean any such thing. Such a construction would be strained and wholly unwarranted by the language employed. As generally undertsood, accruing' interest means running or accumulating interest, as distinguished from accrued or matured interest. When we speak of interest which is from day to day accumulating on the principal debt, but which is not yet due and payable, we call it accruing interest. When we refer to interest heretofore payable but still remaining unpaid, we speak of it as overdue interest, arrears of interest, or interest in arrear, just as we speak of rent in arrear. We are therefore of opinion that the words 'accruing interest' do not refer to, or in any manner embrace any part of the six months' interest which was then overdue and unpaid. That interest was an encumbrance on the lot, which the defendant was bound to remove. He refused to do so, and the plaintiff, who was compelled to pay it, in order to prevent foreclosure of the mortgage, etc., is entitled to recover the amount thus paid with interest from date of payment. The learned court was clearly right in adjudging the affidavit of defence insufficient and entering judgment against defendant for the amount claimed by plaintiff."

If there had been any intent to assume, or pay, the accrued interest on the bonds of Virginia, outstanding, the constitution would have so expressed it; and, as expressed, we earnestly contend that it can be construed to mean no such thing.

For the convenience of the Court, we venture to insert the memorandum of authorities submitted by the late John G. Carlisle, who died during the last summer, upon this question of the liability of the state to pay interest.

10. MEMORANDUM OF JOHN G. CARLISLE.

"It will be observed that in Paragraph II. of this draft of a decree the Master is not only directed to ascertain the amount and proportion of said indebtedness, but 'of the interest accrued thereon.'

"Counsel for the defendant object further to this paragraph because there is no legal ground for directing the ascertainment of interest. The State of West Virginia has not obligated herself in any manner for the payment of interest. The principle is well settled that a state is not liable to pay interest unless it has expressly contracted to do so.

"In support of this proposition this Court, in United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S. 211, said:

"'A state is not liable to pay interest on its debts, unless its consent to do so has been manifested by an act of its legislature, or by lawful contract of its executive officers.'

"Following the principle thus announced by this Court, many of the state courts have laid down in distinct terms the same proposition. Among the decisions of those courts are the following:

Sawyer v. Colgan, 102 Cal. 293; 36 Pac 583.

Hawkins v. Mitchell, 34 Fla. 421, 422; 16 So. 316.

Molineaux v. State, 109 Cal. 380; Am. St. Rep. 50; 42 Pac. 34.

Flint, etc., R. R. v. Board of State Auditors, 102 Mich. 502; 60 N. W. 971.

Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 204; 22 Am. St. Rep. 624.

"In Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 204, 22 Am. St. Rep. 624, this principle is announced as one of the points decided:

"'A sovereign state is not bound to pay interest unless it has contracted to do so.'"

"The court, in the course of its opinion in this case, says:

"'In the case of State ex rel. v. Board, etc., 36 Ohio St. 409, it was held that in the absence of a promise to pay interest none can be recovered against a state, and that a state is not within the provisions of a general statute providing for the payment of interest in cases where money is wrongfully withheld from a creditor. The court put its decision upon the familiar rule that a sovereign is not bound by the words of a statute unless it is expressly named, and in support of its conclusion cited these cases: Trustee, etc v. Campbell, 16 Ohio St. 11; Jaselyn v. Stone, 28 Miss. 753; State v. Kinne, 41 N. J. 238; Attorney General v. Cape Fear, etc., Co., 2 Ired. Eq. 444; Auditorial Board v. Arles, 15 Tex. 72; State v. Thompson, 10 Ark. 61. In Wightman v. United States, 23 Ct. of Cl. 144, the general rule > was stated, and it was said: 'Hence there is no law fixing a rate for interest for all classes of the public debt, and a long-established public policy has been to pay interest only where it is a subject of express agreement or of positive enactment.' It was held in the case of Tillson v. United States, 100 U. S. 43, that a statute referring to a claim did not authorize a recovery of interest, in the absence of words expressly providing for the payment of interest. It is impossible to escape the effect of these authorities, and considerations may be readily suggested which increase their force. One is, there is no right to coerce the payment of a debt due from a sovereign, and, of course, a sovereign may impose limitations upon its liability."

In a note appended to this case as reported in 22 American State Reports, at page 448, we find the following:

> 'With respect to the obligation of the state to pay interest upon its indebtedness, the principal case is well established by other authorities upon the same subject. In nearly and perhaps all of the states there are statutory provisions providing that moneys, after they become due, shall, in the absence of express contract to the contrary, bear the rate of interest specified in such statutes; but, acting under the old common-law rule that the king or sovereign is not bound by statute unless expressly named therein, it has been uniformly held that these statutory provisions respecting interest did not apply to any obligation either of the state or of the national government, and therefore that interest is never allowed upon such obligations, in the absence of some special statute clearly manifesting the intention of the sovereign to be bound for the payment of interest upon the particular obligation or class of obligations under consideration (United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S. 211; State v. Thompson, 10 Ark. 61; State v. Board of Public Works, 36 Ohio St. 409; State v. Bank of Washington, 18 Ark. 554; United States v. Sherman, 98 U. S. 565; United States v. Bayard, 127 U. S. 251; Tillson v. United States, 100 U. S. 43; In re Gosman, 17 Ch. Div. 771; Attorney General v. Cape Fear N. Co., 2 Ired Eq., 444; Bledsoe v. State, 64 N. C. 392; Trustee v. Campbell, 16 Ohio St. 11; Joselyn

v. Stone, 28 Miss. 753; Wightman v. United States, 23 Ct. of Cls. 144)."

11. VIRGINIA'S RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE DELAY IN APPORTIONING THE DEBT.

Reading section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution of West Virginia with the ordinance, or regardless of it, the complainant, by her own act, rendered impossible, any ascertainment prior to January 1, 1871, of the just proportion of the public debt of Virginia to be borne by West Virginia. In 1866, she instituted in this Court, the suit of Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wallace 39. This was an original bill to settle the boundary line between the States of Virginia and West Virginia. It involved the question whether the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson were a part of West Virginia. The case was not decided until December, 1870. While Virginia cannot be complained of for instituting and prosecuting the suit, it is manifest that, until the determination thereof, there could be no apportionment of the old Virginia debt, either under the ordinance or under section 8 of Article VIII. of the Constitution of West Virginia.

Pending the decision of the case, the accounting provided for by the ordinance would be impossible, in view of its requirements:

> (a) "Charging to it all state expenditures within the limits thereof."

Manifestly, so long as those limits were unsettled, this could not be done.

> (b) "A just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government since any part of said debt was contracted."

This could not be fulfilled upon the basis of taxable values, area or population until the boundaries of the state were settled.

> (c) "Deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new state during the same period."

This could not be done until the territorial limits of the new state were settled, and it was known what counties were included within the new state. So that, while entirely within her right, Virginia's own act compelled a delay from the filing of this bill until the entry of the final decree therein of an adjustment under the ordinance or under the constitution.

Section 9 of Article X. of the Constitution of Virginia, which became operative in 1870, contained the following provisions:

> "The general assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of Virginia the proportion of the public debt of Virginia proper to be borne by the States of Virginia and West Virginia, and shall provide that such sum as shall be received from West Virginia, shall be applied to the payment of the public debt of the state."

We do not deem it necessary here to give a history of the appointment of commissioners by the two states with reference to the adjustment of the debt. This history is set out in the pleadings. It is enough to say that as early as 1870, a commission appointed by West Virginia proceeded to Richmond, where the archives all were, and their visit resulted in accomplishing little. But, on March 30, 1871, the legislature of Virginia, by a law passed in 1871, apportioned the debt between the two states, assuming for itself two-thirds, and issuing certificates for the other one-third as West Virginia's share. Subsequent legislation of Virginia proceeded upon that apportionment, certificates being issued, to be accounted for by West Virginia.

It is difficult to conceive of any theory upon which Virginia could justly assume the function of apportioning the debt and issuing obligations for which West Virginia could be accountable. Virginia's general assembly were, by the constitutional provision above quoted, required to provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt to be borne by the two states. They proceeded to apportion it themselves, without consulting West Virginia.

West Virginia then was a comparatively new state, and her resources were relatively undeveloped.

To issue securities to be accounted for by West Virginia, was not only apparently in defiance of Virginia's own constitutional provision, but was usurpatory, detrimental to the credit of West Virginia, and well calculated to produce resentment among her people.

From that time, West Virginia was placed in a position which rendered it almost impossible for her, with dignity and self respect, to take further initiative in the matter.

In 1894, the legislature of Virginia, after she had funded and refunded her debt, adopted a joint resolution, providing for the appointment of a > "commission of seven members, who were authorized and directed to negotiate with the State of West Virginia for a settlement and adjustment of the latter state's part of the public debt proper to be borne by her."

It was provided:

> "But said commission shall, in no event, enter into any negotiation hereunder, except upon the basis that Virginia is bound only for the two-thirds of the debt of the original state which she has already provided for as her equitable proportion thereof."

It is quite manifest that West Virginia was here called upon, as a condition of any negotiation whatever, to accept the action of Virginia taken in 1871, 1879 and 1894 apportioning the debt, two-thirds to herself and one-third to West Virginia. It needs no argument to show that West Virginia could not be expected to negotiate upon such a basis. It was not until 1905, preliminary to the institution of this suit, that a commission went to West Virginia freed from such restraint.

The attention of the Court is especially directed to the Appendices "A," "B," "C," and "D" printed herewith.

We respectfully submit that from the record in this cause and upon the authorities cited by counsel for the defendant, the State of West Virginia ought to prevail.

APPENDIX B.

CHAP. 75.—An Act to convert the Branch of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia at Jeffersonville into a Separate and Independent Bank.

Passed March 13, 1862.

Whereas the armed occupation of northwestern Virginia, by lawless enemies of this state, has entirely destroyed all business intercourse and relations between the Northwestern Bank of Virginia at Wheeling and its branch at Jeffersonville, to the great detriment of the state and loyal stockholders, and it seems proper under the circumstances to dissolve the connection heretofore subsisting between said bank and its branch at Jeffersonville, and of authorizing the latter to transact business as a separate and independent corporation:

1. Be it therefore enacted by the general assembly, that the branch of the Northern Bank of Virginia at Jeffersonville be and the same is hereby constituted, created and incorporated a separate, distinct and independent bank, under the corporate name of Graziers Bank of Virginia; and all the power, control, direction, supervision, relation and connection of said Northwestern Bank of Virginia over and with the said branch at Jeffersonville, are hereby dissolved, abrogated and annulled.

2. All the assets held by said branch (embracing all bills and notes discounted, whether the same be in suit, protested, due or maturing, all judgments, balances due on accounts current, all money, either in coin or currency, all evidences of debt or other securities, all real estate, and every right and interest) are absolutely vested in the said Graziers Bank of Virginia; and in every case where suit has been instituted in the name of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia for the recovery of money or other thing, to which said branch is entitled, the suit so brought shall be prosecuted in the name of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia, for the use and benefit of said Graziers Bank of Virginia; and in every case where suit shall hereafter be instituted for the recovery of money or other thing belonging to said branch, the suit shall be in the name of said Graziers Bank of Virginia.

3. The said Graziers Bank of Virginia is subject to all the liabilities of the said branch, except so far as the said liabilities are modified by the followng sections of this act.

4. The said Graziers Bank of Virginia shall in no event be required to account to the said Northwestern Bank of Virginia for any portion of the net profits or contingent fund of the said branch, nor to contribute to the payment of, or pay out of the assets of said branch, or otherwise, to any stockholder, billholder or creditor of the said Northwestern Bank, any sum of money which any such stockholder, billholder or creditor may be entitled to demand and have of said Northwestern Bank of Virginia.

5. At any time within three months from the passage of this act, any loyal holder of stock in the Northwestern Bank of Virginia, whose stock in said bank was purchased through the said branch, or whose dividends have usually heretofore been credited to him at said branch, may return and assign to said Graziers Bank of Virginia such stock, and demand and receive in lieu thereof a certificate for a like number of shares of stock in the said Graziers Bank of Virginia.

6. As soon as may be after the expiration of the said three months from the passage of this act, the governor of the state shall cause certificates of the stock held by the state in the said Northwestern Bank of Virginia, for an amount equal to the balance of the capital stock of said branch, not exchanged under the previous section, to be in like manner returned and assigned to said Graziers Bank of Virginia, for a like number of shares of the stock thereof.

7. The Graziers Bank of Virginia, hereby established, shall be required to redeem, from loyal citizens of the Confederate States of America, in notes of its own issue, all such notes of said branch as may be in their possession at the passage of this act; provided the same be presented in six months after notice of this provision shall have been published for one month in some weekly newspaper published in the city of Richmond: and provided further, the amount offered for redemption shall not exceed one hundred and eighty thousand dollars.

8. The legislature reserves the power to provide, after the termination of the war with the United States, the extent, mode and time of redemption by said Graziers Bank of Virginia, of any outstanding notes of said branch, with which, according to the principles of equity, justice and right, it is chargeable. But as it is represented to this general assembly that the said branch has a special deposit of twenty-four thousand dollars in gold with the said Northwestern Bank of Virginia, heretofore made by said branch to meet the redemption of its notes; and as notes payable at said branch may have been issued by the said Northwestern Bank of Virginia, which have not been reported to said branch, nor charged to said Northwestern Bank of Virginia, and which it would be evidently unjust to require the said branch to redeem, it is hereby expressly provided and enacted, that the whole amount of circulation of the said branch, which the said Graziers Bank of Virginia shall be required to redeem, under the provisions of this act, and of any subsequent act of the legislature, taken collectively, shall not exceed the balance of the circulation of said branch, after deducting therefrom the sum of twenty-four thousand dollars on account of said special deposit, and also any amount or amounts of circulation payable at said branch (if any such there be), issued by the said Northwestern Bank of Virginia, of which the said branch has not heretofore received notice from said Northwestern Bank of Virginia.

9. The cashier shall forthwith, after the expiration of three months from the passage of this act, out of the surplus or contingent fund of the said branch, pass to the credit of the stockholders of the said Graziers Bank of Virginia and to the state, a dividend of ten per centum upon their stock issued under the provisions of the fifth and sixth sections of this act.

10. The said Graziers Bank of Virginia shall be located and transact its business at the town of Jeffersonville.

11. The said Graziers Bank of Virginia may, by sales of new stock, increase its capital to two hundred thousand dollars.

12. The present board of directors for the said branch shall continue to act as a board of directors for the said Graziers Bank of Virginia until a new board shall be appointed under the general law.

13. Except so far as the same may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act, the general banking law of the state shall apply to the said Graziers Bank of Virginia; and the general law of joint stock companies shall apply to the said Graziers Bank of Virginia, so far as the same is applicable to it, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

14. This act shall be in force from its passage, but may be repealed, altered or modified, at the pleasure of the general assembly.

Report of Honorable Chester D. Hubbard.

Wheeling, West Virginia, Feb. 23, 1871.

Hon. W. E. Stevenson, President.

Dear Sir: In accordance with the instructions of the Board of the School Fund in their action of the 15th, I have ascertained and herewith transmit a statement of the stock held by the state in the National Bank of West Virginia at Wheeling, the First National Bank of Wellsburg, and the Parkersburg National Bank, and the different funds to which said stock is credited.

I also proceeded to Wellsburg and exchanged as directed the stock of the Internal Improvement Fund in the First National Bank of Wellsburg, 163 shares, for United States 5-20 coupon bonds (the Bank had no registered bonds), receiving therefor six teen bonds of $1,000 each and three bonds of $100 each lettered and numbered as follows: $1000 K 134,401, 134,403, 134,404, 134,405, 134,406, 134,407, 134,413, 134,414, 163, 792, G. 142,990, 142,991, 142,981, 142,982, 142,983, 142,984, 142,985. $100 each I, 177,876, C. 102,938, D. 236,517. These bonds carry the coupons of July 1, 1871, and were issued July 1, 1867, under the act of 1865.

I have sealed the bonds in an envelope writing my name across the seal and labelling them as belonging to the School Fund of West Virginia, and have deposited them as a special deposit in the First National Bank of Wheeling. The bonds can be exchanged for registered bonds by sending them to Washington. I will attend to it if you desire it to make any other disposition of the bonds you may direct.

The Bank declined to exchange for the stock held in the name of the state, believing that they could not safely do so under section 7, article 8, of the Constitution, besides I was not certain that my authority extended to such an exchange. If I am to make any other disposition of the bonds, please advise me at your earliest convenience.

The stock exchanged at Wellsburg will modify the bond statement to that extent.

Very respectfully,

C. D. HUBBARD.

APPENDIX C.

37TH CONGRESS, 2d Session. | SENATE. | MIS. DOC. No. 99.

MEMORIAL OF THE COMMISSIONERS

APPOINTED BY THE

CONVENTION OF WEST VIRGINIA

PRAYING

For the admission of that State into the Union.

MAY 31, 1862.—Referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

To the Hon. B. F. WADE,

Chairman of the Committee on Territories:

In conformity with the suggestion of your committee, the undersigned, commissioners appointed by the convention to frame a constitution for West Virginia, beg leave to submit the following:

In the month of January, 1861, the Legislature of Virginia, convened in extra session, passed an act providing for the election of delegates on the 4th of February, 1861, to meet in convention at the city of Richmond on the 13th of the same month to take into consideration the then condition of the country.

The act calling the convention provided that it should submit any proposition it might adopt changing the relations of the State to the Federal Government or the organic law of the State to the voters of the State, to be approved or rejected by them at the polls, provided the people should so require by their vote on the 4th day of February, 1861; and accordingly the people, at the same time they voted for delegates to the convention, voted upon the question whether the action of the convention should be submitted to them for their ratification before the said action of the convention should be of binding obligation.

The people, by a majority of more than fifty thousand votes, declared in favor of submitting the action of the convention to them for ratification or rejection.

On the 17th day of April, 1861, the convention passed an ordinance of secession; on the 24th day of April, 1861, commissioners appointed by the convention entered into an agreement with A. H. Stephens, vice-president of the so-called Confederate States, transferring the State to the said confederacy. On the fourth Thursday in May thereafter the question of ratifying or rejecting the ordinance of secession was submitted to the voters of the State, but prior to that day the authors of secession had organized the military forces of the State in the interest of the so-called Confederate States, and occupied most of the counties of the State on the day of voting upon the ordinance, so that, in fact, a reign of terror was inaugurated to prevent a free and fair expression of the popular will at the polls.

On the 22d of April, 1861, a meeting of the people of Harrison County was held at the courthouse of that county, which adopted the resolutions following:

GRAND UNION MEETING.

1,000 to 1,200 people present.

At a large and enthusiastic meeting of from 1,000 to 1,200 of the citizens of Harrison County, assembled at the courthouse upon a notice of forty-eight hours, on Monday, April 22, 1861, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted without one dissenting voice:

PREAMBLE.

Whereas the convention now in session in this State, called by the legislature, the members of which had been elected twenty months before said call, at a time when no such action as the assemblage of a convention by legislative enactment was contemplated by the people, or expected by the members they elected in May, 1859, at which time no one anticipated the troubles recently brought upon our common country by the extraordinary action of the State authorities of

South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Louisiana, and Texas, has, contrary to the expectation of a large majority of the people of this State, adopted an ordinance withdrawing Virginia from the Federal Union; and whereas by the law calling said convention it is expressly declared that no such ordinance shall have force or effect or be of binding obligation upon the people of this State until the same shall be ratified by the voters at the polls; and whereas we have seen with regret that demonstrations of hostility, unauthorized by law, and inconsistent with the duty of law-abiding citizens still owing allegiance to the Federal Government, have been made by a portion of the people of this State against the said government; and whereas the governor of this Commonwealth has, by proclamation, undertaken to decide for the people of Virginia that which they had reserved to themselves, the right to decide by their votes at the polls, and has called upon the volunteer soldiery of this State to report to him and hold themselves in readiness to make war upon the Federal Government, which Government is Virginia's government, and must, in law and of right, continue so to be until the people of Virginia shall by their votes and through the ballot box, that great conservator of a free people's liberties, decide otherwise; and whereas the peculiar situation of northwestern Virginia, separated as it is by natural barriers from the rest of the State, precludes all hope of timely succor in the hour of danger from other portions of the State, and demands that we should look to and provide for our own safety in the fearful emergency in which we now find ourselves placed by the action of our State authorities, who have disregarded the great fundamental principle upon which our beautiful system of government is based to wit, "that all governmental power is derived from the consent of the governed," and have, without consulting the people, placed this State in hostility to the federal government by seizing upon its ships and obstructing the channel at the mouth of Elizabeth River, by wresting from the federal officers at Norfolk and Richmond the customhouses, by tearing from the nation's property the nation's flag, and putting in its place a bunting, the emblem of rebellion, and by marching upon the national armory at Harper's Ferry—thus inaugurating a war without consulting those in whose name they profess to act; and whereas the exposed condition of northwestern Virginia requires that her people should be united in action and unanimous in purpose—there being a perfect identity of interests in times of war as well as in peace: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That it be, and is hereby, recommended to the people in each and all of the counties composing northwestern Virginia to appoint delegates, not less than five in number, of their wisest, best, and discreetest men, to meet in convention at Wheeling, on the 13th day of May next, to consult and determine upon such action as the people of northwestern Virginia should take in the present fearful emergency.

Resolved, That Hon. John S. Carlile, W. P. Goff, Hon. Charles S. Lewis, John J. Davis, Thos. L. Moore, S. S. Fleming, Lot Bowen, Dr. Wm. Dunkin, Wm. E. Lyon, Felix Sturm, and James Lynch, be, and are hereby, appointed delegates to represent this county in said convention.

JOHN HURSEY, President.

J. W. HARRIS, Secretary.

Strange to say, among that large assembly not a single response was heard to the call by the president for the nays on any of the questions before the meeting.—[Guard Office, Clarksburg, Va.]

The proceedings of this meeting were sent to the several counties of northwestern Virginia by special messengers, which responded to the call, and, in accordance with it, a convention of some five hundred delegates from thirty-odd counties of the State met in the city of Wheeling on the 13th day of May, 1861, and adopted the following resolutions:

Convention of the people of northwestern Virginia, held at Wheeling, May 13, 1861.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved, That in our deliberate judgment the ordinance passed by the convention of Virginia on the 17th day of April, 1861, known as the ordinance of secession, by which said convention undertook, in the name of the State of Virginia, to repeal the ratification of the Constitution of the United States by this State, and to resume all the rights and powers granted under said Constitution, is unconstitutional, null and void.

2. Resolved, That the schedule attached to the ordinance of secession, suspending and prohibiting the election of members of Congress for this State, is a manifest usurpation of power to which we ought not to submit.

3. Resolved, That the agreement of the 24th of April, 1861, between the commissioners of the Confederate States and this State, and the ordinance of the 25th of April, 1861, approving and ratifying said agreement, by which the whole military force and military operations, offensive and defensive, of this Commonwealth, are placed under the chief control and direction of the President of the Confederate States, upon the same principles, basis, and footing, as if the Commonwealth were now a member of said confederacy, and all the acts of the executive officers of our State in pursuance of said agreement and ordinance, are plain and palpable violations of the Constitution of the United States, and are utterly subversive of the rights and liberties of the people of Virginia.

4. Resolved, That we earnestly urge and entreat the citizens of the State everywhere, but more especially in the western section, to be prompt at the polls on the 23d instant, and to impress upon every voter the duty of voting in condemnation of the ordinance of secession, in the hope that we may not be involved in the ruin to be occasioned by its adoption, and with the view to demonstrate the position of the west on the question of secession.

5. Resolved, That we earnestly recommend the citizens of Western Virginia to vote for members of the Congress of the United States in their several districts, in the exercise of the rights secured to us by the Constitutions of the United States and the State of Virginia.

6. Resolved, That we also recommend to the citizens of the several counties to vote at said election for such persons as entertain the opinions expressed in the foregoing resolutions for members of the senate and house of delegates of our State.

7. Resolved, That in view of the geographical, social, commercial, and industrial interests of northwestern Virginia, this convention are constrained, in giving expression to the opinion of their constituents, to declare that the Virginia convention, in assuming to change the relation of the State of Virginia to the federal government, have not only acted unwisely and unconstitutionally, but have adopted a policy utterly ruinous to all the material interests of our section, severing all our social ties, and drying up all the channels of our trade and prosperity.

8. Resolved, That in the event of the ordinance of secession being ratified by a vote, we recommend to the people of the counties here represented, and all others disposed to cooperate with us, to appoint on the 4th day of June, 1861, delegates to a general convention, to meet on the 11th of that month, at such place as may be designated by the committee hereinafter provided, to devise such measures and take such action as the safety and welfare of the people they represent may demand—each county to appoint a number of representatives to said convention equal to double the number to which it will be entitled in the next house of delegates; and the senators and delegates to be elected on the 23d instant, by the counties referred to, to the next general assembly of Virginia, and who concur in the views of this convention, to be entitled to seats in the said convention as members thereof.

9. Resolved, That inasmuch as it is a conceded political axiom that government is founded on the consent of the governed and is instituted for their good, and it cannot be denied that the course pursued by the ruling power in the State is utterly subversive and destructive of our interests, we believe we may rightfully and successfully appeal to the proper authorities of Virginia to permit us peacefully and lawfully to separate from the residue of the State, and form ourselves into a government to give effect to the wishes, views, and interests of our constituents.

10. Resolved, That the public authorities be assured that the people of the northwest will exert their utmost power to preserve the peace, which they feel satisfied they can do, until an opportunity is afforded to see if our present difficulties cannot receive a peaceful solution; and we express the earnest hope that no troops of the Confederate States be introduced among us, as we believe it would be eminently calculated to produce civil war.

11. Resolved, That in the language of Washington, in his letter of the 17th of September, 1787, to the President of Congress: "In all our deliberations on this subject we have kept steadily in view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American, the consolidation of our Union, in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, and perhaps our national existence." And therefore we will maintain and defend the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and all officers acting thereunder in the lawful discharge of their respective duties.

12. Resolved, That John S. Carlile, James S. Wheat, C. D. Hubbard, F. H. Peirpoint, Campbell Tarr, G. R. Latham, Andrew Wilson, S. H. Woodward, and James W. Paxton be a central committee to attend to all the matters connected with the objects of this convention; and that they have power to assemble this convention at any time they may think necessary.

13. Resolved, That each county represented in this convention, and any others that may be disposed to co-operate with us, be requested to appoint a committee of five, whose duty it shall be to correspond with the central committee, and to see that all things necessary be done to carry out the objects of this convention.

14. Resolved, That the central committee be instructed to prepare an address to the people of Virginia, in conformity with the foregoing resolutions, and cause the same to be published and circulated as extensively as possible.

By order of the convention.

JOHN W. MOSS, President.

G. L. CRANMER,
M. M. DENT,
C. B. WAGGENER,
Secretaries.

Under the eighth of which resolutions delegates to a convention were chosen on the 4th of June, 1861, and met in the city of Wheeling on the 11th of that month, and adopted the following declaration on the 13th, two days after they met.

A declaration of the people of Virginia, represented in convention, at the city of Wheeling, Thursday, June 13, 1861.

The true purpose of all government is to promote the welfare and provide for the protection and security of the governed; and when any form or organization of government proves inadequate for, or subversive of this purpose, it is the right, it is the duty of the latter, to alter or abolish it. The bill of rights of Virginia, framed in 1776, reaffirmed in 1830, and again in 1851, expressly reserves this right to a majority of her people. The act of the general assembly, calling the convention which assembled at Richmond in February last, without the previously expressed consent of such majority, was therefore a usurpation; and the convention thus called has not only abused the powers nominally intrusted to it, but with the connivance and active aid of the executive, has usurped and exercised other powers, to the manifest injury of the people, which, if permitted, will inevitably subject them to a military despotism.

The convention, by its pretended ordinances, has required the people of Virginia to separate from and wage war against the government of the United States, and against the citizens of neighboring States, with whom they have heretofore maintained friendly, social, and business relations.

It has attempted to subvert the Union founded by Washington and his co-patriots in the former days of the republic, which has conferred unexampled prosperity upon every class of citizens, and upon every section of the country.

It has attempted to transfer the allegiance of the people to an illegal confederacy of rebellious States, and required their submission to its pretended edicts and decrees.

It has attempted to place the whole military force and military operations of the Commonwealth under the control and direction of such confederacy, for offensive as well as defensive purposes.

It has, in conjunction with the State executive, instituted, wherever their usurped power extends, a reign of terror, intended to suppress the free expression of the will of the people, making elections a mockery and a fraud.

The same combination, even before the passage of the pretended ordinance of secession, instituted war by the seizure and appropriation of the property of the Federal Government, and by organizing and mobilizing armies, with the avowed purpose of capturing or destroying the capital of the Union.

They have attempted to bring the allegience of the people of the United States into direct conflict with their subordinate allegiance to the State, thereby making obedience to their pretended ordinances treason against the former.

"We, therefore, the delegates here assembled in convention to devise such measures and take such action as the safety and welfare of the loyal citizens of Virginia may demand, having maturely considered the premises, and viewing with great concern the deplorable condition to which this once happy Commonwealth must be reduced unless some regular adequate remedy is speedily adopted, and appealing to the Supreme Ruler of the universe for the rectitude of our intentions, do hereby, in the name and on behalf of the good people of Virginia, solemnly declare that the preservation of their dearest rights and liberties, and their security in person and property, imperatively demand the reorganization of the government of the Commonwealth, and that all acts of said convention and executive, tending to separate this Commonwealth from the United States, or to levy and carry on war against them, are without authority and void; and that the offices of all who adhere to the said convention and executive, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are vacated."

This convention continued in session several weeks, and on the 19th of June, the following ordinance was adopted:

An ordinance for the reorganization of the State government, passed June 19, 1861.

The people of the State of Virginia, by their delegates assembled in convention at Wheeling, do ordain as follows:

1. A governor, lieutenant governor, and attorney general for the State of Virginia shall be appointed by this convention to discharge offices by the existing laws of the State, and to continue in office for six months, or until their successors be elected and qualified; and the general assembly is required to provide by law for an election of governor and lieutenant governor by the people as soon as in their judgment such an election can be properly held.

2. A council, to consist of five members, shall be appointed by this convention to consult with and advise the governor respecting such matters pertaining to his official duties as he shall submit for consideration, and to aid in the execution of his official orders. Their term of office shall expire at the same time as that of the governor.

3. The delegates elected to the general assembly on the 23d day of May last, and the senators entitled under existing laws to seats in the next general assembly together with such delegates and senators as may be duly elected under the ordinances of this convention, or existing laws, to fill vacancies, who shall qualify themselves by taking the oath or affirmation hereinafter set forth, shall constitute the legislature of the State, to discharge the duties and exercise the powers pertaining to the general assembly. They shall hold their offices from the passage of this ordinance until the end of the terms for which they were respectively elected. They shall assemble in the city of Wheeling on the 1st day of July next, and proceed to organize themselves as prescribed by existing laws in their respective branches. A majority in each branch of the members qualified as aforesaid shall constitute a quorum to do business. A majority of the members in each branch thus qualified, voting affirmatively, shall be competent to pass any act specified in the twenty-fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution of the State.

4. The governor, lieutenant governor, attorney general, members of the legislature, and all officers now in the service of the State, or of any county, city or town thereof, or hereafter to be elected or appointed for such service, including the judges and clerks of the several courts, sheriffs, commissioners of the revenue, justices of the peace, officers of the city and municipal corporations, and officers of militia, and officers and privates of volunteer companies of the State, not mustered into the service of the United States, shall each take the following oath or affirmation before proceeding in the discharge of their several duties:

"I solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, as the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution and laws of the State of Virginia, or in the ordinances of the convention which assembled at Richmond on the 13th of February, 1861, to the contrary notwithstanding; and that I will uphold and defend the government of Virginia as vindicated and restored by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 11th of June, 1861."

If any elective officer, who is required by the preceding section to take such oath or affirmation, fail or refuse so to do, it shall be the duty of the governor, upon satisfactory evidence of the fact, to issue his writ declaring the office to be vacant, and providing for a special election to fill such vacancy, at some convenient and early day, to be designated in said writ; of which due publication shall be made for the information of the persons entitled to vote at such elections: and such writ may be directed, at the discretion of the governor, to the sheriff or sheriffs of the proper county or counties, or to a special commissioner or commissioners to be named by the governor for the purpose. If the officer who fails or refuses to take such oath or affirmation be appointed by the governor, he shall fill the vacancy without writ; but if such officer be appointed otherwise than by the governor or by election, the writ shall be issued by the governor, directed to the appointing power, requiring it to fill the vacancy.

ARTHUR J. BOREMAN,
President.

G. L. CRANMER, Secretary.

This convention, in pursuance of the declaration and ordinance aforesaid, elected a governor, lieutenant governor, and attorney general; each to serve for six months, and until their successors could be elected by the people of the State (which election was had on the 23d day of May, 1862). The governor, by proclamation, convened the legislature, under and by virtue of the power vested in him by the constitution of the State so to do, to meet in the city of Wheeling on the ——— day of July, 1861, and addressed an official letter to the President of the United States, calling upon him, as the Chief Executive of the United States, to aid him, as the executive of the State, in suppressing the insurrection in the State, and to protect the people of the State from domestic violence. To this letter the President of the United States responded, recognizing the governor, thus elected by the June convention, as the chief magistrate of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

On the 9th day of July, 1861, the legislature elected senators of the United States, who were admitted on the 13th day of July to seats in the United States Senate, as senators from the State of Virginia.

On the 20th of August, 1861, the convention at Wheeling passed the following ordinance:

An ordinance to provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State.

Whereas it is represented to be the desire of the people inhabiting the counties hereinafter mentioned to be separated from this Commonwealth, and to be erected into a separate State and admitted into the Union of States and become a member of the Government of the United States:

The people of Virginia, by their delegates assembled in convention at Wheeling, do ordain that a new State, to be called the State of Kanawha, be formed and erected out of the territory included within the following described boundary: Beginning on the Tug Fork of Sandy River, on the Kentucky line, where the counties of Buchanan and Logan join the same, and running thence with the dividing lines of said counties and the dividing line of the counties of Wyoming and McDowell to the Mercer County line, and with the dividing line of the counties of Mercer and Wyoming to the Raleigh County line; thence with the dividing line of the counties of Raleigh and Mercer, Monroe and Raleigh, Greenbrier and Raleigh, Fayette and Greenbrier, Nicholas and Greenbrier, Webster, Greenbrier, and Pocahontas, Randolph and Pocahontas, Randolph and Pendleton to the southwest corner of Hardy County; thence with the dividing line of the counties of Hardy and Tucker to the Fairfax Stone; thence with the line dividing the States of Maryland and Virginia to the Pennsylvania line; thence with the line dividing the States of Pennsylvania and Virginia to the Ohio River; thence down said river, and including the same, to the dividing line between Virginia and Kentucky, and with the said line to the beginning, including within the boundaries of the proposed new State the counties of Logan, Wyoming, Raleigh, Fayette, Nicholas, Webster, Randolph, Tucker, Preston, Monongalia, Marion, Taylor, Barbour, Upshur, Harrison, Lewis, Braxton, Clay, Kanawha, Boone, Wayne, Cabell, Putnam, Mason, Jackson, Roane, Calhoun, Wirt, Gilmer, Ritchie, Woods, Pleasants, Tyler, Doddridge, Wetzel, Marshall, Ohio, Brooke, and Hancock.

2. All persons qualified to vote within the boundaries aforesaid; and who shall present themselves at the several places of voting within their respective counties on the fourth Thursday in October next, shall be allowed to vote on the question of the formation of a new State, as hereinbefore proposed; and it shall be the duty of the commissioners conducting the election at the said several places of voting, at the same time, to cause polls to be taken for the election of delegates to a convention to form a constitution for the government of the proposed State.

3. The convention hereinbefore provided for may change the boundaries described in the first section of the ordinance, so as to include within the proposed State the counties of Greenbrier and Pocahontas, or either of them, and also the counties of Hampshire, Hardy, Morgan, Berkeley, and Jefferson, or either of them, and also such other counties as lie contiguous to the said boundaries or to the counties mentioned in this section, if the said counties to be added, or either of them, by a majority of the votes given, shall declare their wish to form part of the proposed State, and shall elect delegates to the said convention, at elections to be held at the time and in the manner herein provided for.

4. Poll books shall be prepared under the direction of the governor for each place of voting in the several counties hereinbefore mentioned, with two separate columns, one to be headed, "For the new State," the other "Against the new State." And it shall be the duty of the commissioners who superintend, and the officers who conducted the election in May last, or such other persons as the governor may appoint, to attend at their respective places of holding elections, and superintend and conduct the election herein provided for. And if the said commissioners and officers shall fail to attend at any such place of holding elections, it shall be lawful for any two freeholders present to act as commissioners in superintending the said election, and to appoint officers to conduct the same. It shall be the duty of the persons superintending and conducting said election to employ clerks to record the votes, and to indorse on the respective poll books the expenses of the same.

If, on the day herein provided for holding said election, there shall be in any of the said counties any military force, or any hostile assemblage of persons, so as to interfere with a full and free expression of the will of the voters, they may assemble at any other place within their county, and hold an election as herein provided for. It shall be the duty of the commissioners superintending, and officers conducting said election, and the clerks employed to record the votes, each, before entering upon the duties of his office, to take, in addition to the oath now required by the general election law, the oath of office prescribed by this convention. It shall be the duty of the officers and commissioners aforesaid, as soon as may be, and not exceeding three days after said election, to aggregate each of the columns of said poll-books, and ascertain the number of votes recorded in each, and make a return thereof to the secretary of the Commonwealth, in the city of Wheeling, which return shall be in the following form, or to the following effect:

"We, ———, commissioners, and ———, conducting officer, do certify that we caused an election to be held at ———, in the county of ———, at which we permitted all persons to vote that were entitled to do so under existing laws, and that offered to vote, and that we have carefully added up each column of our poll-books, and find the following result:

"For a new State, ——, votes; against a new State, —— votes.

"Given under our hands this —— day of ——, 1861."

"Under which certificate there shall be added the following affidavit:

"——— county, to wit:

"I, ——, a justice of the peace, (or any officer now authorized by law to administer oaths), in and for said county, do certify that the above-named commissioners and conducting officer severally made oath before me that the certificate by them above signed is true.

"Given under my hand this —— day of ——, 1861."

The original poll-books shall be carefully kept by the conducting officers for ninety days after the day of the election, and upon the demand of the executive shall be delivered to such person as he may authorize to demand and receive them.

5. The commissioners conducting the said election in each of said counties shall ascertain, at the same time they ascertain the vote upon the formation of a new State, who has been elected from their county to the convention, hereinbefore provided for, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Commonwealth the name or names of the person or persons so elected to the said convention.

6. It shall be the duty of the governor, on or before the 15th day of November next, to ascertain and by proclamation make known the result of the said vote; and if a majority of the votes given within the boundaries mentioned in the first section of this ordinance shall be in favor of the formation of a new State, he shall so state in his said proclamation, and shall call upon said delegates to meet in the city of Wheeling on the 26th day of November next, and organize themselves into a convention; and the said convention shall submit, for ratification or rejection, the constitution that may be agreed upon by it to the qualified voters within the proposed State, to be voted upon by said voters on the fourth Thursday in December next.

7. The county of Ohio shall elect three delegates; the counties of Harrison, Kanawha, Marion, Marshall, Monongalia, Preston, and Wood shall each elect two; and the other counties named in the first section of this ordinance shall each elect one delegate to the said convention. And such other counties as are described in the third section of this ordinance shall, for every seven thousand of their population according to the census of 1860, be entitled to one delegate, and to an additional delegate for any fraction over thirty-five hundred; but each of said counties shall be entitled to at least one delegate. The said delegate shall receive the same per diem as is now allowed to members of the general assembly; but no person shall receive pay as a member of the general assembly and of the convention at the same time.

8. It shall be the duty of the governor to lay before the general assembly, at its next meeting, for their consent, according to the Constitution of the United States, the result of the said vote, if it shall be found that a majority of the votes cast be in favor of a new State, and also in favor of the constitution proposed to said voters for their adoption.

9. The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government, since any part of the said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period. All private rights and interests in lands within the proposed State, derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation, shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in the State of Virginia.

The lands within the proposed State of non-resident proprietors shall not in any case be taxed higher than the lands of residents therein. No grant of lands or land warrants issued by the proposed State shall interfere with any warrant issued from the land office of Virginia prior to the 17th day of April last which shall be located on lands within the proposed State now liable thereto.

10. When the general assembly shall give its consent to the formation of such new State it shall forward to the Congress of the United States such consent, together with an official copy of such constitution, with the request that the said new State may be admitted into the Union of States.

11. The government of the State of Virginia, as reorganized by this convention at its session in June last, shall retain, within the territory of the proposed State, undiminished and unimpaired, all the powers and authority with which it has been vested, until the proposed State shall be admitted into the Union by the Congress of the United States; and nothing in this ordinance contained, or which shall be done in pursuance thereof, shall impair or affect the authority of the said reorganized State government in any county which shall not be included within the proposed State.

A. I. BOREMAN, President.

G. L. CRANMER, Secretary.

Under this ordinance the people within the boundary prescribed, having voted almost unanimously for a new State, and having elected delegates to a convention as provided for, those delegates thus elected from the counties named lying in the boundaries of the proposed new State met, and formed the constitution now before the committee, which was, on the 3d of April, 1862, ratified and adopted by the people of the counties named by the vote accompanying the constitution; and, as required by the ordinance, the legislature of the State of Virginia was convened by proclamation of the governor, and passed the act accompanying the constitution, giving the assent of the legislature of Virginia to the formation of the proposed State of West Virginia.

CASES ADJUDGED

IN THE

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1910.

VIRGINIA v. WEST VIRGINIA.

IN EQUITY.

No. 3, Original. Argued January 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 1911.—Decided March 6, 1911.

A suit brought by one State against another, formed by its consent from its territory, to determine what proportion the latter should pay of indebtedness of the former at the time of separation, is a quasi-international controversy and should be considered in an untechnical spirit. In such a controversy there is no municipal code governing the matter and this court may be called on to adjust differences that cannot be dealt with by Congress or disposed of by the legislature of either State alone.

A State is superior to the forms that it may require of its citizens; and where a part of a State separates and is created into a new State, a contract can be created by the constitutive ordinance of the parent State followed by the creation of the contemplated State.

A provision of the constitution of a new State, which is not addressed solely to those who are to be subject to its provisions, but is intended to be understood by the parent State and by Congress as embodying a just term which conditions the parent's consent, amounts to a contract.

In this case, the ordinance of Virginia, the constitution of West Virginia, and the act of Congress admitting West Virginia into the Union, when taken together, establish a contract that West Virginia will pay her share of the debt of Virginia existing at the time of separation.

Where all expenditures for which the debt of a State is created have the ultimate good of the whole State in view, the whole State, and not the particular locality in which the improvements are made, should equally bear the burden; and so held in apportioning the debt of Virginia between that State and West Virginia, that the latter should bear its share of the debt so created.

Provisions in the constitution of one State which is a party to a contract with another State cannot be taken as the sole guide to determine obligations under the contract.

What is just and equitable under a contract between States is a judicial question within the competence of this tribunal to decide.

A State may, by suit in this court, enforce against another State a contract in the performance of which the honor and credit of the plaintiff State is concerned. New Hampshire v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76, distinguished.

The liability assumed by West Virginia to bear a fair proportion of the debt of Virginia is a deep-seated equity not discharged by the fact that the creditors of Virginia may have released that State from the obligation of the portion to be assumed by West Virginia as ultimately determined; and Virginia may maintain a suit in this court to determine the liability of West Virginia even if the proceeds are to be applied to those holding certificates on which Virginia is no longer liable.

In apportioning the debt of Virginia between that State and West Virginia, the court rejects other methods proposed and adopts the ratio determined by the master's estimated valuation of real and personal property of the two States at the date of separation.

The value of slaves is properly excluded from such valuation.

There are many elements to be considered in determining the liability for interest by a newly created State on its share of the debt of the parent State, and this court will, before passing on that question in a suit of this nature, afford the parties an opportunity to adjust it between themselves.

A suit between States to apportion debt is a quasi-international controversy involving the honor and constitutional obligation of great States, which have a temper superior to that of private litigants; and, when this court has decided enough, patriotism, fraternity of the Union and mutual consideration should bring the controversy to an end.

THE facts, which involve the adjustment between Virginia and West Virginia of the debt of Virginia at the time of the formation of the State of West Virginia, are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel W. Williams, Attorney General of Virginia, Mr. William A. Anderson, Mr. Randolph Harrison and Mr. John B. Moon for Virginia:

The insistance of Virginia has been, and is, that West Virginia should be charged with an equitable proportion of the debt, to be ascertained under the Wheeling ordinance construed so as not to defeat the expressed controlling purpose of its enactment, and qualified and ruled by the provisions of Article VIII of the West Virginia constitution, upon which the consent of the legislature of Virginia and of the Congress of the United States to the formation of the new State was predicated.

Agreeably to the decision of this court in its opinion, delivered by the late Chief Justice, the view of Virginia is, and has been, that the ordinance and the provisions of the West Virginia constitution, should be read as being in pari materia; but that the constitutional provision, being the latest, must prevail, if, and whenever there is any conflict between them.

Under paragraph 1 of the master's report, the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia as of January 1, 1861, is ascertained to be $33,897,073.82. The only controverted questions which have arisen under this paragraph have been as to the inclusion of the bonds of the Commonwealth, held by her Sinking Fund Board, and her Literary Fund Board, as part of the public debt. Virginia withdraws her objections to the master's action in excluding these bonds from the amount of the public debt.

Under paragraph 2 of the master's report, "the extent and assessed valuation of the territory of Virginia and of West Virginia, June 20, 1863, and the population thereof, with and without slaves, separately," as ascertained and reported by the master, are acceptable to Virginia.

Under paragraph 3 of the master's report, he has reported "all expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia, since any part of the debt was contracted."

This is one of the accounts which is called for under § 9 of the Wheeling ordinance. The only questions to be considered in determining whether any particular expenditure made during that period should be charged against West Virginia, are: First, Was it made by Virginia, and Second, Was the money expended in West Virginia? The expenditures made in West Virginia in the construction of the Covington & Ohio Railroad, amounting to $1,146,460.42, are allowed by the master, but this allowance is objected to by West Virginia on the ground that by reason of the public acts and transactions of Virginia and West Virginia, in reference to this railroad, Virginia has lost her right to have those expenditures charged against West Virginia.

The Wheeling ordinance prescribed the basis on which the proportion of the Virginia debt to be assumed by West Virginia was to be ascertained and vested in the new State the ownership of the portion of the Covington & Ohio Railroad located in Virginia, and there is nothing in the concurrent acts of the two States, in reference to the Covington & Ohio Railroad, which repeals or modifies the provisions of that ordinance.

The master rejected, as proper charges against West Virginia, all expenditures made by Virginia in West Virginia territory in the construction of works of internal improvement located in West Virginia, but built through the agency of joint stock companies.

The master erred in the rejection of those items of the account against West Virginia. Paragraph 3 of the decree, closely following the terms of the Wheeling ordinance, directs the master to ascertain and report "all expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting West Virginia." The ground relied on for excluding these items from the debit account against West Virginia is, because of the manner in which the expenditures were made; that is, because they were not made by the State directly, through her own officers or employés, but were made through the medium of joint stock companies. There is no such qualification of the expenditures which are to be charged, either in the decree or in the ordinance. The words "direct" or "indirect" are not found in either the decree or in the ordinance. No such classification is to be found in either the decree or in the ordinance.

The view which is here urged as to the expenditures of the Commonwealth in works of internal improvement constructed in West Virginia territory, and as to the classification of such of those expenditures as were made through the agency of joint stock companies, is the view heretofore consistently taken by the representatives of West Virginia most familiar with the subject. The construction of the Wheeling ordinance in respect to the expenditures made by Virginia, through the agency of joint stock companies in the territory of West Virginia and adopted by public officials of West Virginia, remained unchallenged for more than a generation, and until this case, when this new and forced construction is attempted to be placed upon the Wheeling ordinance. We submit that this construction is not warranted, and that there is no authority for the master, under the language of the decree, which requires a report of all expenditures, to classify expenditures as "direct" and "indirect."

The fourth paragraph of the decree directs the master to ascertain "such proportion of the ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia, since any of said debt was contracted, as was properly assignable to the counties which were created into the State of West Virginia on the basis of the average total population of Virginia, with or without slaves, as shown by the census of the United States."

This inquiry is manifestly predicated upon the language of the Wheeling ordinance, which provides that the new State shall be charged with "a just proportion of the ordinary expense of the state government, since any part of the said debt was contracted."

Nor are the ordinary expenses of a state government merely those which are necessary and regular in their occurrence, but quite as largely such as are usual, though not periodical, and such as are appropriate though not essential to the needs and aspirations of an enlightened and progressive people, and as are lawful.

In a modern State, and particularly in a State of the American Union, caring for, conserving and promoting the economic and material, as well as the social, sanitary, physical, intellectual and moral welfare of its people, many expenditures which may not be regarded as strictly governmental, and some which may not be absolutely necessary, are proper, lawful, usual and ordinary.

Under the decree the master was directed to ascertain and report "such proportion of the ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia since any of the debt was contracted, as was properly assignable to the counties which were created into the State of West Virginia, on the basis of the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia."

This paragraph is clearly in the alternative with the last clause of paragraph 4. The land assessments in Virginia were made in 1856, seven years before June, 1863, at which latter date at least four-fifths of the present territory of Virginia and one-fifth of the present territory of West Virginia had been ravaged and desolated by war, so that the valuation in 1856 afforded no just measure of value in 1863. The lands were assessed as of their cash value in 1856. The personal property in Virginia counties was assessed annually on the first of February of each year, as of its then value, in the currency which then constituted the medium of exchange and the standard of value. The currency in 1863, with reference to which, as a standard of value, all their transactions were conducted was the depreciated currency of the Confederate States. The market values of all property, real and personal, in Confederate Virginia, was, throughout 1863, fictitiously enhanced by reason of the depreciation of the currency in circulation in those regions, in which currency alone those values were measured. The uncontradicted evidence in the case shows that the depreciation in value extended not only to slaves, but to all personal property, and was at least fifty per cent as a minimum.

The sixth paragraph of the decree directs the master to ascertain all money paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during the period prior to the admission of the latter State into the Union.

The defendant objects to the master's findings under this head because he fails to give West Virginia credit for certain items.

The master's findings upon these items is evidently justified by the facts, and is consistent with the language of the decree and of the Wheeling ordinance.

The amounts received by Virginia upon the accounts and items objected to by defendant, particularly the dividends upon bank stock, were in no sense money paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included in the State of West Virginia. They were profits earned by Virginia's own money which she had invested in fiscal institutions, and not money paid to Virginia from West Virginian counties, within the meaning or within the reason of the sixth paragraph of the decree, or of the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance, on which that paragraph is based.

The seventh paragraph of the decree directs an account ascertaining "the amount and value of all money, property, stocks and credits which West Virginia received from the Commonwealth of Virginia, not embraced in any of the preceding items, and not including any property, stocks or credits which were obtained or acquired by the Commonwealth after the date of the organization of the restored government of Virginia, together with the nature and description thereof."

This direction of the decree was doubtless given in response to the provisions of §§ 1, 2 and 5 of the act of the Wheeling legislature passed February 3, 1863. There were large amounts of property, chiefly unappropriated, abandoned, and delinquent and forfeited lands to which the Commonwealth had title, which passed to the new State by the said act of the Wheeling legislature and with the value of which property West Virginia was chargeable by the terms of that act, upon such settlement as should be had between the two States.

It was found to be impracticable to obtain satisfactory evidence of the disposition which had been made by the new State of large quantities of land, delinquent and forfeited to the Commonwealth prior to June, 1863. So that the only charges made by Virginia under the seventh paragraph of the decree are for money and bank stocks actually received by West Virginia from Virginia, after the formation of the new State in 1863 and 1864.

West Virginia received from the Commonwealth amounts aggregating $170,771.46, as assented to and certified by the accountants of both parties, and is reported by the master at page 181 at his report. Under these circumstances it is difficult to understand upon what ground the master excluded these items amounting to $170,771.46, as to which the facts are unquestionable.

These sums of money were undoubtedly received by the new from the old State. At that time the officials of the restored government of Virginia were West Virginians. That government dominated by West Virginians and the new State of West Virginia could appropriate and take out of the treasury of the State of Virginia at Wheeling, whatever it chose, and it did undoubtedly receive from the restored government of Virginia $170,771.46 for which sum it is properly chargeable.

What should West Virginia pay? What is West Virginia's share of the debt?

There can be no question but that the provisions of Article 8, § 8 of the West Virginia constitution, the act of Virginia and the act of Congress created a compact, and that the provisions of the constitution constituted an essential stipulation and condition upon which the consent of the legislature of Virginia to the creation of the new State was predicated. The Congress of the United States would never have given its consent to the partition of Virginia, and the erection of the new State out of her domain, but for the fact that the new State had undertaken to assume an equitable proportion of the then existing debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and pay the same with interest thereon.

As to the liability of West Virginia for interest; the contract here considered was a Virginia contract. Under the law of Virginia as repeatedly adjudicated by her highest court, the interest is incident to the obligation, and whenever a debt is due the debtor is bound to pay interest unless relieved from this obligation by agreement. "The interest follows the principal as the shadow does the substance." The decisions of the highest court in West Virginia are in accord with the decisions of the Virginia courts. This rule is applied in Virginia to debts due by the Commonwealth. The framers of the Wheeling ordinance must be presumed to have drawn that instrument with reference to the principle of equity and justice which had then and long before that time been embodied in the laws of Virginia by the repeated decisions of her highest courts.

The language of the Wheeling ordinance is that "The new State shall take upon herself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861," etc.

The debt of Virginia therein referred to was an interest-bearing debt. It was evidenced by the bonds of the Commonwealth, all of which, by the express terms of the obligations, bore interest, payable in the future.

The stipulation of West Virginia expressed in her constitution and accepted and acted upon by Virginia, was that West Virginia would pay the accruing interest on her share of the debt, as it should accrue, and the principal thereof within thirty-four years.

The claim of Virginia is that West Virginia is bound both by the terms of the Wheeling ordinance and of her first constitution to pay a just and equitable part of this debt, with interest thereon until the same shall be fully paid, and that she shall not be suffered to repudiate either obligation.

Mr. Holmes Conrad, counsel for the bondholding creditors, appearing as amicus curiæ:

Counsel for bondholders dissents from the views expressed in the briefs and arguments of the Attorneys General of Virginia and West Virginia, respectively, as to the validity and application here of the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance.

1. The ninth section of the ordinance was not "the basis upon which the consent of the Commonwealth of Virginia was given to the formation of the new State." Such ninth section was never, for one instant of time, recognized by any convention or legislature as having any binding force upon either State or person, and that as a proposition made by Virginia to West Virginia it was never accepted by the latter State.

2. The ninth section was not "a stipulation imposed by Virginia upon West Virginia as a condition upon which her consent was given and which was afterwards accepted and assented to by the people of West Virginia."

3. It was not "a contractual or a fundamental provision, and it did not constitute a primary obligation, or lie at the foundation of the right of West Virginia to be a State."

West Virginia became a State by being admitted into the Union by the Congress of the United States, upon the consent, first obtained, of the restored State of Virginia, and such consent, in its express terms, referred to the constitution framed for West Virginia, and did not by expression or implication refer to the ordinance or to any of its provisions.

4. The "basis of settlement prescribed by the Wheeling ordinance," whether taken alone or in connection with any legislation or constitutional provision, was never binding "on both States" or on either State.

It was not referred to in the case of Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall. 39, and, as shown by Mr. Faulkner, the counsel for West Virginia in that case, had no relevancy or connection with the line of argument taken by either the counsel or the court in that case.

The bondholding creditors, whose interests this court has allowed to be represented here, are creditors of Virginia and of West Virginia alike. They are not formal parties to this cause, but their interests are fully recognized and secured by the several acts of the General Assembly of Virginia, which form part of this record, and under which Virginia has received and holds the bonds deposited by them, as a trustee, as to the unfunded one-third of the amounts of such bonds.

On the part of the bondholding creditors, it is insisted that the only just and reasonable plan for ascertaining the proportion of the debt proper to be borne by West Virginia, is that stated and approved by the writers on international or public law, and which was adopted by this court, in its opinion, delivered by Mr. Justice Field, in Hartman v. Greenhow, 102 U. S. 672.

Both on the ground of international law, and on the express provision of the constitution of the State, under which Congress admitted it into the Union, the liability of West Virginia, for an equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia, appears to be inevitable.

The bonds evidencing the public debt of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, and deposited by the holders thereof, with the Commonwealth of Virginia, under the provisions of the several funding acts, were not cancelled or extinguished as to the one-third of the amount thereof, estimated to be the equitable proportion of such debt to be borne by the State of West Virginia.

The Commonwealth of Virginia has never been discharged from liability on the bonds issued by her prior to January 1, 1861, except as to the extent of the two-thirds of the amount thereof for which amount the holders surrendered them, as to such two-thirds, and received in lieu thereof the new bonds of the Commonwealth.

The Wheeling ordinance, as shown by its title, was "to provide for the formation of a new State, out of a portion of the territory of this State." All of its sections, except the ninth, were directed to that end. The State was formed when its constitution was framed and adopted by its people. The ordinance then became functus officio, and ceased to have any operation. The ninth section, as contended by counsel for West Virginia, was a proposition made by Virginia and tendered to West Virginia.

West Virginia's time for accepting it, was when she was assembled in convention in November, 1861; then, and only then, while she was framing her constitution could she have signified her acceptance of the proposition, by embodying it in her constitution. She did not embody it. She embodied something altogether different, and made no reference to the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance.

A "plan by which the new State should ascertain her just proportion of the public debt of Virginia" was not a matter as to which the parent State, Virginia, could prescribe or dictate terms to the new State. In none of the compacts made by States does it appear that the parent State has ever sought or been allowed to impose on the new State any such burdens, limitations or conditions, as were not immediately connected with the territory ceded to the new State. The extent of such territory, its boundaries, and the rights and assessments incident thereto, and these only, can be the subject-matters of such compacts. All other matters fall within the domestic power and control of the new State.

At no time and in no manner did West Virginia ever accept the proposition contained in the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance. The provision made by West Virginia in her constitution was not an acceptance of the ninth section of the Wheeling ordinance. It differed in its most material features from that section. Acceptance of a proposition must be absolute and unconditional without the omission or addition of a single term.

The method of ascertainment proposed by the ninth section of the ordinance cannot be accepted as a proper plan for ascertaining West Virginia's just proportion of the public debt of Virginia, because—as the master has found in his report—"The Wheeling ordinance is not predicated upon the amount of the public debt," and counsel for West Virginia have repeatedly stated that "the ninth section of the ordinance has no relation to the amount of the public debt of Virginia," etc. "The amount of the Virginia debt is not a factor to be taken into consideration in ascertaining West Virginia's just proportion."

The "just proportion" of an amount cannot be ascertained without knowing the amount itself.

The convention that framed the constitution for the proposed new State did not regard itself as bound by any suggestions offered by the Wheeling ordinance. It either ignored or repudiated the suggestion made as to the name of the new State, and also as to the plan for ascertaining the proper proportion of the public debt of Virginia to be borne by West Virginia.

The act of Congress of December 31, 1862, admitting the State of West Virginia into the Union, did not refer to the Wheeling ordinance, but did refer only to the act of the Virginia legislature and to the constitution adopted by West Virginia.

The act of the legislature of Virginia giving consent to the erection of the new State within its territory did not refer to the Wheeling ordinance, and her consent was not given on any condition, either express or implied, that the ordinance or any of its provisions should form a compact between the two States, but such consent was given to the formation of the new State according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the constitution for the said State of West Virginia, proposed by the convention which assembled in Wheeling on November 26, 1861.

The Wheeling ordinance was adopted by a convention which sat in August, 1861, and the purpose of the Virginia legislature appears to have been to exclude the inference that it referred in any way to the acts of that convention.

Mr. Charles E. Hogg, Mr. George W. McClintic and Mr. John C. Spooner, with whom Mr. William G. Conley, Attorney General of the State of West Virginia, Mr.

Wm. Mollohan, Mr. Wm. M. O. Dawson and Mr. W. G. Matthews were on the brief, for West Virginia:

When the great transactions occurred which are under review, the Confederate States of America had been formed. Ordinances of secession had been passed by South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. Virginia had passed an ordinance of secession, had borrowed $1,000,000, had called for 10,000 men to serve for twelve months and has arranged with the Confederate government for admission to the Confederacy, and in the meantime that her troops should, under the Confederate government, be employed against the United States.

Her troops had seized the Norfolk and Gossport Navy Yards, the arsenal at Harper's Ferry, the Customs Houses, and other property of the United States within her borders; had hauled down the flag of the United States and hoisted in its place another. President Buchanan in a message to Congress had taken the position that there was no power in the Federal Government under the Constitution to coerce a State. Fort Sumter had been surrendered.

President Lincoln had called for 75,000 troops to serve three months. The battle of Bull Run had been fought in which the Federal troops were disastrously defeated. The "New York Tribune," edited by Mr. Greeley, exercising a most potent influence upon public opinion, advocated a peaceful separation of the States determined to withdraw, and many eminent men of undoubted love for the Union in both parties seemed to be of the same opinion. There was grave doubt throughout the country as to the ultimate result. The people of West Virginia could not be blind to the fact that if the Confederacy should be established, that territory would, unless action were taken, be irrevocably a part of that Confederacy.

Isolated from eastern Virginia, and differing in sentiment from her people in respect to the right of secession and the institution of slavery, her people are not to be justly chided here or elsewhere for embracing that opportunity to become a State in the Union. In this situation, is to be found the genesis of West Virginia; and in the light of this situation, her people are to be judged and her compacts and "constating" instruments are to be construed.

This court has never decided that when a State is divided the debts of the original State should be ratably apportioned between it and the new State. That question was not involved in or decided by either Hartman v. Greenhow, 102 U. S. 672, or Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U. S. 769.

The true rule of public law in case of the division of a State is that general debts are apportioned on the basis of taxable value. Local debts are assumed by the State for the exclusive benefit of whose territory they were incurred. See Hall's International Law, 78, 80. No rule of international law concerning this point can be said to exist, although many treaties have stipulated a devolution of a part of the debt of the predecessor upon its successor. See also Treaty of Berlin of 1878, and Huber, Nos. 125–135 and 205; Oppenheim's Int. Law, § 84; and Glenn's Int. Law, 36. As to effect of change of sovereignty upon the public rights and obligations, see Hannis Taylor, Int. Law, §§ 166, 168. Pradier Fodéré, in "Traité de Droit International Public," Vol. 1, § 156, states that the state to which cession is made is bound by local debts of ceded territory.

Bluntschli says, § 59, that the debts of the state ought not to be divided proportionally to the population, but that the taxes furnish a juster basis. Bonfils, 3d ed., §§ 223–226, limits the liability exclusively to the debts contracted for the exclusive benefit of its territory, and makes taxation the basis. Franz v. Liszt, University of Berlin, 2d ed., Berlin, 1902, § 23, p. 175, takes the same view; see also Piédelièvre, Paris, 1894, §§ 154, 155. The proportion of the debt to be borne should be determined in accordance with the relative wealth of the detached portion and of the remainder of the dismembered state, and this wealth is disclosed by the taxes. Alphonse Rivier, Paris, 1826, Vol. 1, p. 213 (Art. 40, V).

Pasquale Fiore, Int. Law, § 132, of his codified Int. Law, § 360 of Nouveau Droit International, says that Bluntschli is correct, that the apportionment should not be made proportionally to population, but apportioned proportionally to the taxes. Pradier Fodéré, §§ 156, 157, states that the state to which cession is made is bound by local debts of ceded territory, citing as instances the acquisition of Lombardy and Venice by Italy, and the Alsace-Lorraine cession of 1871, as the general rule, to which the treaty of Berlin of 1878, imposing part of the public Turkish debt upon Bulgaria, Montenegro, Servia, was an exception.

Max Huber, on Staatensuccession (1898), says, pp. 90–92, § 34, that the division pro rata regionis has no reasonable basis, and on p. 96 limits the assumption to special debts; see also § 272, as to debts incurred in the interest of the particular domain. See also Henri Appleton on Annexation and Debts, Paris, 1895, Ch. IV, § II, 65–67.

Even if the court should be of opinion that the rule of international law does not govern the present case, yet if the court, apart from the method prescribed by the ordinance and notwithstanding the provision in the constitution of West Virginia referring the matter for ascertainment to the legislature of that State, should undertake to determine the equitable proportion of the old Virginia debt which West Virginia should assume, it cannot fail to give great weight to the authorities on international law which we have cited. The rules of international law are based entirely upon considerations of equity and fairness. They have no force nor sanction except from the consent of nations by reason of their evident justice. This court, therefore, in determining what would be an equitable apportionment of the Virginia debt, would undoubtedly desire to take into most careful consideration the unanimous opinion of the modern international law authorities that, in apportioning the debt of a state after its division, equity requires a distinction to be made between the portion of the debt which is local or special in its character and that which is general, so that the parent state and the new state are bound respectively to assume the whole of the local debts relating to their respective territories, leaving only the general debt to be apportioned on the basis of taxable value.

The distinction between general and local debts was recognized in the division of territory of Dakota. Act of Congress of Feby. 22, 1889, § 6, 25 U. S. Stat. 682.

The distinction between general and special debt was discussed in negotiation of treaty between United States and Spain. The American commissioners recognized the distinction, but refused to accede to the demand of Spain, upon the ground that Cuba had had no debt, but, on the contrary, had been a self-supporting colony, and the commissioners considered that the indebtedness was incurred, and its proceeds used, to wage war upon Cuba and to resist by arms the aspirations and struggles of her people to be freed from long-continued despotism and misrule and that the debt was, therefore, a part of Spain's national or general debt.

If we had taken over Cuba in the absence of strife between Cuba and Spain and the United States and Spain, and there had been found an indebtedness incurred by Spain, the proceeds of which had been expended in public improvements in Cuba and for the benefit and betterment of the island and its inhabitants, the question would have been a different one, and from the standpoint of international law and justice, our attitude must have been different.

The distinction between general debt and local debt is substantial and just and rests upon a sound principle.

The public debt of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, was a local or special and not a general debt.

In respect of all of the debt, the proceeds of which were expended in West Virginia, the schedule shows that the loans which she effected were numbered as required by law, the certificate of debt or certificates of debt, referring to the act which authorized the particular expenditure, so that it is not only true that the debt represents expenditures for internal improvements, but it is true, so far as the expenditures in West Virginia were concerned, that the moneys which were expended, the proceeds of loans, are traceable to the particular improvements and the stocks and dividends thereon were pledged for the repayment of the loan.

The rule of public law does not govern this case because the Wheeling ordinance and the constitution of West Virginia constitute a special agreement as to the proportion of the old Virginia debt to be assumed by West Virginia.

Virginia is not in a position to insist upon the elimination of the ordinance from the case. Virginia does not contend that the ordinance has ceased to be binding. There is no conflict between the ordinance and the constitution; the latter was adopted within ninety days of the former. The constitutional provision was silent as to method. There was no occasion for repeating in it the language of the ordinance so recently adopted as to the ordinance being a compact. See Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall. 39; and as to whether Congress consented to it, see Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U. S. 503; Wedding v.

Meyler, 192 U. S. 582. It certainly was a compact, and wherever it was not carried into the constitution, it remains binding as such.

When the Congress admitted West Virginia into the Union, there were two States, and the ordinance so far as it was not merged into the constitution, was a compact binding from the beginning.

The vice in the argument for Virginia is in the assumption that the ordinance is to be read as if it consisted only of these words: The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of Virginia prior to the first of January, 1861. The ordinance was not confined to the debt.

"Just" and "equitable" are synonymous. See Webster; "1. Justice, right."

If the ordinance is in conflict with the constitution the ordinance must be wholly eliminated; and with the ordinance eliminated the ascertainment of West Virginia's proportion of the debt must be left to the legislature of West Virginia. What proportion of the debt of a county or a city or a town which is divided by legislative authority, shall be borne by the portion set off to make a new town, or included within the boundaries of another county, city or town, is a legislative question and not a judicial one. Laramie Co. v. Albany Co., 92 U. S. 307; Mount Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514. If the legislature of West Virginia has failed, with or without justification, to discharge the duty imposed upon it by the constitution, the matter was left by the legislature of Virginia and by the Congress to the honor of the legislature of West Virginia. There is no recourse to courts. With the ordinance eliminated the matter is not justiciable. Tulare County v. Kings County, 117 California, 195; Los Angeles County v. Orange County, 97 California, 329; Taylor v. Brewer, 1 Maule & Selwin, 290; and Cummer v. Butts, 40 Michigan, 322.

This court, however, has declared that the ordinance and the constitution do not conflict and are to be read in pari materia. See former opinion in this case, 206 U. S. 290, 319.

The master was right in holding that bonds held by the Sinking Fund and by the Literary Fund were not a part of the public debt of Virginia. Board of Public Works v. Gannt, 76 Virginia, 465; Louisiana v. Jumel and Elliott v. Wiltz, 107 U. S. 711.

The master was right in excluding under paragraph III of the decree expenditures by corporations in which Virginia was a stockholder.

Virginia legislature and courts recognize the distinction between private corporations with stock and public corporations without stock. Sayre v. The Northwestern Turnpike Road, 10 Leigh, 454.

The master was wrong in finding that interest on the public debt of Virginia was part of the ordinary expenses of the state government.

Interest on a state debt is not an ordinary expense of government because it is payable only during a limited period.

Interest on the old Virginia debt was not an ordinary expense of government because the debt was incurred for extraordinary purposes.

West Virginia is not bound to pay interest from January 1, 1861, on the proportion of the old Virginia debt assumed by her.

There is no basis for Virginia's claim for interest. Commonwealth v. Marston's Administrator, 9 Leigh, 36.

Neither by the ordinance nor by her constitution did West Virginia in præsenti assume any portion of the public debt of Virginia.

The Virginia rule as to private contracts that interest follows the principal does not and cannot apply to contracts between sovereign States. Higginbotham's Execu- trix v. Commonwealth, 25 Grattan, 627, does not apply in this case.

United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S. 211, holds that interest is not to be awarded against a sovereign government, unless its consent to pay interest has been clearly manifested by an act of its legislature, or by a lawful contract of its executive officers. Citing United States v. Sherman, 98 U. S. 565; Angarica v. Bayard, 127 U. S. 251, 260.

West Virginia did not agree to assume a just proportion of all the outstanding obligations of Virginia, but only of her debt.

There is no evidence that the improvements constructed by Virginia within her present limits were for the benefit of the region now West Virginia.

Under the ordinance and her constitution West Virginia cannot be charged with interest until after the ascertainment, in the manner prescribed, of her equitable proportion of the old Virginia debt.

If there had been any intent to assume, or pay, the accrued interest on the bonds of Virginia, outstanding, the constitution would have so expressed it.

Following the principle announced in United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S. 211, many of the state courts have laid down in distinct terms the same proposition. Sawyer v. Colgan, 102 Florida, 293; Hawkins v. Mitchell, 34 Florida, 421; Molineaux v. State, 109 Florida, 380; Flint &c. R. R. Co. v. State Auditors, 102 Michigan, 502; Carr v. State, 127 Indiana, 204; S. C., 22 Am. St. Rep. 624, note, p. 448.

Virginia alone is responsible for the delay in apportioning the debt and West Virginia cannot be charged with that delay.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a bill brought by the Commonwealth of Virginia to have the State of West Virginia's proportion of the public debt of Virginia as it stood before 1861 ascertained and satisfied. The bill was set forth when the case was before this court on demurrer. 206 U. S. 290. Nothing turns on the form or contents of it. The object has been stated. The bill alleges the existence of a debt contracted between 1820 and 1861 in connection with internal improvements intended to develop the whole State, but with especial view to West Virginia, and carried through by the votes of the representatives of the West Virginia counties. It then sets forth the proceedings for the formation of a separate State and the material provisions of the ordinance adopted for that purpose at Wheeling on August 20, 1861, the passage of an act of Congress for the admission of the new State under a constitution that had been adopted, and the admission of West Virginia into the Union, all of which we shall show more fully a little further on. Then follows an averment of the transfer in 1863 to West Virginia of the property within her boundaries belonging to West Virginia, to be accounted for in the settlement thereafter to be made with the last-named State. As West Virginia gets the benefit of this property without an accounting, on the principles of this decision, it needs not to be mentioned in more detail. A further appropriation to West Virginia is alleged of $150,000, together with unappropriated balances, subject to accounting for the surplus on hand received from counties outside of the new State. Then follows an argumentative averment of a contract in the constitution of West Virginia to assume an equitable proportion of the above-mentioned public debt, as hereafter will be explained. Attempts between 1865 and 1872 to ascertain the two States' proportion of the debt and their failure are averred, and the subsequent legislation and action of Virginia in arranging with the bondholders, that will be explained hereafter so far as needs. Substantially all the bonds outstanding in 1861 have been taken up. It is stated that both in area of territory and in population West Virginia was equal to about one-third of Virginia, that being the proportion that Virginia asserts to be the proper one for the division of the debt, and this claim is based upon the division of the State, upon the above-mentioned Wheeling ordinance and the constitution of the new State, upon the recognition of the liability by statute and resolution, and upon the receipt of property as has been stated above. After stating further efforts to bring about an adjustment and their failure, the bill prays for an accounting to ascertain the balance due to Virginia in her own right and as trustee for bondholders and an adjudication in accord with this result.

The answer admits a debt of about $33,000,000, but avers that the main object of the internal improvements in connection with which it was contracted was to afford outlets to the Ohio River on the west and to the seaboard on the east for the products of the eastern part of the State, and to develop the resources of that part, not those of what is now West Virginia. In aid of this conclusion it goes into some elaboration of details. It admits the proceedings for the separation of the State and refers to an act of May, 1862, consenting to the same, to which we also shall refer. It denies that it received property of more than a little value from Virginia or that West Virginia received more than belonged to her in the way of surplus revenue on hand when she was admitted to the Union, and denies that any liability for these items was assumed by her constitution. It sets forth in detail the proceedings looking to a settlement, but as they have no bearing upon our decision we do not dwell upon them. It admits the transactions of Virginia with the bondholders and sets up that they discharged the Commonwealth from one-third of its debt and that what may have been done as to two-thirds does not concern the defendant, since Virginia admits that her share was not less than that. If the bonds outstanding in 1861 have been taken up it is only by the issue of new bonds for two-thirds and certificates to be paid by West Virginia alone for the other third. Liability for any payments by Virginia is denied and accountability, if any, is averred to be only on the principle of § 9 of the Wheeling ordinance, to be stated. It is set up further that under the constitution of West Virginia her equitable proportion can be established by her legislature alone, that the liquidation can be only in the way provided by that instrument, and hence that this suit cannot be maintained. The settlement by Virginia with her creditors also is pleaded as a bar, and that she brings this suit solely as trustee for them.

The grounds of the claim are matters of public history. After the Virginia ordinance of secession, citizens of the State who dissented from that ordinance organized a government that was recognized as the State of Virginia by the Government of the United States. Forthwith a convention of the restored State, as it was called, held at Wheeling, proceeded to carry out a long entertained wish of many West Virginians by adopting an ordinance for the formation of a new State out of the western portion of the old Commonwealth. A part of § 9 of the ordinance was as follows: "The new state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all state expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government, since any part of said debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the monies paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new state during the said period." Having previously provided for a popular vote, a constitutional convention, etc., the ordinance in § 10 ordained that when the General Assembly should give its consent to the formation of such new State, it should forward to the Congress of the United States such consent, together with an official copy of such constitution, with the request that the new State might be admitted into the union of States.

A constitution was framed for the new State by a constitutional convention, as provided in the ordinance, on November 26, 1861, and was adopted. By Article 8, § 8, "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof, by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years." An act of the legislature of the restored State of Virginia, passed May 13, 1862, gave the consent of that legislature to the erection of the new State "under the provisions set forth in the constitution for the said State of West Virginia." Finally Congress gave its sanction by an act of December 31, 1862, c. 6, 12 Stat. 633, which recited the framing and adoption of the West Virginia constitution and the consent given by the legislature of Virginia through the last mentioned act, as well as the request of the West Virginia convention and of the Virginia legislature, as the grounds for its consent. There was a provision for the adoption of an emancipation clause before the act of Congress should take effect, and for a proclamation by the President, stating the fact, when the desired amendment was made. Accordingly, after the amendment and a proclamation by President Lincoln, West Virginia became a State on June 20, 1863.

It was held in 1870 that the foregoing constituted an agreement between the old State and the new, Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall. 39, and so much may be taken practically to have been decided again upon the demurrer in this case, although the demurrer was overruled without prejudice to any question. Indeed, so much is almost if not quite admitted in the answer. After the answer had been filed the cause was referred to a master by a decree made on May 4, 1908, 209 U. S. 514, 534, which provided for the ascertainment of the facts made the basis of apportionment by the original Wheeling ordinance, and also of other facts that would furnish an alternative method if that prescribed in the Wheeling ordinance should not be followed; this again without prejudice to any question in the cause. The master has reported, the case has been heard upon the merits, and now is submitted to the decision of the court.

The case is to be considered in the untechnical spirit proper for dealing with a quasi-international controversy, remembering that there is no municipal code governing the matter, and that this court may be called on to adjust differences that cannot be dealt with by Congress or disposed of by the legislature of either State alone. Missouri v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 496, 519, 520. Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 46, 82–84. Therefore we shall spend no time on objections as to multifariousness, laches and the like, except so far as they affect the merits, with which we proceed to deal. See Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 14 Peters, 210, 257. United States v. Beebe, 127 U. S. 338.

The amount of the debt January 1, 1861, that we have to apportion no longer is in dispute. The master's finding was accepted by West Virginia and at the argument we understood Virginia not to press her exception that it should be enlarged by a disputed item. It was $33,897,073.82, the sum being represented mainly by interest-bearing bonds. The first thing to be decided is what the final agreement was that was made between the two States. Here again we are not to be bound by technical form. A State is superior to the forms that it may require of its citizens. But there would be no technical difficulty in making a contract by a constitutive ordinance if followed by the creation of the contemplated State. Wedding v. Meyler, 192 U. S. 573, 583. And, on the other hand, there is equally little difficulty in making a contract by the constitution of the new State, if it be apparent that the instrument is not addressed solely to those who are to be subject to its provisions, but is intended to be understood by the parent State and by Congress as embodying a just term which conditions the parent's consent. There can be no question that such was the case with West Virginia. As has been shown, the consent of the legislature of the restored State was a consent to the admission of West Virginia under the provisions set forth in the constitution for the would-be State, and Congress gave its sanction only on the footing of the same constitution and the consent of Virginia in the last-mentioned act. These three documents would establish a contract without more. We may add, with reference to an argument to which we attach little weight, that they establish a contract of West Virginia with Virginia. There is no reference to the form of the debt or to its holders, and it is obvious that Virginia had an interest that it was most important that she should be able to protect. Therefore West Virginia must be taken to have promised to Virginia to pay her share, whoever might be the persons to whom ultimately the payment was to be made.

We are of opinion that the contract established as we have said is not modified or affected in any practical way by the preliminary suggestions of the Wheeling ordinance. Neither the ordinance nor the special mode of ascertaining a just proportion of the debt that it puts forward is mentioned in the constitution of West Virginia, or in the act of Virginia giving her consent, or in the act of Congress by which West Virginia became a State. The ordinance required that a copy of the new constitution should be laid before Congress, but said nothing about the ordinance itself. It is enough to refer to the circumstances in which the separation took place to show that Virginia is entitled to the benefit of any doubt so far as the construction of the contract is concerned. See opinion of Attorney-General Bates to President Lincoln, 10 Op. Atty. Gen. 426. The mode of the Wheeling ordinance would not throw on West Virginia a proportion of the debt that would be just, as the ordinance requires, or equitable, according to the promise of the constitution, unless upon the assumption that interest on the public debt should be considered as part of the ordinary expenses referred to in its terms. That we believe would put upon West Virginia a larger obligation than the mode that we adopt, but we are of opinion that her share should be ascertained in a different way. All the modes, however, consistent with the plain contract of West Virginia, whether under the Wheeling ordinance or the constitution of that State, come out with surprisingly similar results.

It was argued, to be sure, that the debt of Virginia was incurred for local improvements and that in such a case, even apart from the ordinance, it should be divided according to the territory in which the money was expended. We see no sufficient reason for the application of such a principle to this case. In form the aid was an investment. It generally took the shape of a subscription for stock in a corporation. To make the investment a safe one the precaution was taken to require as a condition precedent that two or three-fifths of the stock should have been subscribed for by solvent persons fully able to pay, and that one-fourth of the subscriptions should have been paid up into the hands of the treasurer. From this point of view the venture was on behalf of the whole State. The parties interested in the investment were the same, wherever the sphere of corporate action might be. The whole State would have got the gain and the whole State must bear the loss, as it does not appear that there are any stocks of value on hand. If we should attempt to look farther, many of the corporations concerned were engaged in improvements that had West Virginia for their objective point, and we should be lost in futile detail if we should try to unravel in each instance the ultimate scope of the scheme. It would be unjust, however, to stop with the place where the first steps were taken and not to consider the purpose with which the enterprise was begun. All the expenditures had the ultimate good of the whole State in view. Therefore we adhere to our conclusion that West Virginia's share of the debt must be ascertained in a different way. In coming to it we do but apply against West Virginia the argument pressed on her behalf to exclude her liability under the Wheeling ordinance in like cases. By the ordinance West Virginia was to be charged with all state expenditures within the limits thereof. But she vigorously protested against being charged with any sum expended in the form of a purchase of stocks.

But again, it was argued that if this contract should be found to be what we have said, then the determination of a just proportion was left by the constitution to the legislature of West Virginia, and that irrespectively of the words of the instrument it was only by legislation that a just proportion could be fixed. These arguments do not impress us. The provision in the constitution of the State of West Virginia that the legislature shall ascertain the proportion as soon as may be practicable was not intended to undo the contract in the preceding words by making the representative and mouthpiece of one of the parties the sole tribunal for its enforcement. It was simply an exhortation and command from supreme to subordinate authority to perform the promise as soon as might be and an indication of the way. Apart from the language used, what is just and equitable is a judicial question similar to many that arise in private litigation, and in nowise beyond the competence of a tribunal to decide.

The ground now is clear, so far as the original contract between the two States is concerned. The effect of that is that West Virginia must bear her just and equitable proportion of the public debt as it was intimated in Hartman v. Greenhow, 102 U. S. 672, so long ago as 1880, that she should. It remains for us to consider such subsequent acts as may have affected the original liability or as may bear on the determination of the amount to be paid. On March 30, 1871, Virginia, assuming that the equitable share of West Virginia was about one-third, passed an act authorizing an exchange of the outstanding bonds, etc., and providing for the funding of two-thirds of the debt with interest accrued to July 1, 1871, by the issue of new bonds bearing the same rate of interest as the old, six per cent. There were to be issued at the same time, for the other one-third, certificates of same date, setting forth the amount of the old bond that was not funded, that payment thereof with interest at the rate prescribed in the old bond would be provided for in accordance with such settlement as should be had between Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt, and that Virginia held the old bonds in trust for the holder or his assignees. There were further details that need not be mentioned. The coupons of the new bonds were receivable for all taxes and demands due to the State. Hartman v. Greenhow, 102 U. S. 672. McGahey v. Virginia, 135 U. S. 662. The certificates issued to the public under this statute and outstanding amount to $12,703,451.79.

The burden under the statute of 1871 still being greater than Virginia felt able to bear, a new refunding act was passed on March 28, 1879, reducing the interest and providing that Virginia would negotiate or aid in negotiating with West Virginia for the settlement of the claims of certificate holders and that the acceptance of certificates 'for West Virginia's one-third' under this act should be an absolute release of Virginia from all liability on account of the same. Few of these certificates were accepted. On February 14, 1882, another attempt was made, but without sufficient success to make it necessary to set forth the contents of the statute. The certificates for balances not represented by bonds, "constituting West Virginia's share of the old debt," stated that the balance was "to be accounted for by the state of West Virginia without recourse upon this commonwealth."

On February 20, 1892, a statute was passed which led to a settlement, described in the bill as final and satisfactory. This provided for the issue of bonds for nineteen million dollars in exchange for twenty-eight millions outstanding, not funded, the new bonds bearing interest at two per cent for the first ten years and three per cent for ninety years; and certificates in form similar to that just stated, in the act of 1882. On March 6, 1894, a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Delegates was passed, reciting the passage of the four above mentioned statutes, the provisions for certificates, and the satisfactory adjustment of the liabilities assumed by Virginia on account of two-thirds of the debt, and appointing a committee to negotiate with West Virginia, when satisfied that a majority of the certificate holders desired it and would accept the amount to be paid by West Virginia in full settlement of the one-third that Virginia had not assumed. The State was to be subjected to no expense. Finally an act of March 6, 1900, authorized the commission to receive and take on deposit the certificates, upon a contract that the certificate holders would accept the amount realized from West Virginia in full settlement of all their claims under the same. It also authorized a suit if certain proportions of the certificates should be so deposited, as since then they have been—the State, as before, to be subjected to no expense.

On January 9, 1906, the commission reported that apart from certificates held by the State and not entering into this account, there were outstanding of the certificates of 1871 in the hands of the public $12,703,451.79, as we have said, of which the commission held $10,851,294.09, and of other certificates there were in the hands of the public $2,778,239.80, of which the commission held $2,322,141.32.

On the foregoing facts a technical argument is pressed that Virginia has discharged herself of all liability as to one-third of the debt; that, therefore, she is without interest in this suit, and cannot maintain it on her own behalf; that she cannot maintain it as trustee for the certificate holders, New Hampshire v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76; and that the bill is multifarious in attempting to unite claims made by the plaintiff as such trustee with some others set up under the Wheeling ordinance, etc., which, in the view we take, it has not been necessary to mention or discuss. We shall assume it to be true for the purposes of our decision, although it may be open to debate, Greenhow v. Vashon, 81 Virginia, 336, 342, 343, that the certificate holders who have turned in their certificates, being much the greater number, as has been seen, by doing so, if not before, surrendered all claims under the original bonds or otherwise against Virginia to the extent of one-third of the debt. But even on that concession the argument seems to us unsound.

The liability of West Virginia is a deep-seated equity, not discharged by changes in the form of the debt, nor split up by the unilateral attempt of Virginia to apportion specific parts to the two States. If one-third of the debt were discharged in fact, to all intents, we perceive no reason, in what has happened, why West Virginia should not contribute her proportion of the remaining two-thirds. But we are of opinion that no part of the debt is extinguished, and further, that nothing has happened to bring the rule of New Hampshire v. Louisiana into play. For even if Virginia is not liable she has the contract of West Virginia to bear an equitable share of the whole debt, a contract in the performance of which the honor and credit of Virginia is concerned, and which she does not lose her right to insist upon by her creditors accepting from necessity the performance of her estimated duty as confining their claims for the residue to the party equitably bound. Her creditors never could have sued her if the supposed discharge had not been granted, and the discharge does not diminish her interest and right to have the whole debt paid by the help of the defendant. The suit is in Virginia's own interest, none the less that she is to turn over the proceeds. See United States v. Beebe, 127 U. S. 338, 342. United States v. Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Ry. Co., 118 U. S. 120, 125, 126. Moreover, even in private litigation it has been held that a trustee may recover to the extent of the interest of his cestui que trust. Lloyd's v. Harper, 16 Ch. D. 290, 309, 315. Lamb v. Vice, 6 M. & W. 467, 472. We may add that in all its aspects it is a suit on the contract, and it is most proper that the whole matter should be disposed of at once.

It remains true then, notwithstanding all the transactions between the old Commonwealth and her bondholders, that West Virginia must bear her equitable proportion of the whole debt. With a qualification which we shall mention in a moment, we are of opinion that the nearest approach to justice that we can make is to adopt a ratio determined by the master's estimated valuation of the real and personal property of the two States on the date of the separation, June 20, 1863. A ratio determined by population or land area would throw a larger share on West Virginia, but the relative resources of the debtor populations are generally recognized, we think, as affording a proper measure. It seems to us plain that slaves should be excluded from the valuation. The master's figures without them are, for Virginia $300,887,367.74, and for West Virginia $92,416,021.65. These figures are criticised by Virginia, but we see no sufficient reason for going behind them, or ground for thinking that we can get nearer to justice in any other way. It seems to us that Virginia cannot complain of the result. They would give the proportion in which the $33,897,073.82 was to be divided, but for a correction which Virginia has made necessary. Virginia with the consent of her creditors has cut down her liability to not more than two-thirds of the debt, whereas at the ratio shown by the figures her share, subject to mathematical correction, is about .7651. If our figures are correct, the difference between Virginia's share, say $25,931,261.47, and the amount that the creditors were content to accept from her, say $22,598,049.21, is $3,333,212.26; subtracting the last sum from the debt leaves $30,563,861.56 as the sum to be apportioned. Taking .235 as representing the proportion of West Virginia we have $7,182,507.46 as her share of the principal debt.

We have given our decision with respect to the basis of liability and the share of the principal of the debt of Virginia that West Virginia assumed. In any event, before we could put our judgment in the form of a final decree there would be figures to be agreed upon or to be ascertained by reference to a master. Among other things there still remains the question of interest. Whether any interest is due, and if due from what time it should be allowed and at what rate it should be computed, are matters as to which there is a serious controversy in the record, and concerning which there is room for a wide divergence of opinion. There are many elements to be taken into account on the one side and on the other. The circumstances of the asserted default and the conditions surrounding the failure earlier to procure a determination of the principal sum payable, including the question of laches as to either party, would require to be considered. A long time has elapsed. Wherever the responsibility for the delay might ultimately be placed, or however it might be shared, it would be a severe result to capitalize charges for half a century—such a thing hardly could happen in a private case analogous to this. Statutes of limitation, if nothing else, would be likely to interpose a bar. As this is no ordinary commercial suit, but, as we have said, a quasi-international difference referred to this court in reliance upon the honor and constitutional obligations of the States concerned rather than upon ordinary remedies, we think it best at this stage to go no farther, but to await the effect of a conference between the parties, which, whatever the outcome, must take place. If the cause should be pressed contentiously to the end, it would be referred to a master to go over the figures that we have given provisionally, and to make such calculations as might become necessary. But this case is one that calls for forbearance upon both sides. Great States have a temper superior to that of private litigants, and it is to be hoped that enough has been decided for patriotism, the fraternity of the Union, and mutual consideration to bring it to an end.
